Giscard d'Estaing: Permit me first of all to dissociate myself from the difference you mention with regard to the feelings of a certain category of Frenchmen toward the Federal Republic. Reconciliation between our two countries, sincere cooperation, seem to me to be obviously in accordance with the feelings of all Frenchmen as well as Germans. We would not be where we are if this were different. Since you have mentioned our relations with the German Democratic Republic, I remind you that we established diplomatic relations 7 years ago, and respect the rights and responsibilities of France with regard to Berlin and Germany as a whole. Since then our relations have developed in several fields and with other East European countries as well. Contacts have been established at the government level. This was just a clarification, but I do not intend to visit the GDR. If I were to go there some day--and I remind you that there are a number of other states in Europe with which we have maintained relations for a longer time and which I have not yet visited--my decision will not be based on the considerations you have just mentioned.

FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU: Mr President, you are under constant pressure to pursue a national and independent foreign policy. Recent examples are the Olympic boycott and the Warsaw summit with Leonid Brezhnev. Your action is being assessed in this light, particularly by the Gaullists and the Communists. Where are the limits for you between Western solidarity, on the one hand, and consultations with Bonn, on the other?

Giscard d'Estaing: For France independence is a natural reality based on history; it is a matter of course for a vast majority of the French. It is not the result of some sort of pressure as you seem to assume. In your question you juxtapose independence and solidarity as if one thing ruled out the other. Solidarity is not a synonym for subordination; in no case is this meaning we attribute to it. In an alliance of sovereign states and free nations, such as the Western countries, solidarity is based on common principles. It calls for coordination and consultation with regard to acation, not for subordination, so the problem you have construed seems artificial to me. France leaves no doubt with regard to the camp it belongs to. It is neither neutral nor neutralistic. If need be, it would meet its commitments without any weakness. France attributes the greatest significance to the consultations with its allies, particularly with Bonn. When France takes a position or an initiative, it does so in such a way that its action will be in accord with the common interests of the West. But France does it on the basis of its own analyses and its own convictions. It makes its own decisions and it takes full responsibility for them: This is independence.

FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU: Mr President, German-French consultation seems not to function at all in one field: Do you know that many Germans are afraid of the establishment of French nuclear centers and other sources of environmental pollution along the border?

Giscard d'Estaing: Relations between the authorities responsible for nuclear safety, the CEA [French Atomic Energy Commission] on the one hand and the Federal Research Ministry and the Karlsruhe Study Center on the other, are close, full of trust and productive. This also applies to the centers located in the border areas. Frequent contacts take place between those responsible and the experts of the Commission for Nuclear Safety or--particularly--the border commissions. Administration authorities on both sides maintain close contact and inform each other on the functioning of the installations. These contacts have confirmed that the French and German centers have a comparable safety level which is most extraordinary.

There is also coordination on other kinds of pollution, particularly in the international Mosel Commission. This coordination permits studies to be made and effective programs to be established. Important progress has been achieved here or is in the offing. Results are already remarkable with regard to the Rossel, a tributary of the Saar, running through the Lotringan industrial area; ammonia pollution has been reduced 50 percent since 1977.

So it would contradict the truth to say that two different languages are being spoken in this field. We are coordinating our efforts to do justice to the needs of environmental protection and thus to the questions of concern to public opinion. We are determined to continue energetically the fight against environmental pollution, particularly against pollution, particularly against pollution involving our neighbor country. These efforts in the realm of good-neighborly relations, however, cannot be allowed to slow down a nuclear program which is indispensable for our future energy police independence and from which we will not deviate.

USSR AMBASSADOR BRIEFS GISCARD AIDE ON SCHMIDT MOSCOW TALKS

[Unattributed report: "USSR Ambassador in France Has Informed the Elysee of the Result of Talks Between Mr Schmidt and Mr Brezhnev"]

[Text] USSR Ambassador to France Chervonenko was received this Saturday, 5 July, by Presidency of the Republic Secretary General Jacques Wahl. He had come to inform his interlocutor, at Mr Brezhnev's request, of the content of the talks held in Moscow at the beginning of the week between Chancellor Schmidt and the Soviet leaders, the Elysee states.

Mr Wahl immediately reported this conversation--which lasted 1 hour--to Mr Giscard d'Estaing, who is resting at Le Fort de Brégançon. It has been pointed out that the result of Mr Schmidt's visit to Moscow will be the subject of the first meeting which the president of the republic will have with the West German Chancellor in Bonn on Monday, 7 July--the first day of his official visit to the FRG.

LE MONDE: 'UNCERTAINTIES' RESULT OF SCHMIDT USSR TRIP

[Editorial: "Uncertainties"]

[Text] The detente policy and attempts to maintain or revive it have always been ambiguous. Chancellor Schmidt's visit to Moscow and the relatively optimistic remarks he made on his departure are no exception to the rule. They do not reveal whether the Soviet Union has lifted all preconditions to the opening of East-West negotiations on limiting the deployment of new medium-range nuclear weapons in Europe (known as Euromissiles, since Europeans would be the target) or whether Bonn and Moscow are simply agreed on breaking the deadlock in which East and West are locked, each waiting for the other to take the first step.

If the first hypothesis were true the chancellor would have achieved a major victory for detente in Europe; if the second were true he would merely have successfully carried out a difficult exercise whose scope nonetheless remains uncertain.

Mr Schmidt's visit to Moscow was being monitored both by the Americans, annoyed that their most faithful ally should go regild the USSR's diplomatic image which was tarnished by the Kabul coup, and worried about the concessions into which they were in danger of being drawn in the arms sphere; and by a Christian Democratic opposition ready to exploit Mr Schmidt's slightest mistake in the election campaign. Mr Strauss, a candidate to succeed Mr Schmidt, did not wait to hear the results of the Moscow visit to make one of his usual sarcastic remarks: "Mr Schmidt has never needed to lay an egg," he said, "to cluck a great deal."

Therefore the chancellor took care to make constant references to the joint positions held by his allies and partners and he did not fail to deliver his Kremlin speech in the clear and firm language to which he is accustomed but which the Soviets are not used to hearing in public.

Let us not dwell on Afghanistan. Mr Schmidt obtained nothing except...an opportunity to talk about it which the diplomats, who are frequently pleased with very little, regard as a success since the USSR officially asserts that the matter is closed.

However, this "success" has another side inasmuch as the Afghan affair does not prevent the Westerners from discussing with Moscow the means of reviving detente in Europe (although they would like detente to be universal and indivisible) and possible negotiations on the Euromissiles.

In this respect a show of mutual goodwill would not be surprising. The Soviets might think that the revival of the arms race is not being welcomed with unanimous enthusiasm. Mr Schmidt, among others, is convinced that the Soviet economy would not be able to face this. Moreover the FRG has everything to gain from opening negotiations. For several years the chancellor has issued repeated warnings on the dangers, for his country especially, of the deployment of the new Soviet SS-20 missiles in East Europe.

This mutual interest might prompt Mr Schmidt and Mr Brezhnev to break the vicious circle of preconditions. In addition to this the West Germans and the Soviets, who are leading trade partners, are anxious to extend a cooperation which would be damaged by a resumption of the cold war.

Nonetheless, since the only real agreements are those on ulterior motives, as Paul Valery said, the results of Mr Schmidt's visit to Moscow can only be assessed from the implementation and action which ensues.

POLAND'S WOJTASZEK CONSULTS WITH GISCARD, FRANCOIS-PONCET

[Unattributed report: "End of Polish Foreign Minister's Official Visit to Paris"]

[Text] The official part of Polish Foreign Minister Emil Wojtaszek's visit to France ended on Thursday, 3 July. Afghanistan, preparations for the Madrid conference, disarmament and bilateral relations were the main subjects discussed by the chief of Polish diplomacy in his talks with Mr Giscard d'Estaing--who will make a working visit to Poland in the second half of September--and later with his French counterpart.

Mr Francois-Poncet recalled the French stance on Afghanistan and stressed that detente is, of necessity, indivisible. He compared the consequences of the Afghan crisis with the "contents of an inkwell spreading in a glass of water." The Polish minister replied, in particular, that the Vietnam war had not hindered the negotiations which led to the Helsinki CSCE meeting.

Since France and Poland have decided to make joint proposals at the Madrid conference, the Polish minister made suggestions regarding the economic sphere. With regard to disarmament, Mr Francois-Poncet stressed that the French proposal for a conference on disarmament in Europe had become a Western proposal since the last NATO Council meeting. Finally, Mr Wojtaszek asked about the European Council's Venice discussions on the Middle East and the significance of the statement which had been adopted by the Nine.

BOURGES 'MOVED' BY QUALITY OF RECEPTION DURING POLISH VISIT

LD041001 Paris LE FIGARO in French 30 Jun 80 p 4

[Bernard Margueritte report: "Yvon Bourges in Poland: Trustful Talks"]

[Text] "My visit"--National Defense Minister Yvon Bourges said Sunday [29 June]--at the end of a 4-day visit to Poland--"has been an additional indication of the trustful relations which exist between the two countries at all levels."

Bourges added that he had been moved by the quality of the welcome given to the first French defense minister to visit Poland--a quality reflected both by the high level of the military displays staged and by the "extremely friendly atmosphere" which prevailed during the talks.

After visiting Gdansk and Krakow the minister was received Saturday by the new Prime Minister Mr Babiuch and then by Gierek himself. The minister attended an impressive naval review at Gdansk in which 18 ships took part. "I saw 17 of them," the minister explained jokingly, "but I was assured that there was also a submarine which, by definition, I could not see."

A very fine demonstration by an aircraft unit was staged in Krakow and, according to Colonel Dujon, French military attache to Poland, an exercise of this quality has never been staged for Westerners in that country. An MI-24 assault helicopter with 30 gun [as published], missile and electronic equipment took part in the operation, although nobody thought that the Polish Army had even a few models of this latest product of the Soviet military industry.

The two sides agreed that new efforts will be made to extend relations between the military in the two countries (notably between schools and medical corps). Polish Defense Minister Jaruzelski was invited to visit France and accepted the invitation.

Yvon Bourges said he was struck by the fact that the Poles were anxious to give the talks a strictly bilateral character. At no time were France's relations with NATO or Poland's position in the Warsaw Pact raised. It is also worth pointing out that at no time did the Poles made any allusion to President Giscard d'Estaing's revelations about the French neutron bomb. The only strategic question was raised by Jaruzelski who asked why France had apparently abandoned the Gaullist view of multidirectional defense. Bourges answered, with a smile, that that was a misunderstanding and that "France continues to organize its defense in all directions, and since its military capability has increased in recent years it is even organizing it in more directions than before."

WEST BANK DEPORTEES SEEK GOVERNMENT INTERCESSION

[Unattributed report: "The Two West Bank Mayors Expelled by the Israeli Authorities Received at the Quai d'Orsay"]

[Text] The two mayors expelled from the West Bank last May, Fahd al-Qawasimah and Muhammad Milhim, are continuing their worldwide publicity mission "to mobilize international opinion against the injustice of the steps taken against them by the Israeli authorities and to draw attention to the situation on the West Bank." Accompanied by Shaykh Tamimi, Islamic judge in Hebron who has also been expelled, they have just completed a tour of the United States, Britain, Switzerland and the Netherlands and are due in Vienna on Friday to meet Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky.

In Paris, where they have been for a few days, the two mayors were received on Tuesday at the Quai d'Orsay by Serge Boisdevaix, director of the North African and Near East Office, in company with Ibrahim as-Sus, PLO representative in Paris. In this connection, As-Sus declared that the meeting had been "constructive."

"We had the clear impression," he said at a press conference held on Tuesday evening in company with the three West Bank figures, that "the French Government is firmly opposed to any change in the territories, that it considers that the 1949 Geneva Convention should be scrupulously respected and that any solution to the problem should begin with the total evacuation of the occupied territories and should be founded on respect for the principle of self-dtermination." The three West Bank figures for their part stated that they asked their French interlocutors to intervene in their favor with the Israeli authorities so that they can return to their country. They also asked that France recognize the PLO as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people.

On Monday afternoon, the three West Bank deportees were received by Mitterrand, first secretary of the Socialist Party, who promised them to do all he could to enable them to return home. For his part Georges Marchais, secretary of the PCF, after meeting with the three West Bank figures sent a letter on Tuesday to the president of the republic to ask him to intervene with the Israeli authorities.

Meeting With PCF

[Unattributed report: "Georges Marchais Meets With the Expelled West Bank Mayors; an Appeal by the Committee for the Defense of Liberties for the Return of the Two Representatives" under the rubric: "Solidarity With the Palestinian People"]

[Text] The two West Bank mayors who were expelled by the Israeli occupation authorities at the beginning of last May were received yesterday at the premises of the PCF Central Committee by Georges Marchais, secretary general, and Maxime Gremetz, member of the Political Bureau and secretary of the Central Committee.

During a very cordial conversation which lasted almost 2 hours, Georges Marchais expressed the French Communists' total solidarity with the Palestinian people and the struggles of the PLO and with all democratic forces in Israel and in the region which demand the evacuation of the occupied territories, the recognition of the Palestinians' rights to establish an independent state and the all-embacing settlement of the Near East problem. For us, he said, it is a task of primary importance.

The PCF secretary general told the two expelled mayors that he was sending a letter that very day to Giscard d'Estaing, to ask him to approach the Israeli Government to get the illegal expulsion order annulled.

The two West Bank representatives, Fahd al-Qawasimah, mayor of Hebron and Muhammad Milhim, have been in Paris since the end of last week after a stay in the United States and a series of talks at the United Nations (the United Nations has adopted a resolution condemning the arbitrary expulsion). They explained that the Begin government decision is a reaction to the wide popular support that the two elected councils obtained by proclaiming themselves against the occupation any by maintaining cordial relations with the progressive Israeli parties or organizations which favor recognition of the Palestinians' rights and the establishment of the Palestinians' rights and the establishment of peace. It is this attitude to and solidarity with the two mayors who are known as "moderates" which frightened the ultras in Tel Aviv. It has been clearly seen how it, is only a step from expulsion to the fascist outrage to which two other mayors have been victim.

Georges Marchais and Maxime Gremetz recalled some of the actions taken by the PCF on its initiative--overtures to the French Government, delegations to the Israeli Embassy, a mass demonstration--and confirmed that the Palestinian people had our complete solidarity and in the case of the mayors of Hebron and Halhul, solidarity for their return to their country and their jobs. [paragraph continues]

Israel's Supreme Court which on 6 July is to give its verdict on the "legality" of the expulsion decision will be informed of French democrats' opinion.

There are an increasing number of democrats who criticize the ambiguity of the Giscard government stances and who demand that the Elysee and the other political parties such as the Socialist Party bring their action into line with their words.

Marchais Letter to Giscard

[Unattributed report: "For the Return of the West Bank Mayors: Letter From Georges Marchais to Giscard d'Estaing"]

[Excerpt] As announced in our Tuesday edition, Georges Marchais sent a letter on Monday to the present of the republic asking him to take steps to ensure the return home of the two mayors and of Shaykh at-Tamimi, who were expelled from the West Bank the beginning of May.

Here is the text of this message:

"On 6 July 1980, the Israeli high court will give its verdict on the appeal made by the threee figures of Al-Khalil (Hebron) and of Halhul against their expulsion.

This date may determine whether Al-Qawasimah, Milhim and Shaykh at-Tamimi return to their country, their mandates and their families.

France has advocated the return of these three figures twice in the UN Security Council. The foreign minister has confirmed this stance.

On the eve of the 6 July deadline, it seems important to me that our country's voice make itself heard more loudly so that the adopted resolutions do not remain a dead letter but are followed up with concrete steps. It is a question of justice and liberty, of an elementary human right: the right to live in one's own country. The expulsion of regularly elected people whose only crime is opposing the foreign occupation and advocating the right of their people to independence and liberty, is unacceptable.

So I ask, Mister President of the Republic, what steps you intend to take in order to bring about the implementation of the Security Council decisions to ensure the return to their country of the three deportees.

Yours sincerely, etc."

ADMIRAL RULES OUT 'DIVISION OF LABOR' WITH NATO ALLIES

LD041023 Paris LE MONDE in French 1 Jul 80 p 8

[Own correspondant H.B. report: "Real Admiral Lejeune: There Is No Question at Present of a Division of Labor With the United States"]

[Text] Saint-Denis de la Reunion--At the end of his first tour of inspection, at Saint-Denis de la Reunion, Rear Admiral Philippe Lejeune, supreme commander of French Naval Forces in the Indian Ocean, speaking on 28 June of a possible "division of labor" among the Allies--as proposed by Harold Brown, the U.S.defense secretary, last autumn (LE MONDE, 13 September 1979)--for communal protection of the vital supply lines of the industrialized countries, declared: [paragraph continues]

"We share common interests with our allies, which include the United States. But for 14 years now we have no longer been part of the integrated organization of the Atlantic Alliance. This showed that France has an international policy and in particular a defense policy which is independent of U.S. policy. There is no question at present of a division of labor, because we do not have any organization which presupposes division."

"Nevertheless," the rear admiral added, "we share a common interest which concerns vital maritime traffic just as much for Europe as for Japan or the United States. If there were some threat to this traffic, it is conceivable for our governments at that time to determine some coordinated action. For the moment this is a purely intellectual hypothesis."

The rear admiral considered that "France is justified in having military resources in this area" since there are "vital interests for the country" there and it "is a landowner in a territory which has always been French: La Reunion."

PREMIER BARRE COMMENTS ON ECONOMY IN NATIONAL ASSEMBLY

[Unattributed report: "Barre in the National Assembly: '1980 and 1981 Will Be Even More Difficult Years for France'"]

[Excerpt] On Wednesday, 25 June, Raymond Barre was questioned in the National Assembly by Jean Falala (Rally for the Republic [RPR], Marne) on the economic and social situation and the 27 schemes elaborated by the plan commission. Replying to the RPR deputy, who fears that "pursuing an intangible policy leads to risks of economic and social ruptures," Barre said that "1980 and 1981 even more are and will be difficult years for France and for the rest of the world. But France is better armed to face up to the second oil shock. Our currency's stability, which has been obtained neither through magic nor wiles, and the strength of our industry are the living proof of this."

After recalling the main directions of his policy, Barre declared: "The government will not put deflationary policy into operation. But it will maintain a policy of support for economic activity; yesterday with the minister for the environment and living conditions I drew up a whole series of measures which will enable construction activity to maintain a satisfactory rhythm in the coming months."

The prime minister then turned his attention to the work of the general plan commission. As far as the foreign debt goes, if they intimate "that a foreign payements balance must not be sought by means of recession and unemployment and that for a certain time we must resort to foreign debt, then I am quite ready to subscribe to this conclusion," he declared. "It is what the government did at the end of 1976, and in 1977 and partially in 1979. It is what it will do this year. But let us beware: One does not settle on such or such a balance of payments deficit as a medium-term objective. One does not program France's foreign debt for a 5-year period. Do not let us resume, following this advice, the Republican Front government's policy in 1956, which led us in 1957 and then in 1958 to the situation of external collapse in which we landed."

MITTERRAND PRESS CONFERENCE ON FOREIGN POLICY, PRESIDENCY

LD040929 Paris LE MONDE in French 26 Jun 80 pp 8, 9

[Unattributed report on 24 June Paris press conference by French Socialist Party (PS) First Secretary Francois Mitterrand: "Mitterrand Talks Like a Candidate and Draws Up a Charge"]

[Excerpt] Mitterrand traced the main lines for French foreign policy as he conceives it:

"1--France must retain freedom of decision in the framework of the agreements which it freely undertakes, that is, the Atlantic Alliance and the European Community;

"2--As a European continental power, France is bound to be the partner of Germany and Russia;

"3--As a Mediterranean power, France must take the initiative in a regional conference to broach the problems connected with this area;

"4--France, which is more than a regional power, must ensure its presence wherever its interests lie, wherever the world balance of power is in jeopardy, wherever it can help establish an international community of right;

"5--It is not only a matter of East and West, of North and South but also of borders between free and oppressive regimes; France must bear witness and if necessary act wherever human rights and the peoples' right to self-determination are violated."

The PS first secretary then reasserted the constant aims of socialism: arbitration, security and disarmament. Priority must be given, in his opinion, to preparation for the Madrid conference. Mitterrand moreover renewed the PS demand for a European conference on the reduction of forces and tension at which, in particular, "reciprocal confidence-building and information measures" necessary for the defense of peace would be debated.

"I do not know half of the French ministers. I know them less well than the members of the teams for the next Tour de France. That amounts to a deterioration of the executive," the first secretary declared, before recalling that he is disposed toward reducing the presidential term to 5 years.

The PS first secretary took up a theme which he has elaborated persistently, especially since last April's PS national convention devoted to international questions: the idea that the scope and limits of the Atlantic Alliance are in need of urgent redefinition, as too are its mechanisms and its members' mutual obligations.

Mitterrand reasserted that he rejects "all forms, direct or indirect, of neutrality" and that there can be no question of "paying for France's security by means of neutrality."

Concerning the neutron weapon, Mitterrand rejected the idea of a weapon which, if mass-produced, is likely to transform French strategy; but he added: "This weapon must remain in reserve among French techological resources."

Concerning the USSR's announcement about a partial withdrawal of troops from Afghanistan, Mitterrand pointed out: "I await further steps from the Soviet Union before I will believe that what was not possible yesterday has become so today.... When we know what becomes of the Soviet troop withdrawal, we will be able to draw conclusions. It is still too early." The first secretary demanded unconditional withdrawal of these troops; he thus rejected all idea of a staggered evacuation, since a timetable would allow Brezhnev to talk about other matters, in particular the NATO deployment of new missiles in Europe.

Mitterrand sketched the following hypothesis: According to him, Moscow fears a new arms race and is striving through the events in Afghanistan to prevent the deployment of Pershing and cruise missiles in Europe. If this is in fact Brezhnev's aim, the first secretary explained, it is proper to negotiate with him on this issue, bearing in mind that the socialists only entertain the idea of this negotiation if it also covers the question of the deployment of Soviet SS-20 missiles and Backfire bombers.

Recognizing the Afghan Resistance

Mitterrand, however, did not discount the possibility that the USSR may have strategic designs on the oil-producing countries. Nor can it be discounted that it may seek to consolidate the territorial advance which the occupation of Afghanistan represents for it. On this point, the socialist leader considered that "any definite comment like that of Giscard d'Estaing, who is concerned above all in justifying his Warsaw conversation, entails a danger of misleading public opinion." He considered that France's role in this affair must be "clarified." According to him, the question is still unresolved as to whether Moscow considers Giscard d'Estaing "the most pliant or the weakest possible partner." Mitterrand also declared that maintaining a war situation in Afghanistan must lead to international recognition of the Afghan resistance, if it manages to unite.

Despite its weaponry, France is not in a position, in his opinion, to conduct a credible deterrence policy. "If the probable antagonist has doubts not about the quality of our arms but about the character of the man who is to use them in the country's name, then there is no deterrent.... The way our foreign policy is conducted and even certain aspects of our military policy give rise to the idea that not everything is being done to put France in a position to ensure its own deterrent."

During this meeting with the press, Mitterrand also denounced "the discrepancies in the president's speech" concerning the expansion of the Common Market to include Spain and Portugal.

These "discrepancies," as also "the contradiction between the speech and actual policy being adhered to" can, in his opinion, only damage France's credibility and French farmers.

Referring to the statement made by the head of state on this topic on 5 June--"It is fitting that the Community give priority rather to completing the first stage of expansion before it is capable of undertaking the next"--Mitterrand wondered why under these conditions France does not propose a project for European regulations for fruit and vegetables during this crisis period. "Why," he added, "if the French Government really wants a pause in the negotiations for expansion, does it not let the EC Commission know? The Commission is continuing negotiations as if the president of the republic had said nothing."

The PS first secretary referred to the social crisis, underlining that negotiations between social partners today should aim at two priorities: raising low wages and reducing working hours. He demanded that the government urge Parliament to vote on a law to generalize a fifth week of paid annual leave.

No Negotiations on the Left

Mitterrand then broached the question of the presidential term. "I could today solemnly call once more for a single candidacy from the left," he said. "I do not renounce this without regret; but what would be the good of persisting." After recalling that the PCF, the PSU [United Socialist Party] and the Left Radical Movement (MRG) have already chosen their own candidates for the 1981 election, the first secretary asserted that the socialist candidate "will express" the PS blueprint. He added: "This candidate will not negotiate for the rallying of groups or people who wish to present a candidate; there will be no negotiations, just the nomination of a common candidate. The socialist candidate will strive to represent the left in the second round of voting."

Talking of the possibility of his own candidacy, Mitterrand recalled that the process for nominating the socialist candidate is due to begin on 19 October. "It is a good thing that the PS has several people capable of governing France," he pointed out, before asserting that he is not "in the position of candidate" and that "it is the choice of socialists and the movement itself stemming from the PS" which will decide. He recalled that as first secretary he was "competent to intervene, to make proposals in all circumstances." "In the same way," he added, "the first secretary will still be competent in this respect when he is nominated as candidate: There will not be two authorities at the heart of the PS; there will be a doubled competence." Referring to the "serious hypothesis" that the candidate would not be himself, he said he would be the first to "show solidarity."

Mitterrand specified that, "when I say that I am not a candidate, it is because I do not need to be one in order to speak or to embody socialist ideas in France.... I remain at the disposal of the choice which the PS will make.... My wish is to be able to maintain for a little longer the authority which will allow the PS to cross the next passes, to bring its blueprint to the state level and to rally the French people."

After indicating that he will deal with this topic "at the appropriate time," Mitterrand recalled the conditions under which in 1965 he had "issued an impossible challenge" to General de Gaulle, and then in 1974 threatened Giscard d'Estaing. "I would not like to be seen as someone who is always running for election." He added: "The problem which confronts me is falsified by public opinion polls. But in the face of that there remains resolution. I will certainly show you this one day."

L'HUMANITE Criticism

[Rene Andrieu editorial: "Glaring Atlanticism"]

[Text] The striking part about F. Mitterrand's press conference was not his veiled revelations about his candidacy in the presidential election--he is "ready to act on the Socialist Party's [PS] choice"--nor his fairly short summary of his social objectives--he has abandoned the demand for retirement at 60 and seems very circumspect about the generalization of the 35 hour week demanded by the trade unions--but above all what he said about defense and major international issues.

In this sphere he was not afraid of taking up a position to the right of the presidential majority--his analysis of dictatorships and free countries seemed modeled on recent remarks made by [Union for French Democracy President] Lecanuet--and the only real criticism he leveled at Mr Giscard d'Estaing is that he has been too "flexible" or too "weak" toward the Soviet Union.

It is also significant that he stressed not the need to move toward disarmament and to condemn the policy of military blocs but to redefine and consolidate the Atlantic's mechanisms. After that his assertion that France must "remain free to make its own decisions in all circumstances" looks like wishful thinking and our country's freedom of action is likely to be reduced to almost complete approval of U.S. decisions.

It is clear that in foreign policy the PS stance is increasingly based on glaring Atlanticism, deliberately turning away from the joint program policies which were aimed at ensuring national independence within the framework of a policy of peace and nonalignment.

Although he did not definitively come out in support of the neutron bomb, specifying that the question is under discussion in his party, F. Mitterrand took care not to come out against a weapon whose adoption, whatever he says, would mean an abandonment of the deterrent strategy in favor of the graduated response and "forward battle" strategy. In this sphere, too, his thinking is that of the Pentagon and the U.S. leaders.

With regard to Europe he came out once again in favor of expanding the Community, clearly regretting that Giscard d'Estaing bowed to farmers' protests and recently gave the impression that he was hesitant to speed up the process started.

However, it is perhaps on Afghanistan that the PS first secretary demonstrated that he is anxious to somehow be in the vanguard of this forward battle against the socialist countries.

Not content to justify once again the decision to deploy U.S. missiles in Europe--a decision which, it should be recalled, predated the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan--he expressed the view that Giscard d'Estaing should not have "maintained public relations with the USSR" and accused him of weakness.

He rejected the idea of a timetable for the withdrawal of the troops which, according to him, means accepting a fait accompli. "The reply we must give," he said, "is first a condemnation of the occupation of a free country by a more powerful country and second, when the question of withdrawing is raised, we must ensure that this withdrawal is considered without conditions right from the start."

This calls for at least two remarks. The first is that F. Mitterrand refuses to envisage any political solution to the Afghan problem. The second is that when he condemns the occupation of a free country by a more powerful ounntry and mentions the need to defend the "peoples' right to determine their own future" there is reason to regret that he did not put these noble principles into practice himself when, as a French Government minister, he stated in 1954: "All those who uphold national demands in Algeria are enemies against whom we must wage war."

The difference is that the Soviets did not intervene in Afghanistan to preserve a colonial system but to support a revolutionary government.

COMMUNISTS, SOCIALISTS ARGUE OVER ECONOMIC PACKAGE

AU070910 Rome ANSA in English 0830 GMT 7 Jul 80

[Text] Rome, July 7 (ANSA)--The Italian Communist Party's (PCI) staunch opposition to the Rome government's new anticrisis measures has rekindled rival passions between the PCI and the Socialist Party (PSI). The PCI, the biggest party in the Italian political line-up that has come out against the package of economic measures, stepped up its attack this weekend and many observers saw Socialist Party coalition partners as indirectly getting the brunt of the offensive.

PCI Secretary Enrico Berlinguer stressed over the weekend that this party was not hostile to the economic package just because it was on the opposition, but because "the measures are useless and harmful. They don't halt prices, they don't assure a pick-up in production and employment and basically", Berlinguer charged, "they leave the country right where it was in the grip of inflation and recession".

The PSI was well in the reach of the Communist fire since it was one of the sponsors of the economic measures enacted last week by the Christian Democrat (DC), Republican (PRI) and Socialist Party coalition in Rome. Its response was immediate. It came from one of the PSI's so-called "young lions", Claudio Martelli, a close aide to party secretary Bettino Craxi. Martelli accused Berlinguer of "overheating the political debate" and of conducting "an antisocialist campaign" in "Prague worker's militia style". The latter was an apparent reference to an incident that occurred in Milan last Tuesday, when a leading Socialist labor official was heckled and manhandled by angry Communist workers at a rally held in conjunction with a four-hour factory strike. Martelli went on to sneer at Berlinguer's alleged about-face after the PCI's three-year experience in a "national solidarity" arrangement in which the Rome government had the broadest parliamentary support it ever had (including Communist support). "Berlinguer tried to make the unions the firemen of the crisis during 'national solidarity'", Martelli charged, "now he wants to make arsonists out of them".

For State Holdings Minister Gianni De Michelis, a Socialist, "the Communists are to blame if the left is split".

The PCI mouthpiece, L'UNITA, dismissed Martelli's remarks in a brief and sardonic editorial yesterday, calling on its readers to "judge for themselves the seriousness and objectivity" of Craxi's young follower. The Communist daily spent much more print Sunday on an effort to squelch widespread reports of a split between the PCI leadership and the head of the powerful pro-Communist "CGIL" [Italian Confederation of Labor] labor confederation, Luciano Lama. The "completely groundless" allegation was said to be the workings of a speculative anticommunist smear campaign. L'UNITA detected "an odor of regime" and asserted that there was reason to fear for the nation's freedom.

In other developments this weekend, Italy's leading labor organizations received a round of applause from Labor Minister Franco Foschi, who commended them for supporting the economic package. "(The unions) showed their ability to take part in an active solidarity plan, enhancing their independent political role as advocates of a social transformation that is compatible with democracy and a market economy" Foschi said.

DC Secretary Flamino Piccoli also remarked over the weekend about how the government's anti-inflationary move had shown that "it was possible to come to an understanding with the unions". "....serious and effective proposals for fighting Italy's economic evils" were, according to Piccoli, the meeting-ground for the government and organized labor.

SOCIALISTS, SOCIAL DEMOCRATS FORM FRONT

LD021230 Lisbon in English to Europe 2030 GMT 1 Jul 80

[Text] The Socialist Party, the Independent Social Democratic Association and the Union of the Left for Socialist Democracy have set up the Republican Socialist Front. This was formally announced yesterday in Lisbon.

In its political manifesto, the new front strongly opposes the instituting of a referendum as a means of revising the constitution, stating that this would be tantamount to a severe blow dealt against democracy.

The parties forming the coalition describe the front as an alternative to the polarization of the Portuguese society. This, they say, would merely serve either the ruling Democratic Alliance or the Communist Party. On the contrary the leaders of the front say that their chief aim is to create in Portugal a situation of dialogue and consensus which would help the country to modernize itself in a climate of peace.

At one point, the secretary general of the Portuguese Socialist Party, Dr Mario Soares, called for the resignation of Dr Sa Carneiro's government, saying that it no longer has the support of the majority. Dr Soares was referring to the fact that the reformists who make up the parliamentary majority have recently been withdrawing their support from the government on several matters.

Dr Soares said that the Republican Socialist Front is an ambitious project whose aim is to change Portugal and to set up a center-left majority which would concretize the hopes of 25 April 1974. He said one of the chief short-term goals is to win the legislative elections, to form a democratic and progressive government and to support a presidential candidate who embodies the hopes of the new regime that had emerged from the April Revolution.

For his part, the leader of the Independent Social Democratic Association, Mr Sousa Franco, said that his association has always fought for the challenge of a central bloc. Mr Sousa Franco added that the newly created front after an eventual enlargement should serve as a central bloc as advocated by General Ramalho Eanes. The Independent Social Democrat said that this is the first time in Portugal that the socialists and social democrats had reached an accord.

With regard to the presidential election, Dr Soares told reporters that talks are going on with General Ramalho Eanes, at the end of which the parties forming the Republican Socialist Front will decide on the candidate that they will support.

HAUGHEY CONSIDERS REMOVING ANTI-IRA ENVOY TO U.S.

LD071137 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 7 Jul 80 pp 1, 26

[James Allan report: "Anti-IRA Envoy May Be Moved"]

[Text] Eire's prime minister, Mr Haughey, wants to move his country's ambassador to Washington, Mr Sean Donlon, who has taken a strong stand against Irish-American groups who provide funds for the Provisional IRA.

Mr Haughey plans to see Cabinet approval to switch Mr Donlon to the United Nations at a meeting in Dublin tomorrow or Thursday.

Dr Eamon Kennedy, Irish ambassador in London since Nov 1978, is tipped as a possible replacement in a move seen as much a part of Mr Haughey's determination to rid his government of people associated with his predecessor, Mr Jack Lynch, as a reflection of his hard-line attitude on the future of Ulster.

Mr Donlon, 39, is believed to have played an instrumental role in persuading Mr Thomas 'Tip' O'Neill, speaker of the House of Representatives, to block congressional hearings on the Ulster problem.

Mr Haughey is anxious to maintain international pressure--particularly American--on Britain to involve Dublin in any solution aimed at securing peace in Northern Ireland.

He favors congressional hearings in America, even if it means embarrassing Britain.

Mr Donlon, on instructions from Mr Lynch--who was forced to stand down as prime minister last December under pressure from the hard-liners in his Fianna Fail Party--worked hard to undermine the IRA's supporters in America.

He consistently attacked the Irish National Caucus and the Irish Northern Aid Committee, both seen as front organisations and fund-raisers in America for the Provisionals.

The caucus has been campaigning for Congress to investigate Britain's policies in Northern Ireland and to examine the refusal of the State Department to allow IRA leaders to tour American cities on fund-raising visits.

America has been the IRA's most important source of funds for the purchase of arms and ammunition.

Because of his strong anti-IRA stance, the ambassador came in for severe criticism from Mr Neil Blaney, a former Eire Government minister, who claims to have helped found the Provisional IRA.

Mr Blaney, an independent MP in the European Parliament, called on Mr Haughey to dismiss Mr Donlon. So severe was his attack that Mr Lynch felt forced to make a public statement pointing out that the ambassador in Washington had been acting on his--Mr Lynch's--instructions.

Mr Blaney was dismissed by Mr Lynch in 1970 along with Mr Haughey at the time of the arms scandal. Both men were charged but cleared in court of conspiring to import arms for the IRA.

Since his appointment as prime minister seven months ago Mr Haughey has gradually sought to remove Lynch appointees or weaken their influence in Ireland's administration, and in the Fianna Fail Party.

The line being pressed by the Irish Government is that Mr Donlon's move is not demotion, but promotion to the United Nations.

Political observers in Dublin however, tend to regard the UN post as less important than the Washington one.

The Irish consul in Washington, Mr Frank Sheridan, yesterday described reports that Mr Donlon was to be moved as "unconfirmed rumours."

Mr Donlon, who has been in Washington for two years and was his country's youngest-ever appointment there, was away for the weekend and could not be reached, said Mr Sheridan.

There has been speculation in the American capital that Mr Donlon might shortly be recalled, but nothing official has yet been announced. Such a move requires the Irish Cabinet's approval.

Richard Beeston, in Washington, writes: Mr Donlon, Ireland's exceptionally able ambassador to Washington, was once described by the speaker of the House of Representatives, Mr "Tip" O'Neill, as having pulled off "one of the finest pieces of diplomacy I have ever seen on Capitol Hill."

Mr O'Neill was referring to the success that Mr Donlon achieved in enlisting the four top Irish-American leaders to discourage Americans providing aid to IRA cover organisations in the United States.

By persuading Senators Edward Kennedy and Daniel Moynihan, Governor Hugh Carey, of New York, and Representative O'Neill to unite publicly against aid for the IRA, Mr Conlon succeeded in reducing massively the amount of money reaching the IRA.

Diplomats in Washington are not surprised at reports of Mr Donlon's impending "purge."

Although a career diplomat, he was in a sense a political choice of the former Eire premier, Mr Lynch, who decided to get rid of the old-world Edwardian image of the Irish Foreign Service and appoint a man in his mid-thirties to the top diplomatic post.

Mr Donlon's problem, his diplomatic colleagues say, is that he is "not all that close" to Mr Haughey, although there was nothing in the way he handled his post that would conflict with the policies of the present Irish Government.

He is, however, too identified with the Lynch government and perhaps takes a tougher public attitude towards the IRA than the new administration likes.

In a Washington speech he said: "A great deal of support for the IRA has drifted away in the north and they needed a point somewhere else for the moral basis of their campaign.

"The obvious place to look was Irish Americans. Support in America creates for the Provos the impression that they have friends outside Ireland, even they they don't have friends at home."

Mr Donlon developed extremely good relations with Irish-American leaders.

He is also one of the most popular diplomats in Washington, a good pianist and a man who, say his colleagues, has enlivened the diplomatic scene during the past two years.

JAPANESE GOVERNMENT DENIES INVOLVEMENT IN DENKTAS VISIT

NC041111 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 4 Jul 80

[Text] The Japanese Embassy in Beirut has officially informed the Foreign Ministry of the republic that the Japanese Government was not involved in any way whatsoever in the recent visit to Japan by Turkish Cypriot leader Denktas. This is mentioned in a Cyprus Foreign Ministry statement today on the inaccurate and misleading reports in the Turkish Cypriot press on Denktas' visit. The statement adds: The Japanese Embassy has also noted that during Denktas' stay in Japan he was not received by any Japanese official and his visit to Japan took place at the invitation of the Japanese Islamic Center. The Foreign Ministry statement concludes: It is obvious that this visit by Denktas falls within the framework of his efforts to exploit Islamic feeling and mislead world public opinion with the aim of strengthening his unlawful objectives and pursuits.

CONSULAR AGREEMENT SIGNED BY VISITING POLISH OFFICIAL CZYREK

NC031234 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 3 Jul 80

[Text] A consular agreement between Cyprus and Poland was signed today at the Foreign Ministry. It was signed on behalf of Cyprus by Mr Pelayias, director general of the Foreign Ministry, and on behalf of the Polish People's Republic by Mr Czyrek, first under secretary of state at the Polish Foreign Ministry.

Following the signing of the agreement, the Polish official reaffirmed his country's firm support for a just solution of the Cyprus problem on the basis of the UN resolutions, without foreign intervention--a solution that would safeguard the sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity, unity and nonaligned status of the Cyprus Republic. He particularly stressed the need for the demilitarization of Cyprus. Mr Czyrek discussed Poland's consistent position on the Cyprus issue and stressed that his country supports the policy followed by the Cyprus Government concerning the promotion of the appropriate solution of the Cyprus problem. In conclusion, the Polish official referred to the traditional bonds of friendship and cooperation between Cyprus and Poland and expressed his satisfaction over the positive development of friendly relations between the two countries both in the bilateral field and concerning their cooperation in the international field.

Speaking after the signing of the agreement, Mr Pelayias stressed that Cyprus looks forward to the signing of more agreements between the two countries, because they would contribute to the further consolidation of the already-existing close bonds of friendship and cooperation. Mr Palayias also expressed the thanks and gratitude of the president of the republic and the Cypriot people for the stand which Poland has taken and continues to maintain toward the Cyprus cause.

Czyrek's Departure

[Text] Mr Jozef Czyrek, first under secretary of state at the Polish Foreign Ministry, has completed a 4-day official visit in Cyprus and left for Poland this afternoon. Mr Czyrek was seen off at Larnaca airport by Mr Pelayias, Foreign Ministry director general, and Mr Wieczerek, Polish charge d'affaires in Cyprus.

PAPANDREOU REPEATS DEMAND FOR MEETING ON TURKISH CONCESSIONS

AT051145 Athens EXORMISI in Greek 5 Jul 80 pp 1, 13

[Text] "We call upon the prime minister to reconsider his responsibilities and to consent to the immediate convocation of our parliament," stressed the leader of the majority opposition party and PASOK Chairman A. Papandreou yesterday in a statement to EXORMISI.

During one week, A. Papandreou publicly called upon Rallis, the country's prime minister, for the second time "to reconsider his responsibilities" and to agree to the immediate convocation of the chamber of deputies at this very critical moment for our country.

"At a time when the country's territorial integrity is in jeopardy, at a time when national sovereign rights established under the law and history are being questioned, then secret diplomacy is unacceptable."

The chairman of PASOK asked for an immediate convocation of the chamber of deputies for the first time last Sunday, (29 June 80) in a long statement which the government did not allow to be broadcast over ERT, national radio and television.

Late last Sunday night, Prime Minister Rallis replied to Papandreou and stated:

"There is no reason to convene the chamber of deputies and everything--whatever affects our national issues--has already been exhaustively dealt with during discussions on the government's policy statement."

The insistence, however, of the chairman of PASOK--over a period of barely 5 days--for a special convocation of the chamber of deputies gives a special weight to the concern of the leader of the majority opposition party. This fact--as it was natural--caused various but basically pessimistic comments within the broader range of the opposition in relation to progress in our national affairs after the NATO conference in Ankara and the consultations which the Greek foreign minister had.

The same circles further stressed that the extremely heavy charges leveled by A. Papandreou--in his first statement--against Foreign Minister Mitsotakis, that "the Greek foreign minister proceeded to nationally unacceptable concessions," must be the key to the concern expressed for the second time today by the leader of the majority opposition party.

In addition, political circles in Athens also stressed that these statements by the chairman of PASOK must certainly indicate a hardening of the majority opposition party toward the "new" government of "New Democracy" and that PASOK will not accept any handling or manipulation of our national affairs without a prior briefing of the chamber and the people.

In yesterday's statement the chairman of PASOK stressed:

"In my statement on 29 June I underlined that the Greek foreign minister proceeded to nationally unacceptable concessions in Ankara. The 'change of climate' in Greek-Turkish relations to which the foreign minister referred after his return from Ankara is only due to the fact that the Greek side clearly placed the interests of the Atlantic Alliance over and above our own national interests."

Briefing of the Chamber and the People

"In that same statement I called upon the prime minister to state whether he does or does not cover the foreign minister politically. The prime minister fully covered him.

"It is in reference to this instance of the political coverup of the actions and positions of the foreign minister by the prime minister of the country that we requested the immediate convocation of the plenum of the chamber of deputies so that both the representatives of the nation as well as the people may be informed about the handling of such delicate issues.

"The prime minister, however, rejected our request. In this way he fully shoulders the responsibility for any alteration of the status of the Aegean, a status which is internationally accepted under treaties and agreements.

Warning

"We remind the prime minister that he can undertake no commitment toward the United States and NATO or toward Turkey without the approval of the national representative body which is the only appropriate authority under the 1975 Constitution.

"At a time that the country's territorial integrity is in jeopardy, at a time when national sovereign rights established by law and history are questioned then secret diplomacy is unacceptable. For this reason we once again call upon the prime minister to reconsider his responsibilities and to consent to the immediate convocation of the chamber of deputies.

Nationally Unacceptable Concessions

In his first statement--which was not broadcast by ERT--the chairman of PASOK pointed out and condemned six points of the policy followed by the government's foreign minister in Ankara.

The test of A. Papandreou's 29 June 80 statement is as follows:

Due to the determined pressure of the United States and the other "allies"--pressures which were stressed by all the European news agencies--the Greek foreign minister made nationally unacceptable concessions in Ankara.

1. For the first time Greece accepts that Greek-Turkish dialogue should be raised to a political level. All Turkish governments, without exception, had attempted this in the past. Until now the Greek side has insisted on negotiations at the level of experts. The difference is considerable.

Dialogue at the expert level does not directly question the legal status of the Aegean. Dialogue at the political level is not confined within the limits of the legal status now in force--but on the contrary it provides the opportunity for introduction of new arrangements. This, in fact, has always been Ankara's basic goal.

2. In his interview with ERT, the Greek foreign minister stated clearly that, although the reasons which led Greece to withdraw from the military wing of NATO have not been eradicated (attila), Greece wishes to return "because we also serve a more general expediency and we consider it unacceptable that other considerations should intervene at this moment, considerations which might prevent its attachment to the military wing of NATO." Thus for the Greek foreign minister, the occupation of 40 percent of Cyprus by Attila and the 200,000 thousand Greek Cypriot refugees fall under these "other considerations" which should not prevent the strengthening of NATO's southeastern flank. In order to make the Greek position on the Cyprus issue even more lucid, the foreign minister assured his Turkish colleague that Greece seeks the development of neighborly and friendly relations with Turkey within the limits laid down by Venizelos and Ataturk.

The foreign minister forgets that Elevtherios Venizelos never sold out national sovereign rights to Turkey but that, on the contrary, he strengthened our national sovereignty over the Aegean.

"Legal Differences"

The Greek foreign minister accepted the existence of "legal differences" between Greece and Turkey in the Aegean. In this way the aggressor and the defender in the Aegean are placed on the same level and the illicit Turkish claims in the Aegean are established.

4. According to the foreign minister, Turkey is not questioning our frontiers in the Aegean, despite the frequent and provocative violation of our national airspace, despite Turkey's insistence that our airspace is 6 and not 10 miles, despite its provocative warning that it will not tolerate extention of our national sea and airspace to 12 nautical miles, an extension which is an inalienable right of our country.

Over and above the critical question of airspace, however, there is also the unacceptable violation of the Greek continental shelf in the Aegean, the active violation of the Athens FIR, Turkey's insistence that it should be given--within the limits of NATO--the control and command of the east Aegean. It is more evident than the sun that Turkey is pursuing the overthrow of the status of the Aegean--as it is established by international treaties and agreements, that Turkey questions our air, sea and undersea frontiers.

It is an unavoidable conclusion that the Greek foreign minister is distorting reality so that he can facilitate the country's return to NATO's military wing and the signing of the Greek-U.S. agreement on bases.

"Aid" to Turkey

5. According to the statements of Luns, the NATO ministerial council has agreed "on the need to furnish larger aid from NATO countries to Turkey." It is truly unthinkable that the Greek foreign minister should also agree. At a time when the mass military aid supplied by the United States and West Germany to Turkey truly destroys the balance in the Aegean, then how is it permissible for the representative of Greece to agree to a further increase in this aid?

6. According to Muskie's statement, Greece will return to NATO's military wing and the Greek-U.S. agreement on bases will be signed before the end of 1980--in other words before Greece becomes an EEC member. This is a clear confirmation of our argument that the price for our accession to the EEC is our country's reenslavement within NATO and the solution of our "differences" with Turkey within the limits of a "basic" dialogue. Should we once again stress that a basic dialogue with Turkey can only produce results when and if Greece makes concessions on its national sovereign rights? In the meantime Turkey continues to make claims--it is claiming half the Aegean.

Ankara is a milestone in the progress of both the Cyprus as well as the Aegean issues. It systematically undermines the struggle for a united, independent and demilitarized Cyprus. It also determinedly undermines the struggle for the defense of the territorial integrity of our fatherland in the Aegean.

We expect a statement from the prime minister which states whether he does or does not cover the foreign minister politically. In case of an affirmative answer, it is our intention to demand the convocation of the chamber of deputies plenum so that the national representative body and the Greek people may be informed and so that everyone can shoulder his own responsibility in the face of history and the nation.

ERKMEN COMMENTS ON MIDEAST, IRAN AT ATLANTIC TREATY MEETING

TA042116 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 4 Jul 80

[Text] Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkman said that in the current atmosphere of international tensions, NATO should implement its long-term and short-term defense plans in a more rapid and effective manner. Delivering the opening speech at the meeting on the Middle East and NATO organized by the Turkish Atlantic Treaty Association in Istanbul today, Erkmen said that Israel's hard and intransigent attitude toward issues concerning the Middle East problem is regarded as the primary obstacle to peace in the region. Erkmen also noted that the agreement reached at the Camp David summit also created a division among Arab states, which is difficult to restore. Erkmen added that Turkey attached importance to the maintenance of Iran's territorial and national integrity from the viewpoint of bilateral relations as well as from the viewpoint of insuring security and stability in the region.

SPANISH FOREIGN MINISTER SUPPORTS EEC ENTRY DURING STOPOVER

TA050538 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 4 Jul 80

[Text] Spanish Minister of Foreign Affairs Marcelino Oreja said that as countries governed by democratic regimes, Turkey, Spain and Portugal should be admitted to the EEC. Oreja stopped over in Istanbul's Yesilkoy Airport en route to Spain from the funeral in Amman of the Jordanian prime minister and met with Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen. Replying to journalists' questions at the airport, Oreja said that the expansion of the EEC through the addition of new members is, in essence, a political issue. Pointing out that the EEC is primarily a community whose members are governed by democracy, Oreja said: After discussing economic issues, the EEC should go beyond them and countries governed by democratic regimes should be allowed to join the EEC. In his statement, Erkmen said that the preparations for the international meeting to be held in Madrid on the implementation of the final document of the European security and cooperation conference were discussed during the meeting with the Spanish foreign minister. Oreja left Istanbul by air for Spain after meeting with Erkmen.

TERCUMAN SUPPORTS U-2 FLIGHTS WHICH SERVE NATIONAL INTERESTS

NC080312 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 7 Jul 80 p 4

[Article by Zafer Atay: "The U-2 Discussion Has Flared Up Again"]

[Excerpts] When in 1961 a U-2 plane, which took off from the American base in Adana under the control of pilot Gary Powers, was shot down by Soviet missiles, all hell broke loose. At first, the United States denied any knowledge of the plane. But when Khrushchev showed the foreign journalists parts of the plane and the materials seized from it, Washington had to admit the existence of the U-2. In the meantime, the country most embarrassed was Turkey. While Moscow persistently argued that the plane had taken off from Adana, Ankara was saying, "we are not aware of such a take-off." Then Powers' flight maps were exposed and this resulted in a commotion.

The U-2 issue was revived again last year. President Carter and Soviet leader Brezhnev met in Vienna and signed the Salt II agreement on strategic arms limitations. This agreement entitled both countries to establish a system whereby they could monitor the implementation of their pledges.

Just at that time, the shah was ousted from Iran and very important U.S. monitoring stations there were shut down. Washington then turned to Turkey. At that time the fate of the joint defense agreement was not yet clear. The only air control clearance possibility was for the U-2's to use Turkish air space. The United States received a strange reply from the Ecevit government on this matter. Prime Minister Ecevit had stated that Turkey would not allow the use of Turkish air space without first knowing all the details of the SALT II agreement and before the United States and the Soviet Union had reached full accord on the system of control. Moreover, the Ecevit administration made the flights conditional on Moscow's consent.

Turkey's attitude terribly annoyed some American senators who had never fully identified themselves with SALT II and who had stated that they would not approve of the agreement unless the United States had full guarantees. The invasion of Afghanistan intervened and both the SALT II and U-2 issues were shelved.

When the report prepared by a U.S. Senate committee headed by Senator Biden--which had come to Ankara last April to examine the situation on the spot--was disclosed, the U-2 affair rebounded on Turkey once again. It was stated in the report submitted to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that Turkey had abandoned the policy of seeking the Soviet Union's consent before allowing U-2 planes to take off from Turkey. The Senate committee stated in the report that Prime Minister Demirel had disclosed this to them. The U-2 affair came into the limelight in Turkey--which has for months been in the grip of so much trouble--only after the report in question was carried by foreign news agencies.

We believe that discussions on this subject between the government and the opposition will continue for some time.

SALT II is not an issue which concerns only the Soviet Union and the United States. This is an agreement which, if properly implemented, will be able to impede the arms race insanity and to avert the disasters of war in Europe, the Middle East and the Far East. SALT II is particularly important for a country like Turkey, which is an ally of the United States within NATO and a neighbor of the Soviet Union.

Naturally all this does not necessarily mean that Turkey should plunge headlong into assisting the U-2 spy planes. If it serves our national interests, U-2 planes may be permitted to take off. However, measures should be taken to prevent the repetition of the "Adana scandal." On a subject which concerns our national interests so much, Turkey, as an independent country, cannot be expected to depend on "Soviet consent."

From this point of view, the change of policy in connection with U-2 is a positive development.

TCP SECRETARY GENERAL CRITICIZES NATO MINISTERIAL MEETINGS

TA031359 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 3 Jul 80

[Turkish Communist Party Central Committee Secretary General Bilen replies to questions from the Voice of Turkish Communist Party; date and place not given--read by announcer]

[Text] [Question] The NATO ministerial council met in Ankara. Why in Ankara? What, in your view, is the real reason for this?

[Answer] Only 1 month prior to this Ankara meeting, the NATO council had convened at its headquarters in Brussels. As is known, the United States--the chief boss of NATO--pressured its other partners to deploy 573 new, heavier medium-range missiles in the heart of Europe. It insisted on the immediate implementation of this. The Ankara meeting is an extension of this attempt to intensify this aggression and tension. The meeting lasted 2 days and was held behind closed doors.

This is not all. The Pentagon is pressuring and ordering. However, its partners are approaching the nuclear hell designed by Carter very reluctantly. The plans to deploy the missiles are provoking extensive reaction from public opinion in Europe and in the world. This is one of the reasons for the Ankara meeting. Washington is trying to insure the implementation of the decisions taken in Brussels without losing time.

The other reasons for holding the meeting in Ankara are even more interesting. At every opportunity the United States and the ringleaders of NATO are stressing the special importance which they attach to Turkey for various reasons. Furthermore, the events in Turkey are not developing to the satisfaction of Carter, Luns, Muskie and Demirel. There is an increasingly expanding resistance against NATO which is spreading to the masses. This resistance is merged with the resistance against the antipeople government, against the bloody fascist terrorism, against martial law and against this tyranny based on NATO. This is clearly reflected in the continuous strikes involving tens of thousands of workers. During the NATO meetings in Ankara, there were demonstrations in various parts of the country against the harsh pressures by martial law enforcers, against NATO, and against the prolonged bilateral slavery agreements. All progressive forces as well as patriotic deputies from the left wing of the RPP participated in this campaign. The bloodstained Demirel government is shaky. Washington wishes to stop this shaking and the beginning of disintegration. The U.S. imperialists want to have at their disposal the likes of Demirel, Ozal and fascist Turkes, who act as their lackeys. The collaborationist and monopolistic bourgeoisie are in a difficult position. It is taking new steps in monopolization. It is pursuing big profits. Besides the working class, the large toiling masses in the cities and villages, the middle classes which are being more and more influenced, the non-monopolistic sector of the bourgeoisie and the sectors which are opposed to imperialism and foreign capitalists are also joining the resistance.

The NATO Ankara meeting was held in this atmosphere. How was it held? The martial law command took extraordinary measures in Ankara.

One division equipped with tanks, jets and helicopters blocked the roads and crossroads in Ankara. This single incident is sufficient to describe the situation. This (?meeting) was intended to intimidate the people. However, it exposes the fears of the NATOites, pro-Americans and the enemies of peace and freedom.

[Question] What are the other reasons for the meeting?

[Answer] There are conflicts, tensions and internal clashes within NATO itself. These conflicts and internal problems were displayed in the agenda of the meeting and in the speeches by Luns and the others. They talked about strengthening the southeast wing of NATO. Greece also attended the meeting. Greece has withdrawn from the military side of NATO. The expansionist U.S. circles wish to draw Greece back into it. This is why they want to eliminate the cold atmosphere and conflicts between Greece and Turkey, which they actually created by themselves. The U.S. imperialists are, at times, creating strife between their small partners within NATO and, at other times, they are trying to make peace between them in a bid to insure a stronger dependence and to be able to manipulate them. The U.S. imperialists are applying these tactics vis-a-vis Turkey and Greece as well.

[Question] The eastern Mediterranean area was discussed extensively during the NATO meetings in Ankara. Can you comment on that?

[Answer] These issues, the real facts, must be revealed to the public and the masses must be warned. It is the inalienable and specific duty of the Turkish Communist Party [TCP] and the communists to do that. The TRT, the sensationalist, pro-American and pro-NATO press, the collaborationist and monopolist bourgeois newspapers and propagandists are turning developments upside down and deceiving the public opinion. They are using anti-Sovietism and anticommunism for that purpose. They are trying to hide from the public the aggression of imperialism and expansionist U.S. circles and their efforts to increase tension, to speed up the arms race and to undermine peace. However, it is all in vain. The spear will not go into the hide. No matter what they do, the imperialist expansionists will not be able to hide their aggression or the plans which they are implementing against the peoples of the Near East and Middle East and against national liberation movements. The U.S. imperialists' plans have been written in blood but they smell of oil. They are plans calling for profiteering and looting. That is what they are doing against Iran. Their attempt at a military attack and their embargo were barbarous.

They are seeking revenge from the Iranian people who toppled the shah. After losing its positions, support and aggressive bases in Iran, Washington went crazy. Since then it has been trying to regain its old positions. Washington is now showing Ankara both a lead-tipped whip and dollars in order to set up new bases and new aggressive blocs and to drag Turkey into that. This was revealed once again at the NATO meeting in Ankara.

As for the discussion of the Afghanistan question at the Ankara meeting, what I have to say is short and definite. Washington, Beijing, all the reactionary forces that are the enemies of peace and national independence received a very harsh slap that stunned them. Their desire for vengeance does not let them alone.

During the recent CPSU plenum, Comrade Brezhnev talked about the situation in Afghanistan very clearly. He said: the situation in Afghanistan is returning to normal. The domestic reactionary forces and most of the big counterrevolutionary bands have been crushed, defeated. The efforts to intervene from outside were strongly defeated. Under these conditions, we have decided to withdraw part of our army troops from Afghanistan. Furthermore, Comrade Brezhnev added that the Soviet Union would continue to help Afghanistan for the survival and development of the Afghan revolution.

The Soviet Union ran to the aid of the Afghan people. It defended the Afghan revolution and that country's sovereignty, national independence and territorial integrity. By doing that, it defended peace. The TCP has always supported and will continue to support the Soviet Union's Leninist policies and its efforts to insure long-lasting peace and security in the world and in our region and its efforts for detente and disarmament.

Our party will never renounce its policy of leading our people to a more active and continuous struggle against NATO, the bilateral slavery agreement, the bases and nuclear arsenals and against imperialism's moves to increase armament and the tension.

VOTCP ATTRIBUTES VOTE OF CONFIDENCE TO 'IMPERIALISTS'

TA031345 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 3 Jul 80

[Unattributed and untitled commentary on the vote of confidence for the government]

[Excerpts] The National Assembly has voted on the interpellation proposed by the RPP. Through the support of the NSP, the government has temporarily been saved from toppling. This was not an unexpected result.

The developments since the proposal for the interpellation have demonstrated that, in actual fact, the parliamentary majority needed to topple the Demirel government is emerging. Despite all their internal strife and the differences of opinion between them, the views of the RPP and the NSP are becoming increasingly closer on the issue of toppling the government. The voting on the interpellation does not change this fact.

Why was the Demirel government, which is detested by the people and which is dragging the country toward an abyss and utters threats of civil war, not toppled by the parliament? It would be enlightening to ponder over the reasons for this. The NATO ministerial council meeting was being held in Ankara when the interpellation motion for the government was placed on the agenda of the assembly. It is evident that NATO chiefs discussed during this meeting the measures necessary to have Turkey adjust its political stance to their own satisfaction.

Primarily U.S. and West German monopolies have always supported the Demirel government. The fact that Demirel gave assurances that the government would not be toppled--during his meeting with the Carter administration's Muskie--constitutes proof that U.S. circles want the government to stay in power. The FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE 2 days ago expressed the views of the West German monopolies, when it reported that the Schmidt administration was hoping that a government including the RPP would replace the Demirel government. The paper noted that it regards this to be contrary to the interests of the FRG.

It is clear that imperialist countries expressed their support for the Demirel government before the interpellation and this was reflected in the votes cast in the parliament. However, this result is not connected with the pressures of NATO alone. Both the leaders of the RPP and the NSP were, no doubt, aware that such pressures would be applied. When they proposed the interpellation, they did not really exert serious efforts to topple the government.

As is known, the indecision of the RPP administration on this subject was displayed even when the interpellation was being discussed during the RPP parliamentary group meetings. The interpellation became a subject of conflict among the RPP factions. A large section regarded the motion as untimely and feared a government crisis. Moreover, the aim of the motion was not clear. Ecevit refrained from making definite statements concerning the kind of solution envisaged in the wake of the interpellation.

Parliamentary calculations showed that the interpellation could not yield any results without the support of the NSP. However, apart from a few so-called moves, the RPP administrators did not exert serious efforts in a bid to insure NSP's support for the motion.

Speaking after the voting which followed the interpellation, Prime Minister Demirel announced that the parliament has confidence in the government. Does this confidence really exist? NSP leaders have, for days, been declaring that they do not have confidence in the government. If so, how did the government receive a vote of confidence from the parliament? The contradictory fact behind this is that the Demirel government is not based on the parliament. In reality, the Demirel government is based on forces outside the parliament--on the most pro-American and militarist circles within the army, on NATO and on the armed terrorist organizations of the fascist Nationalist Action Party [NAP]. The parliament is under the definite pressure of these forces. The fear of actually toppling the government originates from this. Both the leaders of the NSP and the RPP are afraid of the shadow cast by fascism. This is one of the reasons why they cannot risk the government crisis which will ensue.

Dear listeners: The current balance of power does not and will not allow the anti-government majority within the parliament to play a decisive role. Under these circumstances, it is impossible to halt the existing antipeople course of events without opposing the reactionary fascist forces through the people's democratic and revolutionary forces in the streets, in the factories, in the market places and in the cities and villages and without realizing the democratic unity of action of millions of people, including all the members of the RPP and the NSP. This is why, as noted in the Turkish Communist Party Central Committee statement of 19 June, the real situation should be clearly explained to the masses. Organized struggle is the only key to salvation. All the national democratic forces should unite against the antipeople policy of the Demirel government.

NSP LEADER ERBAKAN CITES NEED FOR EARLY ELECTIONS

[Text] National Salvation Party leader Necmettin Erbakan has said that early elections in October would be imperative unless during the next 5 weeks the president is elected, preparations regarding the formation of a national solution restoration government are concluded and bills on social issues are passed. In a press conference in Gaziantep, Erbakan said: The parliament should not take a [summer] recess under the circumstances. It should work day and night in the next 5 weeks in order to perform the following three tasks: Elect a president who believes in a national solution government, conclude preparations for the establishment of a national solution restoration government and all bills concerning social problems should be immediately passed by parliament. If these three important issues are not resolved during the next 5 weeks, then, it will be imperative to hold early elections on 15 October.

Erbakan noted that encouraged by the partisan stand of the Justice Party administrators, violence was escalating and the damage was increasing after the government secured a confidence vote. Recalling that incidents in Corum were the result of provocations, Erbakan said that the necessary lessons should be taken from these grave incidents. Erbakan added that the Corum incidents were proof of how a Justice Party government would lead the country to disaster.

Reiterating the significance of the next 5-week period, Erbakan said that the parliament should act in a responsible way to prevent the grave incidents occurring in the country from leading to a social explosion. Erbakan concluded by saying that the excessive printing of money by the government was the cause of the high cost of living and that interest charged to small shopowners, industrialists and businessmen for loans was exorbitant compared with other countries.

CAGLAYANGIL, ECEVIT MEET TO DISCUSS APPOINTMENT OF SENATORS

[Text] Acting President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil has met with RPP leader Bulent Ecevit for an hour and 20 minutes. In a statement after the meeting, Ecevit said that he had requested the meeting. Noting that the nonappointment of the senators from the Presidential Quota Group cannot be considered a violation of the Constitution, Ecevit added that he had requested that Caglayangil not make the appointments in question in a bid to avoid new crises. Ecevit said that he had informed Caglayangil of his concern regarding the 4-month failure to elect a president and that he had asked him to find grounds for conciliation among the political parties. Ecevit added that he had also told Caglayangil that if he intends to make such a move it would be more democratic to make it before appointing the senators.

According to the statement made by Ecevit, Caglayangil replied as follows: I will refrain from making a move which might create the impression that an acting president can exercise certain presidential authorities while he cannot exercise others. Even if not appointing the senators from the Presidential Quota Group is not a violation of the Constitution, appointing them is more suitable for a president. However, while fulfilling this duty I will express sensitivity and care and not fanaticism.

POLITICAL PARTIES, GOVERNMENT EXCHANGE CHARGES OVER CORUM

RPP Statement

TA051749 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 5 Jul 80

[Text] An RPP delegation has gone to Corum to investigate the incidents there. An announcement by the RPP leadership says: We will announce our views on the developments after obtaining information and making on the spot observations.

The statement says that the main reason behind the Corum incidents is the provocations being made throughout the country with a view to making the people fight each other. It points out that even though the incidents began several days ago, the state has not yet established the necessary effectiveness or brought the situation under control. The statement says: The fact that the prime minister said there was a connection between the interpellation and the incidents in Corum and Sivas is the greatest provocation of them all. By talking about such a connection, the prime minister has clearly implied that if there are efforts to topple the government then the actions of the militants supporting the government will not be able to be prevented. The prime minister thus absolved the militants of any crimes.

The RPP leadership statement calls on all citizens both in Corum and in the rest of the country not to be carried away by the provocations of those who want to divide and destroy the nation.

Erbakan Cable to Demirel

TA051750 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 5 Jul 80

[Text] NSP leader Necmettin Erbakan has said that the incidents in Corum must be handled with determination. In a cable he sent to Prime Minister Demirel, Erbakan said measures must be taken impartially to prevent the incidents from reaching graver dimensions.

Ecevit Accusation of Partiality

TA071754 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 7 Jul 80

[Text] RPP leader Bulent Ecevit said that the government was biased regarding the Corum incidents, that it sided with one of the parties and that it tried to conceal the offenses committed by that party. At a news conference in parliament, Ecevit said that adequate measures were not taken in Corum despite the fact that the incidents were expected and that there was no excuse for the inadequate state measures. Noting that the incidents erupted with a provocation based on religious exploitation and that it was the result of a premeditated plot, Ecevit added that the state was impotent in Corum until the military units intervened. Pointing out that the assailants not only wounded and murdered people, but they also subjected them to incredible tortures, Ecevit said: Although it is a known fact that rightist militants started the incidents and that they were the perpetrators of provocative rumors, the spokesmen of the ruling party insistently ignored this fact and concealed it from the public. They are trying to conceal the realities under the pretext of a communist danger.

Ecevit said that various statements made by the prime minister were provocative. Noting that an inexperienced acting governor was appointed to Corum despite the awareness of the complexity of the situation, Ecevit added that many of the policemen in the region are politicized. He added: It is apparent that certain circles that wish to conceal their obscure aims under the guise of nationalism or religion are exerting efforts to transform Turkey into another Vietnam, Korea or Yemen and are also involved--consciously or unconsciously--in certain foreign plots. Noting that for some time the Middle East has become the target of multilateral divisionist efforts and that sectarian and ethnic secessionism is being instigated by various circles, Ecevit said: Such provocations in Turkey, especially due to various political calculations, reflect a very irresponsible attitude. Sowing seeds of enmity among the citizens, spreading provocative rumors and instigating them to massacre at a time when we most need national unity and peace is incompatible with nationalism and religion.

Ecevit said that the nation was facing civil war and secessionism. Pointing out that the commonsense of the people and its resistance to provocation would deal with the danger we are facing, Ecevit concluded by saying: The people are not responsible for the incidents in Corum. Various provocateurs with obscure aims are responsible for the incidents. The RPP will continue to closely follow the developments in Corum and will exert every effort to secure and strengthen national unity in Corum and in the whole country and to restore domestic peace in Turkey.

JP Deputy's Response

TA071808 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 7 Jul 80

[Text] JP deputy leader Yigit Koker said that the Corum incidents are being investigated by independent judicial organs and that it is erroneous to express views on the issue. In a written statement in Ankara, Koker criticized the fact that RPP leader Bulent Ecevit expressed his views on the Corum incidents at a news conference today. Koker said that RPP parliamentarians were discriminating against Turkish citizens by identifying them as progressives or reactionaries, that they were instigating sectarian discrimination at assembly rostrums through their group spokesman and that they were supporting anarchists and communists. He added: Ecevit, who instigates fraternal strife among citizens while talking about genocide, who released street bandits condemned by independent judicial organs through the amnesty bill he enacted in 1974, who in 1979 claimed that no one could any longer talk about anarchy and terror and who currently complains about anarchy and terror, has no right to complain about anyone else. Turkey will not become another Vietnam, Korea or Yemen as Ecevit claims. Koker concluded by saying that the Turkish Republic, the borders of which were drawn in accordance with the national pact, will live forever.

LEBANESE FOREIGN MINISTER ARRIVES ON OFFICIAL VISIT

[Summary] Fu'ad Butrus, Lebanese foreign minister and deputy prime minister, arrived in Vienna for an official visit on 7 July, accompanied by his wife and high-ranking diplomats. The guests were welcomed at Vienna-Schwechat Airport by Foreign Minister Pahr.

In the afternoon there were working talks with Chancellor Kreisky at the chancellery. In the evening Foreign Minister Pahr gave a dinner for the guests at Pallavicini Palace.

Butrus Interview

AU080945 Vienna Domestic Service in German 0520 GMT 8 Jul 80

[Harry Sichrowsky interview with Lebanese Foreign Minister Fu'ad Butrus in Vienna on 7 July 1980--recorded; answers in English with German translation superimposed]

[Text] [Question] Mr Foreign Minister, what is the purpose of your visit to Vienna, and what were the main points of your talks with Chancellor Kreisky?

[Answer] My visit to Vienna is in the framework of my endeavors to acquaint myself with the views of foreign statesmen about the Middle East crisis and its effect on Lebanon, and to find out what can be done to come closer to a solution. My talk with the chancellor is part of these efforts, and I found that Dr Kreisky is aware of the difficult situation prevailing in our region, and especially of the circumstances in which the Palestinian people have suffered injustice. The chancellor was highly interested in hearing about the progress of the endeavors with the aid of the PLO to provide a homeland for the Palestinians, and he was also interested in learning exactly what's happening in Lebanon, whose problems are linked to the crisis of the Middle East.

[Question] What exactly is your government's position on the Palestine-Israel question, on the autonomy talks between Israel and Egypt, and on the PLO's role?

[Answer] You know that Lebanon attended the summit meeting in Bagdad after the opening of the Camp David talks and that Lebanon objected to the talks because we are of the opinion that they are not appropriate to bring about a solution of the problem of the Palestinians. We maintain this position, and we also feel that since the Rabat meeting and summit that the PLO is entitled to speak on behalf of the Palestinian people.

[Question] What can you tell us about the situation in you own country, in Lebanon?

[Answer] As you know, the situation in Lebanon has been very difficult for about the past 5 years, as a result of many factors: the Middle East crisis, the Israeli attacks on Lebanon, the presence of a large number of armed Palestinians, and other confrontations within Lebanon which are caused by differences of opinion within the Arab camp, as well as differences and power interests of the big powers in this region. So the situation in Lebanon is not very stable although it has recently improved very much. Sometimes there are some clashes here and there, but they are limited and authorities and parties in Lebanon are taking many steps to improve the situation in the future.

[Question] What possibility do you see for solving the problem of the Christian state within a state under Major Haddad?

[Answer] The idea of a state in south Lebanon under Major Haddad is nonsense. It is something not even worth discussing.

POSSIBLE SUPPLIES OF SOVIET NATURAL GAS FROM 1985

[F.D.B. report: "Belgium May Receive Soviet Gas in 1985"]

[Text] As from 1985 Belgium could receive 5 billion cubic meters of Soviet natural gas. Indeed contacts were set up some time ago between Distrigaz and Soyuzgazeksport, which already has a contract with a European consortium led by the German Ruhrgas Company.

At present the USSR supplies 25 billion cubic meters of gas per year to the FRG, Austria, France and Italy. This amount could be increased to 65 billion cubic meters and hence, thanks to an extension of the gas pipeline network, would be able to supply Belgium and the Netherlands. The operation headed by Ruhrgas, whose network carries the Soviet gas, would give rise to a vast East-West trade contract and to infrastructure investments for which European technology would be used. Final negotiations on doubling Soviet supplies are expected to start during Chancellor Schmidt's visit to Moscow.

For Distrigaz, the possible purchase of Russian gas is part of attempts to diversify and extend its supply sources. This is being done with a view to replacing Dutch gas, which covers 85 percent of our needs and supplies of which will end in 1992. The mixed company which has the monopoly of natural gas purchases can, of course, count on the 2.7 billion cubic meters of Ekofisk gas which have been supplied since 1978, on the 5 billion cubic meters of Algerian gas which should be imported from 1983 and perhaps on 1 billion cubic meters of Nigerian gas, whose purchase has already been agreed in a draft agreement within the framework of an international consortium; but it still has to fill the gap left by the loss of 10 billion cubic meters of Dutch gas in the next decade. The signing of a 20-year contract with the USSR is therefore naturally part of Distrigaz' hopes and it will be involved in the negotiations carried out by its European partners with the Soviet authorities.

SOCIALIST LEADER ON EUROMISSILES, NEED FOR TALKS WITH USSR

LD041431 Brussels LE SOIR in French 26 Jun 80 p 3

[Jacques van Hoorebeke interview with Belgian Socialist Party (Flemish Speaking) President Karel van Miert: "Loyal but Not Servile Partner"; date and place of interview not given]

[Text] A few months ago Belgian Socialist Party (Flemish Speaking) [BSP] President Karel van Miert came out strongly against the government's decision to deploy medium-range nuclear missiles in Belgium. Despite events in Afghanistan and criticism from NATO and our alliance partners, the BSP president is, as can be seen from the following, still standing strongly by his stance and ruling out any possibility of a government with BSP support in the near future.

[Question] Do you still think that the deployment of Eurostrategic weapons on Benelux territory is harmful to what remains of the spirit of detente?

[Answer] I still have very good reasons for continuing to exert pressure for a return not only to the spirit but also the practice of detente, which formerly led to the SALT I and II agreements. In this connection I have just read a recent statement Cyrus Vance made in Cambridge, Massachusetts. The former U.S. secretary of state clearly said that his country should still ratify the SALT II treaty with the Soviet Union this year and that it is vital to resume the interrupted negotiations, otherwise there is a serious danger that the world will be even less secure than it now is by the nineties. I was very struck by these remarks, which are a cry from the heart. Moreover I observe the same state of mind in Chancellor Schmidt's recent reactions.

[Question] So you still believe that before taking any decision on this subject we must sit down with the Soviets, "without daggers drawn" as you said last November?

[Answer] Yes, I am still of that opinion. Moreover it is an illusion to think that there would be no reaction from the other side if we make a decision. The root of the problem must be discussed seriously instead of launching into a dangerous confrontation which is bound to lead to a mad nuclear race. Our position, however, does not prevent us from responding energetically to the Soviet Union when it talks of deploying its SS-20 missiles and the new weapons it envisages deploying in the satellite countries. We want to prevent an escalation in armaments at any cost.

[Question] Might you go so far as to advocate that Belgium should leave the Atlantic alliance?

[Answer] Contrary to what some people claim, notably in the French-speaking press, we have never called the Atlantic alliance into question. However, as a sovereign country we also demand the right to say what we think for all to hear. It is possible to be a loyal partner without being servile.

[Question] Haven't events in Afghanistan led you to change your attitude?

[Answer] It is essential to draw a distinction here as Bruno Kreisky recently did. The Russians' coup in Afghanistan dates from 2 years ago. It was then that the country fell into the Soviet sphere of influence and at that time there was virtually no reaction. In saying that, I do not wish to justify the Soviet Union's attitude, which is absolutely indefensible. The USSR has demonstrated deep immorality and imperialist designs. Its brutal intervention has probably jeopardized many things. However, that should not prevent us from exerting a number of pressures. I personally refuse to visit the Soviet Union while the Russians remain in Afghanistan. I was invited to go there just a few weeks ago. Schmidt's trip takes place at the end of this month. After that meeting I will meet with the SPD leaders in Bonn. After that there is the Madrid conference in the fall.

[Question] Practically speaking, what means do you have at your disposal for exerting the pressure you mention?

[Answer] We have not been able to prevent NATO building the missiles. There are only two countries which have not yet agreed to deploy them. The Belgian Government has until the end of 1981 to take a decision. However, there is one thing which we cannot tolerate: Luns' approach to the prime minister. This is clearly interference in a country's internal affairs. This is not very correct behavior, especially since Belgium has made considerable efforts in the armaments sphere. Our country has no need to be ashamed on this score. Luns' approaches are unacceptable. They are provocations.

Since we have until the end of 1981 let us use this time to evaluate, in particular, the results of Schmidt's visit, the results of the Madrid conference, the Belgian Government's own investigations and other initiatives. We should review the whole question. Just suppose SALT II were meanwhile ratified and the Afghanistan affair on the way to a solution. In that case it would be easier to reopen real negotiations.

ZAMBIAN PREMIER DISCUSSES COOPERATION AT COPENHAGEN TALKS

LD081019 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 1 Jul 80 p 11

[Unattributed report: "Possible Danish Investment in Zambian Coal"]

[Text] Denmark is to look into the possibilities of investing in coal-mining activities in Zambia.

This was announced by Prime Minister Anker Joergensen on Monday after a meeting at Marienborg with Zambian Prime Minister Daniel W. Lisulo.

Anker Joergensen said that Zambia has offered Denmark coal, if Denmark is interested in taking part in investment in an expansion program.

However, at the moment there are considerable difficulties in transporting not only coal but also other goods out of Zambia, since the only operative railroad to coastal ports goes south through Zimbabwe to South Africa.

In the past Denmark has given 10 million kroner toward the improvement of the Zambian transportation system.

This inadequate transportation system was one of the problems that the Zambian prime minister pointed to as one of the most urgent after the Marienborg meeting on Monday.

At the meeting between Daniel W. Lisulo, Prime Minister Anker Joergensen and Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen, South Africa, the North-South dialogue and the bilateral aid cooperation between Denmark and Zambia were discussed.

The Zambian prime minister arrived in Copenhagen on Monday and will tour Jutland in the next 3 days.

REPORT OF FRENCH FOREIGN LEGION ACTION IN SURINAME REFUTED

Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 3 Jul 80 p 1

[Frans van Klaveren report]

[Text] Paramaribo, 3 July--Less than 2 months ago Dutch and French authorities agreed that in case of an unexpected emergency situation in Suriname the French Foreign Legion, stationed in French Guyana, with the help of helicopters would come to the rescue of the several thousand Dutchmen in Suriname. This information originated in the entourage of Minister Without Portfolio for Foreign Aid Jan de Koning.

According to the Foreign Ministry spokesman in The Hague, the report is "utter nonsense": 3,851 Dutchmen are still in Suriname, 2,826 of them in Paramaribo. "It is unthinkable that we should ask a foreign government to cross the border into Suriname to protect Dutch citizens," said the spokesman.

GISCARD VISIT CONTINUES; FURTHER TALKS HELD

LD081036 Hamburg DPA in German 1005 GMT 8 Jul 80

[Text] Baden-Baden--On the 2nd day of his state visit, French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing met Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt at the French troop training area of Puysegur near Rastatt, where they watched a parade of French troops. They then drove to the headquarters of the French forces in Germany in Baden-Baden to review a parade of German and French troops. Giscard had a confidential political talk with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher this morning. A Foreign Ministry spokesman said that they had discussed questions of European unity and the state of East-West relations. Observers assume that Genscher briefed Giscard on the talks with the Moscow leadership.

Giscard, Schmidt Stress Friendship

LD081252 Hamburg DPA in German 1204 GMT 8 Jul 80

[Excerpts] Baden-Baden--French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing and Chancellor Helmut Schmidt underlined the importance of French-German friendship by reviewing a parade of German and French troops in Baden-Baden today. Before this, in an appeal to youth, Giscard had said that the parade of German and French troops testified to the trusting and friendly cooperation which is taking place between the lower ranks as well as between the commanders of the two armed forces. Chancellor Schmidt emphasized that Germans and Frenchmen, each in their own way, are making their contribution to the military balance between West and East as an indispensable condition for cooperation and peace in Europe. "Our cooperation in the sphere of defense is part of the much wider-ranging French-German cooperation as set out in the Elysee treaty." Important advances for European contributions to peace, security and prosperity in the world have emanated from the cooperation between the two countries. "This will also be the case in the future," Schmidt added.

To general surprise, the chancellor then addressed the soldiers in French, expressing his conference that this friendship would continue to be fruitful for Europe and the world. After these final words, which were spoken with a slight English accent, Giscard smiled at the chancellor, obviously pleased that not only he but Schmidt, too, had learned the other's language.

GOVERNMENT SPOKESMAN DENIES DIE WELT REPORT ON MOSCOW TALKS

[Excerpt] Bonn--The Federal Government sees a "dishonest intention" behind the publication in the daily DIE WELT of allegedly secret details of the talks held in Moscow by Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher. Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling today told journalists that the minutes published by the paper were not the "official valid protocols of the German delegation." The Federal Government has already conducted "very thorough investigations" as to the source of the report and will do everything to clear up the indiscretion which was only designed to harm the Federal Government's reputation.

The government spokesman emphasized strongly that the (?government) did not have the slighest reason to "suppress anything." Before their Moscow trip the chancellor and the foreign minister had clearly set out the German position and afterward informed the German public as well as the Allies of all the essential points of the Moscow talks. Moreover, Foreign Minister Genscher was prepared to give additional information to the Bundestag Foreign Affairs Committee.

STRAUSS RESPONSE TO GOVERNMENT STATEMENT ON USSR TRIP

DW031625 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 0742 GMT 3 Jul 80

[Speech by Franz Josef Strauss, CDU/CSU chancellor candidate and Bavarian minister-president, to the Bundestag in Bonn in the debate following the government statement by Chancellor Schmidt--live]

[Excerpts] Mr President, esteemed ladies and gentlemen: The chancellor at the end of his speech came out with the subjective statement that in his and the foreign minister's view the objective of the trip [to Moscow] was met. It is hard for me to imagine, in view of the previous history of this visit to boot, that he could have made a statement to the contrary. [applause]

But there will be many thoughtful people and people aware of history in our country, in the countries of our alliance partners and in other countries who will not agree with this finding. But it is difficult indeed to define the objective of the trip, for originally it was justified with the intention to enter into the dialogue again, to wring from the Soviet Union the withdrawal of its troops from Afghanistan, to achieve the beginning of the solution of problems through Soviet concessions on the basis of one's own proposals on the issue of the arms balance, on the issue of medium-range missiles.

All that is left of this is that it was a good thing to have talked with each other, because in this context one cannot talk of any treatment of the issues. Having heard this statement I cannot but wonder why we heard those cryptic hints Tuesday night about sensational proposals from the Soviet side in connection with medium-range missiles, proposals which allegedly were so secret that they first had to be conveyed to the Allies through special courier Hans-Dietrich Genscher before they could be released to the amazed public. To go by what we have now heard from the chancellor about the Soviet return offer concerning his proposal, all I can say is that one need not be an expert to state that this is old hat. [applause, commotion]

Colleague Wehner says that we should wait for the answer from the United States. Well, it is not the practice in the alliance to come out with a deprecatory assessment of the reports of an alliance partner following a visit which least of all had been welcomed by the Americans and their political leadership. I have never heard any international suggestions for which the response was not that it was constructive and that it would be examined with due care. After all, this is but part of the ceremony putting some sense into the nonsensical but not too serious political disputes. [applause]

If the chancellor meant to say that no direct harm was done, then I would agree with him. Yet what matters is not just direct, recognizable harm on the surface; what matters is the long-term psychological and political effects of such developments.

The government statement was just as poor as the treatment of the problems indicated therein was superficial. I cannot but wonder why it was not possible to make the contents of this government statement available to us at least 1 hour in advance. We heard yesterday that continuous consultations with the Allies were in progress. This morning a conference was reportedly scheduled for 0800 at which the last touches were to be put on the government statement. It is remarkable for the working style and the mutual confidence within this Cabinet that these platitudes, these superficial utterances, had to be announced to the amazed Cabinet members this morning at 0800. [applause]

If the chancellor says that circumspect action is indicated, then who would object? But did Chamberlain and Daladier at the time not claim circumspect action for themselves? [applause]

I do not want to directly liken Helmut Schmidt's role in Moscow to that of Chamberlain and Daladier in Munich. I do not use false historical comparisons such as that in 1980 we are in a situation similar to that in 1914 shortly before the outbreak of World War I. All I can say, Mr Chancellor, is that I do not deny you the desire to be circumspect. [laughter] Yet I do deny that you have the instinct to comprehend what course of action would be required by circumspectness at the proper time. [applause]

Allow me to make a comparison in connection with this journey. [commotion] There are two trips by incumbent German chancellors to Moscow which have elicited special attention, met with worldwide attention and were watched with special care. One of them was the Moscow trip of Konrad Adenauer which was sensational under the then prevailing circumstances in 1955, the other was that undertaken by incumbent Chancellor Schmidt in 1980. Adenauer's visit, and I would like to devote only a brief passage to it, may be considered necessary and proper. He had railroaded through with his parliamentary majority incorporation into the party the entry of the Federal Republic of Germany in the Bundeswehr [as heard], and then came the purposeful, careful, gentle arrangement of relations with Moscow: gentle, circumspect, careful and purposeful. The result was the establishment of diplomatic relations, the release of prisoners of war. Adenauer's trip was just as necessary and useful as Schmidt's trip was superfluous and dangerous. [applause, shouts]

Schmidt's trip in 1980 was undertaken against the background of an endangered alliance, as a unilateral action and without a mandate from the alliance partners. [commotion] And if I take the liberty of passing critical judgment on this visit by the criteria of concept, previous history, background, stage setting and timing, then I do so, last but not least, because the timing of this trip was just as devoid of instinct as was the visit by the same politician to Prague on 21 August 1969, a year after the invasion of Prague by the Warsaw Pact troops. [applause] At that time it took 1 year. In the meantime, half a year is enough between the invasion of Afghanistan by the Russian troops with its brutal consequences of genocide in entire regions and the stage setting for this journey and its poor results.

A world crisis is the scene in which this trip took place. The world crisis did not occur as a crisis which cannot be prevented by human force and therefore was triggered by superior powers. The world crisis is not a world crisis but an act of brutal Soviet power policy, an expansion of Soviet control making the internal system toe the line in a country which to claim constituted a threat to the Soviet Union is an insult to the world and to contemporary history. [applause]

Let us not gloss over the fact that at the time of the Adenauer trip the alliance was in a state of consolidation, progress and full working capability, that the alliance this year, and not without the essential fault of European statesmen headed by Helmut Schmidt--if I may be allowed to use this designation as expressive of a post--s in a state which neutral quarters call decaying. The question is not whether verbal avowals of the alliance are made, whether one stresses allegiance to the alliance, confidence in one's partners, readiness to live up to the alliance commitments, outraged rejection about showing any lack of solidarity. This is not decisive. No alliance is stronger than the confidence of the alliance partners in each other and the psychological and political readiness to assume all burdens and consequences from this alliance and not just to claim its advantages. In that respect things look different, unfortunately. [applause]

It was to be expected that every official government beautician would be busy day and night turning this trip into a success. But this does not withstand critical judgment. The trip was premature, to say the least, as long as Moscow did not give the least honest signal concerning the settlement of the Afghanistan conflict. [applause]

The trip also weakened the West's will for resistance and its cohesion owing to the fact that it did take place and because of the timing as well as owing to the initiative by one alliance partner whom this role would not have been assigned to and who was allowed to claim it. The trip also encourages Moscow to retain the gains it achieved in its position. [appaluse] The trip and the moratorium offers made by Helmut Schmidt regarding the implementation of the arms gap closure decision were plainly rejected in Moscow despite their weakness and despite the unilateral preference they give to the Soviet position. This is a provisional assessment.

Who gave birth to the term "difference of interests," substantiating it with dangerous arguments? It was Helmut Schmidt and nobody else. He said in America that there are 16 million hostages in Germany which have to be considered--well, the GDR has 17 million inhabitants--they are not 17 million hostages but 17 million accusers stating that the spirit of Helsinki has not yet reached the communist sphere of power. [applause]

The U.S. President had no alternative in this situation, in view of Helmut Schmidt's dinner speech about which the Soviet people were not informed due to censorship, but to give his okay to this trip which he did not want to take place, for which he did not give his mandate, which he and his advisors assessed very sceptically [shouts, commotion]. You are so disoriented that you do not even agree when I repeat what your chancellor, Helmut Schmidt, himself said in Venice about his trip. [applause] May I repeat that here or there in the West and in the United States one was prepared for worse. That did not happen, but the purpose for a trip is not that the worst did not happen. The proposals he brought with him, which I will discuss later, have been long known in the United States. They are the known tricks in which parts that do not belong together are to be tied together in a negotiation package at disarmament talks, aimed at codifying internationally the Soviet goal of preserving and safeguarding Soviet strategic superiority on European territory. [applause]

The bad thing is that you as the government party in your election campaign obsession do not have the intellectual ability any more to view such things with the necessary criticism in such a situation. [applause, shouts] It is pure naivete, even if it was uttered by a former federal chancellor. [shouts]

TIME carried an article which was termed in a NEUE ZUERCHER ZEITUNG report a Capuchin sermon which was a clear description of the problem. It reads: Washington was certainly wrong in having all their suspicions with regard to the medium-range missiles affair. But the West Europe policy since Afghanistan has been aimed at calming down the Soviets, which for some Americans is appeasement policy, a policy of adaption and calming down. This has nothing to do with what the Europeans owe to the Americans, it was said there and that is correct. One should not discuss that at all, it was said there. It is a matter of what Europe owes itself.

Part of that diction is the shameful tug-of-war, the miserable and shameful dance of the veils, the yes or no with regard to participation in the Olympic games.

I was always against hiding behind the back of the Americans--as was Colleague Helmut Kohl--and against speaking of a pact of solidarity of friendship. We must have our own moral values. He who speaks of human rights, who acts and talks like that with regard to participation in the Moscow Olympics, demonstrates that he has a split moral code. [applause, shouts of phooey]

And it further says: The question is whether this will serve the properly assessed interests of Europe, and it goes on: No, this is certainly not the case.

What you have done does not serve the properly assessed interests of Europe. It serves election policy advantages and the short-term pseudo gains you wanted to achieve and not long-term advantages. [applause]

It ought to be taken seriously if as it says in the same publication: If the policy continues in this direction, America might feel in the mood to say: To hell with them. American isolationism which has been gone for a long time may indeed some day come to the surface again. There are some signs already indicating this development.

President Carter's security adviser said in connection with this visit: Schmidt does not seriously want to discuss in the Kremlin the aftereffects of Afghanistan nor a real balance of armament between the two military blocs. Schmidt's conviction that detente is divisible seems to be definite, despite our appeal. Schmidt wants to achieve a conciliation of interests between Europe and the Soviet Union which seems imaginary to us.

This is the problem. It is not a matter of conciliation of interests, be it with regard to Afghanistan or the arms balance between Europe and the Soviet Union. Involved is a conciliation of interests between the two big powers. Involved is the fact that the security interests of the European part of NATO--separated by the Atlantic from America--must not be detached. This and nothing else is involved. [applause]

You know that your and our common old friend, Henry Kissinger, has voiced a more and more critical opinion on this in the past weeks and months. You have said that Mr Genscher has learned from Mr Gromyko in Vienna that one does not plan to separate the European allies, the Europeans, from the Americans. Ladies and gentlemen, can you imagine that the Russian foreign minister could have said the opposite? Can one imagine that he would use his language to express his real opinion or intentions? He who believes such statements demonstrates a naive and simple judgement which becomes the more dangerous, the higher the rank and the power position of the one who accepted these naive structures of thinking. [applause]

On 31 January you wrote a letter to Brezhnev. I don't know how, but when I was watching the television program yesterday, I noted that the letters which so far have been kept from us, which have been treated as state secrets, have been carried now in the form of excerpts in a television program and that some news agencies obviously have gotten hold of them.

So I know the text of the letter you have written to General Secretary Brezhnev. I do not demand that you, Mr Federal Chancellor, although the Afghanistan events had begun 5 weeks ago at that time and although brutal developments were in full swing--which they still are--that you should violate the rules of international language, formulating the letter in the proper terms of moral disgust. I do not demand that. You have repeated your greetings and your good wishes which your ambassador had extended. That belongs to the international code.

Much more informative is Mr Brezhnev's answer. I will abstain from commenting on it. I ask you just to assess the text which the agencies obviously have now. Brezhnev said in his answer to the letter of 31 January--which arrived in March--that our opinions on the present situation are different in many ways. I had reason enough repeatedly--he writes--to comment on the true reasons that presently complicate the international situation and the breakdowns hampering the functioning of the detente mechanism. You know yourself that they did not begin with the Afghanistan events but much earlier, namely, when the line followed by the American Government and the NATO allies of the United States became more and more obvious, a line aimed at increasing the arms race and safeguarding the military superiority of the United States in the world, as well as Washington's intention to solve international problems from the position of a policy of strength....

This change has been expressed already in the NATO decision on the stationing of new American missiles in Western Europe, missiles to be aimed at the USSR and its allies. Such a policy--writes Brezhnev--undermines international confidence, create insecurity among the people with regard to the near future and leads to a considerable deterioration of the situation in the world.

The destructive principles currently determining the U.S. line in international affairs also threaten the situation in Europe with fatal consequences. The NATO decision of December...

[Interjection by SPD floorleader Wehner] This is still Brezhnev, is it?

[Straus] You ought to recognize this directly by the phraseology, Mr Wehner. ...In whose achievement the Federal Republic of Germany played an active part has aggravated the situation in Europe tangibly and also burdened our bilateral relations seriously. If the Federal Republic of Germany joined the various sanctions of which the United States is currently trying hard to persuade its NATO allies, then this would only further aggravate the situation. We do not want to assume that you will skid onto this course.

Then the letter goes on to say in the next paragraph: It is more logical to think of all this now rather than crying over spilled milk later.

Esteemed ladies and gentlemen, this is what Mr Brezhnev's letter in answer to the chancellor says which I quoted in excerpts, as otherwise I would have had to do some longer reading. And this against the background of the UN resolution in which an overwhelming majority of the United Nations, namely 104 states against 18 states and some others which abstained from voting or did not participate, termed the brutal attack on Afghanistan what it must be called on the basis of the facts, all criteria of value, and with a minimum of honesty.

What is interesting to note, however, is who voted against this resolution: Ethiopia, Afghanistan, Angola, Belorussia, Bulgaria, the GDR, Grenada, South Yemen, Cuba, Laos, Mongolia, Mozambique, Poland, the Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia, Ukraine, Hungary, and Vietnam. In this voting behavior alone the whole Soviet power belt becomes directly evident which has been set up despite the protestations of detente, despite Helsinki, despite all bilateral and multilateral statements in the seventies, under misuse of this detente policy, from north to south clear across Asia, Central Asia, the Middle East, and into Africa, up to the borders of South Africa.

But, Mr Chancellor, if I were in your shoes I would deem it an insult if the chief of another state being on the same level--if I may suggest this in your case--and of equal rank would dare offer you this standard lie about the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan as a serious argument. [applause]

I hope, Mr Chancellor, that you have shown this letter to the U.S. President, though he probably was not surprised since the misrepresentations, misinterpretations, and intentional untruths contained in this letter have long been known from all the Soviet statements on the developments in Afghanistan.

What matters in the case of Afghanistan is not to rectify a thoughtless prank, which the Soviet leadership committed perhaps out of some motives of loss of temper or loss of controo, with all parties involved saving face.

It is not important whether the Russians eventually will withdraw troops from Afghanistan. But it is essential that the population, the majority of which believes in Islam, not be eradicated and a deadly quiet a la pax Sovietica imposed upon this country. That is decisive.

What is decisive is that the Soviet Union will comb and smash the country to a point where its puppet system will no longer meet with internal political resistance. What is decisive is that the substance of the Afghan people, the many tribes, the freedom of this nation, the freedom of Islamic culture, the freedom of Islamic man be preserved in Afghanistan also in the future, that the people be given an opportunity to choose the government which they wish and which they support. [applause]

Therefore I also am opposed to any foul attempts to interpret the release of Afghanistan as the country's nonalignment, for instance, with the strategic military control by the Soviet Union. That would not be freedom, that would not be nonalignment, that would not be independence. When there is talk about the interference of foreign forces, what does it mean? The Soviet Union has for a long time pursued a systematic shift of power in the direction of Afghanistan. What allegedly is foreign interference is nothing but the freedom struggle of the Afghan mountain tribes which receive humanitarian and military aid partly from outside.

The invasion in Afghanistan naturally means that the Soviet troops have encircled 50 percent of the Iranian border. In other words: They can take Azerbaijan--an old target dating back to 1946 when they had to withdraw from there--and they can also exert control over Baluchistan. They can be in Iran at any time and faster than the Americans ever could, who do not want to go there in contrast to the Soviet Union. This means the intimidation of Pakistan, a warning to the People's Republic of China, increasing influence with regard to India; it means to have come within a distance of 500 kilometers to the warm sea, the Indian Ocean.

What does Mr Brezhnev mean in saying that the American naval units--there are certainly also French units--in the Strait of Hormuz represent a concentration of naval forces at the southern border of the Soviet Union? A strange geographic idea with regard to the future borders of the Soviet Union! [applause]

The trend to the warm sea, the Horn of Africa, the Arab Peninsula, the leap over Ethiopia, Angola and Mozambique, which was pointed out here several times in the seventies by us and last but not least by me in the form of strong warnings, has met with the same laughter, mockery and scorn. Now we have come to the next chapter. But the federal chancellor and his followers obviously still do not want to realize what is involved. The government statement this morning was the best evidence in this respect. [applause, shouts]

I have said numerous times and twice here in the Bundestag: Soviet armament must be judged by three criteria. The first criterion is the current intentions of the Soviet leadership. I have added in this respect: They are not aimed at World War III. How long these intentions will prevail is a question we will also have to answer. The stronger and the more credible the alliance is, the longer the peaceful intentions will prevail--to eternity. [applause]

The second criterion I have mentioned is the Soviet potential. I do not want to lose time here by describing it in detail. All I want to say is the following: It has developed so much in the seventies that it can supply the necessary instruments for all military options, regardless where, when, or to what extent.

The third criterion is the long-term strategic aims of the Soviet Union. I have never kept my opinion a secret in this respect. I do not blame the Soviet Union, I just quote facts: The long-term strategic aims are a mixture of world revolutionary aims of traditional Russian imperialism, such as the developments in Africa, the export of revolutionary ideologies and development aid in the form of arms supplies for unleashing civil wars or so-called liberation wars.

Therefore, too, the military setup in South Yemen, therefore the increasing intimidation of Pakistan and India as well as the Arab countries, most of all on the Arab Peninsula, and therefore the leap to the southern borders of Afghanistan.

It is, after all, absolutely clear that the advance to the southern border of Afghanistan also is intended primarily to shake the stability of the monarchic-feudalist regimes on the Arab Peninsula. The fact that they simultaneously are the principal oil producers and suppliers just fits the picture. Part of this scheme is the power belt which today extends from Afghanistan's southern border to the southern border of South Africa. Part of this scheme is the discernible effort toward preserving the strategic control over the areas of energy extraction and raw material production on which the Europeans are dependent. And part of this scheme, finally, is the demand of a geostrategic and geopolitical redistribution of the world. These are the 12 points. This is what should have been discussed in Moscow--surely with due politeness and caution but also with due plainness--and not the Afghanistan mishap. [applause]

One of your interlocutors, Mr Chancellor, namely Mr Dimitriy Ustinov, the Soviet war minister or defense minister, said the other day: Lust for conquest is alien to the Soviet Union, which is a socialist country. Well, in this particular instance the language is not the expression of the real intentions; by its dialectical use the language rather is the opposite of what is actually being pursued. It was Gromyko who said that it is not the invasion of Afghanistan that threatens world peace but the missile decision for Europe by NATO.

Therefore the politically responsible people in this country really ought to achieve a sober analysis of the concept and the reality of detente policy. After all, one cannot with this coarseness purposively denounce some people as detente opponents and thus as adversaries to peace and peaceful coexistence--last not least for purposes of election politics--and then put on these plastic wings of peace so as to hover over the landscape of reality as an angel of unreality.

Detente does not spell the end of the conflict but is a means of waging it. Detente, as far as we are concerned, is a principle but not a dogma, it is a realistic objective and not sheer folly; it is a means to an end and not an end in itself. As far as we are concerned it is a reason of state and not psychotherapy for differentiating mankind, for qualification or disqualification. Mr Schmidt obviously believes that detente is divisible but not interruptible. Just think whether it would not be better to consider detente indivisible but temporarily interruptible, unfortunately, as a result of measures taken by the other side. This point deserves pondering. [applause]

What detente should be is this: Mitigation of fundamental differences; emphasis on common interests and dangers; balance of forces; accord in individual questions; reduction of the military potentials and mitigation of military thinking. Detente can never be one-sidedly effective. People should also comprehend that coexistence and detente, disarmament, arms limitation, and arms control are to the Soviet Union psychological weapons for "intimidating the other side, for mesmerizing the strategic adversary and for systematically narrowing down his leeway of action.

Keeping this in mind it is possible to pursue detente policy. Then people will no longer fall for a dogma or a bright neon light but regard detente policy as a bitterly necessary reality which, regrettably enough, is feasible only within narrow bounds. [applause]

It stands to reason that it cannot be dictated by one side. It stands to reason that it requires defense readiness and a balance of forces. It stands to reason that it must be indivisible. Any momentary weakness of will--as shown by the West in the seventies--abets the hegemonic tendencies of the other side.

We should comprehend that the Soviet Union surely does not have any ice-cold power conquest plan with a definite schedule--this must be achieved by 1980, the next goal by 1985, the one after next by 1990--yet it does have its global, secular strategy and exploits every chance that offers itself on its periphery or beyond that periphery for taking the next step in the overall global, secular strategy wherever the weakness of will on the part of the adversary, the confusion in the alliance, the disunity in the Atlantic alliance makes it possible. This has always been true to this day.

The government parties after 1969 believed that the Soviet Union's shirking of risks has increased. Afghanistan, unfortunately, proved the opposite to be true. The West, too, is culpable of this development. The West had believed that the Soviet Union is receptive to cooperative crisis managment with self-restraint, and therefore it also believed in an evolutionary reform of the Soviet system.

Ladies and gentlemen, detente policy is possible only if one knows that the Soviet Union exploits every opportunity--perhaps also for domestic reasons--to plunge ahead, that it brings about, or exploits, international crisis for the purpose of gaining control over energy and raw materials and geostrategic advantages. If you, Mr Chancellor, do not want to hear the argument that the timing and the political environment, the background and the stage setting of your trip were wrong--and the forced compliment by the U.S. President does not change anything in that respect--then you should seriously ponder the question as to what would be necessary. What would have been necessary was to achieve a harmonious assessment of the situation in the West before prominent political leaders from the alliance area went calling in Moscow. After all, there is not the least doubt that President Carter and you do not agree indeed in the assessment of the situation, apart from some supericialities, platitudes, and foregone conclusions.

What the West needs is an overall political concept. If you rate the role of the Federal Republic therein so highly--I would rate it a bit lower but you might as well rate it very highly in keeping with your idea of your own importance--then you should use this significance to establish an overall Western political concept rather than for a lone action in going to Moscow. [applause]

It is absolutely necessary to make clear to the leadership of the Soviet Union in good time the marginal benefits [grenznutzen] of its power expansion, and Afghanistan is such a marginal benefit. The fact that you did not mention this marginal benefit, or better yet, this marginal risk, in Moscow but instead welcomed the partial pullout and referred to a schedule for the withdrawal of the remainder, proves that you are in a ghastly illusion vis-a-vis the real world political power developments and their tendencies to shift.

The Soviet side, PRAVDA and IZVESTIYA, have pointed out for good reason that the political leeway of the West in matters of detente policy has decreased considerably, adding that those matters which in the seventies have led to such great progress ought to be developed in the eighties. What does this mean?

A motive for your visit was also appeasement of the leftists in your own party. Vis-a-vis President Carter you may have appeared as an honorable and serious partner able to make pert formulations. It would be much more important, however, to end eventually the endless series of anti-American agitation speeches, anti-American propaganda speeches, the obviously creeping virulent fanning of an anti-American psychosis [shouts] in your own ranks, in your Moscow faction which does not consist of only young people. That would be important. [applause]

Some of your leading party friends have mentioned your anger towards the Americans because President Carter forced the Federal Republic not to take part in the Moscow Olympic games. Why don't you contradict this?

What happened at the meeting of the young socialists with the so-called Free Democratic Youth Organization, the Communist state youth, a short time ago here on the territory of the Federal Republic? What happened? Lack of time keeps me from quoting interesting details. [shouts] Some literature was exchanged there, one has given anti-Strauss books to the other side while receiving SED propaganda literature in return.

If I think of the fifties and sixties when we had really fierce fights with each other, I ask myself: What has happened to the SPD? What has happened to the political youth of the SPD? A sympathy demonstration for either Washington or Moscow today would end in a clear victory for Moscow. That is a fact. [applause]

Esteemed ladies and gentlemen, You particularly, Colleague Brandt, have lectured and tutored the Americans in a number of statements. I have read in a Munich paper the following, I quote you: Despite all the respect for the cowboy in Texas--you have probably mixed up Texas and Georgia--who has his problems, we cannot expect him to observe the problems of divided Germany, of human relations, the Berlin problem and the access roads as closely as we do. This is what the SPD chief said in a "TZ" interview on 25 April 1980. Another member of your faction stated: Carter should remain president, for otherwise Helmut Schmidt would have to break in a new one. [shouts] Such statements are not suitable for strengthening the often reiterated friendship, for preserving confidence or reestablishing it.

Mr Federal Chancellor, you know the facts and connections, so that you cannot seriously mean what you have suggested. If the Soviet Union now suggests including the forward based systems--pardon me for repeating this term--I ask you: What are these forward based systems? A few Phantoms stationed with the 6th Fleet; they can reach the border areas of the Soviet Union under good weather conditions, that means with a rear wind. There are a few F-111s whose range includes the western regions of the Soviet Union. The Soviets also reckon with the Pershing-1, with a range of 900 kilometers. That is not sufficient at all to get even to the border of the Soviet Union.

It seems that the Poseidon has been included, a submarine missile. It is characteristic of submarine missiles that their lack of accuracy rules them out from hitting pinpointed targets; they can be used only in a war aimed at total destruction. These arms can be used only against real targets such as big cities or industrial complexes.

Assuming a moratorium was achieved and the Russians offer the following: We will keep what we have, but will not produce any more, and you will discontinue your plans. It would mean that the East would have 200 missiles with quadruple warheads, range 5,000 kilometers, every one of them with pinpointed accuracy, this being able to reach and destroy over a distance of 5,000 kilometers every square meter of West European territory. Just imagine: Some 800 targets would be attacked with warheads having six or seven times the effect of the Hiroshima bomb. That would be the end of European culture, the end of civilization, the end of humanity in this part of the world.

The decision to close the arms gap was made to evade the possibility of being blackmailed by such a one-sided situation; a situation was supposed to be preserved for the Americans whereby they could maintain their nuclear guarantee.

Mr Federal Chancellor, what you have said here, if you have spoken the full truth and if you have let everything out of the sack, has been realized by us on the basis of information 5 years ago. This is nothing new. It is just an attempt by the Soviet Union to preserve its superiority in the field of medium-range missiles by including arms systems of the other side which do not belong here and which cannot be quoted in this connection, to preserve its superiority and develop it with Western permission.

I admit that even if you had returned with the moratorium I would have said that this is not acceptable; for with 200 missile systems with 800 warheads and nothing on the Western side in the event of a halt on both sides, this no longer solves the problem. Yet what you have brought home is even worse than what your moratorium contained in the way of misuses and dangers. [applause]

The alternative of war or peace is no longer applicable to Europe, as there is only the alternative of preservation or total destruction of all powers involved, their biological, cultural, and technical substance. No Soviet leadership will ever accept this alternative. This is why we must not allow ourselves, blinded by this false alternative, to be induced to tolerate the developments along the flank ofthe Europeans and along NATO's flank, in the southern Atlantic, in the Middle East, in the Indian Ocean, in Afghanistan, and the stormy enhancement of the Soviet offensive armament, just because we say: Dialogue, then everything is alright.

There is no such thing in Europe as the alternative of war or peace. Something entirely different is at stake in Europe. What matters is to preserve the alliance community in such a way that it can retain on the whole its worldwide function even if this function is limited to its geographic sphere of interest. What you have done is rendered an ill service to this end.

What the Soviet Union gained from this visit was, first, the destruction of its isolation from the community of nations which had been caused by its brutal deportment in Afghanistan. Just as you did on 21 August 1969, you now destroyed this isolation. Secondly, the Soviet Union can continue its Afghanistan policy with the open or tacit agreement of various partners of the alliance.

With this sham offer of arms negotiations the Soviet Union has started a successful attack against the NATO decision on the closure of the arms gap. It can continue its detente policy as if nothing happened. From this it can derive that it will have a free hand in the future for further actions whenever the circumstances so allow. It can note that the distrust between the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany--including the imminent danger of not only the confusion but also the dissociation of certain parts within NATO--has now been attained through its policy. All the fine statements indeed are to no avail here.

The Soviet Union can note the further narrowing of the political leeway of the West in general and the Federal Republic of Germany in particular. It can also chalk up in the assets column of its balance sheet the splitting of the political forces in the Federal Republic of Germany.

What I have said many times here in the Bundestag as well, is this: What worries us is not the circumstance that the Federal Republic of Germany perhaps might lose its security, its freedom, or even its cultural, civilized substance as a result of a military attack on Europe. I have often said that what worries us is not a revolutionary act which would destroy our social system, its ideal of liberty, its legal system through the prevalence of leftist radical, communist, pro-Moscow forces. No, what worries us is a long-term psychological-political process devised for many years in which the eating away at NATO, the dissociation of the Europeans from their main protective power, the Americans, is psychologically prepared and politically supported, and finally becomes manifest in an erosion, in a collapse of the system. This may take years, which is only a short period, it may take decades.

The Soviet Union has started a process going whose primary objective is to foil NATO's decision on the closure of the arms gap for reasons well known to all of us.

Secondly, the Soviet Union pursues the goal on a medium-term basis of dissociating the security interests of the West Europeans from those of the Americans for technical and strategic reasons.

The Soviet Union's policy, thirdly, is aimed at stripping the alliance of its effectiveness, even while maintaining the formalities of an alliance, and initiating the process of Western Europe's political neutralization. More alliances have already perished through internal erosion than through external abolition. This is the concern which we hold today about the state of NATO, the future of the Western community, and about the options of preserving peace and freedom.

It would have been your task, Mr Chancellor, to pick up this point of rupture [bruckpunkt--attributed to a Bismarck quotation] and to set the witches in the direction of our common past and of the necessities of a common future. This has not been done, for short-sighted and highly opportunistic reasons and for reasons adapted to election campaign needs. Hence: Counted and weighed, but deemed too light in Moscow. [long, strong applause, shouts]

Reiterates Criticism

LD051012 Hamburg DPA in German 0942 GMT 5 Jul 80

[Excerpts] Munich--Franz Josef Strauss, CSU candidate for the chancellorship, has again sharply criticized the federal chancellor's Moscow trip. Addressing the military-political congress of the CSU in Munich today, Strauss said Helmut Schmidt should have taken with him a few competent German generals if he had felt the desire to speak with Soviet marshals. "Then he would not have fallen for this worthless offer." Strauss was referring to the Soviet Union's offer concerning disarmament negotiations on nuclear medium-range missiles and their military mode of calculation.

Strauss expressed the fear that "this worthless offer" could be the start of a number of European states abandoning NATO's counterarming decision in view of their domestic problems.

Strauss asked the Federal Government why there was today talk of war and fear of war if peace was being made safer day by day, as claimed by the SPD. The policy of detente could function only if at the very least military equilibrium was established. Strauss was not saying "no" to the policy of detente, but he was saying "no to a policy of detente which ended in a "concentration camp of utopia." The question was whether peace means peace in freedom or peace "in gradual capitulation." The Soviet Union's policy of detente aims at a geopolitical redistribution, something it has already partially achieved.

COLUMNIST PRAISES GOVERNMENT REPORT TO BUNDESTAG

DW041115 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 4 Jul 80 p 3

[Editorial by Bonn correspondent Eghard Moerbitz: "The Value of a Trip"]

[Text] The chancellor and the foreign minister on Thursday informed parliament in detail on the actual results of their Moscow probe talks. The public learned in this way about the tangible success of this visit, which in the meantime has been considered a useful enterprise not merely by the Federal Government, but also by the United States.

The government statement made it clear why Hans-Dietrich Genscher undertook the strenuous visits to Paris and Washington, and why he wanted to give firsthand information to the European Community's foreign ministers at a special conference in Luxembourg. That was not blind action or a political show a la Kissinger, but an attempt to give far-reaching information to the Allies in order to avoid from the very beginning some misinterpretation of the Moscow results.

It pertains particularly to the United States, which is urged to deal with the results of the Moscow visit not only because Genscher brought along answers to two questions which were not described in detail, questions Jimmy Carter had channelled through his "special envoy" Helmut Schmidt directly to Brezhnev.

The chancellor explained the value of the Moscow probe talks with pleasant realism to the Bundestag. Leonid Brezhnev is prepared under two conditions to discuss prior to the ratification of SALT II on intercontinental strategic arms the limitation of nuclear medium-range arms in Europe: 1. The United States must include also those U.S. nuclear arms which are stationed in Europe and which can reach Soviet territory; 2. An agreement on Eurostrategic arms can be implemented only once SALT II has been ratified by the United States.

Schmidt and Genscher have complemented Brezhnev's suggestion with the demand that the Soviet Eurostrategic arms, which are not less dangerous, must be incorporated in the negotiations; that was more than logical due to the existing threat emanating from Soviet nuclear arms for all of Western Europe. The foreign minister hid an equally significant result of the Moscow talks in his contribution to the debate. He considers it possible that a new all-European disarmament conference will be installed in connection with the CSCE followup conference in Madrid, with measures against surprise attacks involving the "whole European Continent."

The chancellor and the foreign minister commented on the results with the proper sobriety. Schmidt said himself that he does not consider the substance a "breakthrough." And indeed no beginning is in sight with regard to concrete negotiations on medium-range arms in Europe. In view of this difficult matter, no treaties can be expected prior to 1983, even if negotiations take place immediately after the U.S. presidential elections, which is not very likely. But it would be positive after all if the USSR actually gave up making the postponement of NATO's two-part decision a prerequisite. The chancellor assumes this and therefore he mentioned a "new situation." One will see whether the events prove him right after the elections in the Federal Republic and the United States this fall.

In order to achieve a real breakthrough to stop the uncontrolled arms race eventually, not just more hard work will be necessary, but also the willingness to negotiate by all who are involved in European peace. Nothing will work without the two world powers, the United States and the USSR, and nothing will work without France either, whose President Valery Giscard d'Estaing must face elections next year. Nothing will work without their understanding for tactical necessities in negotiations with the Soviet Union, which produces the best chess players in the world.

One can forget what candidate for chancellor Franz Josef Strauss dared to offer with regard to the statements of the Federal Government. He did not want to miss the chance of appearing once again in the eighth Bundestag next to Helmut Schmidt on the television screen. He used that chance poorly, although he talked almost three times as long--a painful 110 minutes instead of 40, as did the chancellor. Strauss has maneuvered himself into a political offside position with his reply. He had nothing significant to add to the issue of the day, something that would permit the observer to speak of a last parliamentary duel between the chancellor and his challenger. What he said about the chancellor applies to himself--weighed, but found too light.

GENSCHER CALLS FOR IMPROVED RELATIONS WITH GDR

[Excerpt] Bonn/Cologne--Hans-Dietrich Genscher, chairman of the FDP and federal foreign minister, has come out in favor of a purposeful improvement in intra-German relations on the path of improved cooperation.

Speaking to his party's presidium he stressed that Bonn and East Berlin could contribute by their attitude to stabilization in Europe. The recent remarks by SED General Secretary Erich Honecker show that the GDR leadership is also aware of the importance of the intra-German relationship for European development. Genscher said that above and beyond technical agreements, however, further humanitarian measures between the two German states are indispensable. According to a statement by party spokesman Josef Gerwald, Genscher said: "The more detente is experienced and felt by the individual in the divided country, the more reliable and lasting it will be." Every additional opportunity to travel from East to West could create a piece of fresh reality in the spirit of the Helsinki final act. In Genscher's view an improvement in relations with the GDR, the Soviet Union and the other states of the Warsaw Pact can, however, only be achieved by "patient efforts" and a readiness to talk. Polemics conditioned by the election campaign and suspicions cast on those making efforts in this direction are senseless and only harm German interests.

Notes Correctness of NATO Policy

LD051426 Hamburg DPA in German 1403 GMT 5 Jul 80

[Text] Bonn--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher said in an interview with Bremen Radio that his conviction is that the Soviet reaction to the West's negotiating offer shows that NATO's position, which is substantially influenced by the Federal Republic, is correct, that is to implement the counterarming decision and to try uncompromisingly for negotiations. All those who pleaded for the counterarming decision to be reversed have been proved wrong. Genscher emphasized that in order to judge the Soviet preparedness to negotiate finally, it is still necessary for the Soviet side to specify in detail what it has in mind. Concerning newspaper reports about an alleged skeptical attitude in the United States Genscher said he relied on what U.S. President Carter and the American secretary of state and security adviser told him: that the Soviet reaction would be carefully and constructively examined. The text of the interview was prereleased by the Foreign Ministry.

To Visit SFRY

LD090805 Hamburg DPA in German 0729 9 Jul 80

[Text] Bonn--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher is to pay a 20-day official visit to Yugoslavia on 17 July. Genscher has been invited by Yugoslav Foreign Minister Josip Vrhovec. The Foreign Ministry stressed today that the federal foreign minister is thus carrying on the continuous exchange of views with the Yugoslav Government. Topics of the Belgrade talks will be international and bilateral issues.

CONCERN EXPRESSED OVER POLITICAL SITUATION IN ROK

LD081835 Hamburg DPA in German 1714 GMT 8 Jul 80

[Excerpt] Bonn--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher expressed to the South Korean ambassador in Bonn, Yi Chang-hui [as received] the "deep concern" of the Federal Government and the parties in the Bundestag over political developments in his country. It was learned tonight that the ambassador was summoned by the federal foreign minister for a talk in the Foreign Office. According to the Foreign Office, Genscher expressed his great concern over the fate of South Korean opposition leader Kim Tae-chung and of his political associates and over the abrogation of the democratic rule in South Korea. He asked the ambassador to convey to his government the Federal Government's request to end the persecution of opposition politicians and to make unhampered political activity possible.

GOVERNMENT 'WOULD NOT BE HOSTILE' TO EUROMISSILES TALKS

[Unattributed report: "France Would Not Be Hostile to Negotiations Connected With Salt III"]

[Text] There has been no comment on the talks which French Foreign Minister Francois-Poncet and German Foreign Minister Genscher had at Orly on Wednesday, 2 July, on the subject of Mr Schmidt's visit to Moscow. The French side is even less willing to give an opinion on the possibility of negotiations on the Euromissiles linked with negotiations on a SALT III treaty.

The French Government has, however, deemed the conclusion of the SALT II treaty and the possibility of a SALT III treaty to be positive provided France is not involved in limiting its nuclear armaments until the superpowers have made significant reductions in their arsenals.

It seems, therefore, that the French Government, which has always refused to comment on the deployment of the Euromissiles, stressing that its forces are not integrated into NATO, would not be hostile to a U.S.-Soviet negotiation on this type of weapon, the result of which would be linked with the implementation of the SALT agreements.

FOREIGN MINISTER ON AFGHAN ASSISTANCE, ALLEGATIONS OF INTERFERENCE

[Unattributed report: "Resistance Movements Waging National Liberation War"]

[Excerpt] "The Afghan resistance movements are waging a national liberation war," Jean Francois-Poncet told the National Assembly Foreign Affairs Commission for the first time Wednesday, 2 July. The foreign minister confirmed that the Afghan resistance movements do not have modern weapons and added: "That largely dispenses with the allegations of foreign interference."

Mentioning the withdrawal of some Soviet units from Afghanistan, the minister said that this is a new factor constituting a step in the right direction but that it is still too soon to try to draw a long-term inference from it. "To be significant, the withdrawal should be definitive and followed by new withdrawals leading to general evacuation; the Soviet announcement has so far not been accompanied by any modification of Moscow's stance," the commission communique indicated.

AFGHAN REFUGEES SEEKING ASYLUM EXPELLED

LD081525 Paris LE MATIN in French 3 Jul 80 p 10

[Unattributed report: "Afghan Refugees Expelled"]

[Text] Four Afghan refugees who had been waiting at Orly Airport since Saturday for permission to enter France where they were requesting political asylum were expelled yesterday by the French authorities and placed on a German Lufthansa flight going to Frankfurt. Last week the German authorities had refused them permission to land, as had the authorities in Thailand where they had attempted to go.

GISCARD REMARKS ON AFGHANISTAN, DETERRENCE QUESTIONED

LD041009 Paris LE MONDE in French 3 Jul 80 pp 1,3

[Michel Tatu article: "Three Remarks"]

[Text] During his 2 days of talks with Mr Brezhnev in Moscow Chancellor Schmidt talked mainly about Afghanistan and nuclear arms in Europe. Last week Mr Giscard d'Estaing recalled or explained his stance on these subjects. Three remarks made during his press conference on 26 June provide the key to the head of state's thinking. However, they also show how a leader can influence the "perception" which his partners and adversaries have of his intentions without all their implications being fully taken into account.

The first remark is: "Should a country like France give military aid to the Afghan rebellion? My answer is no; France is in favor of seeking a political solution." As far as we know Mr Giscard d'Estaing is the only leader of a Western or nonaligned country who has made such a remark, not that all those who, like him, regard the Red Army's occupation of Afghanistan as "unacceptable" are really giving aid to what would, moreover, more correctly be called the Afghan "resistance." However, both those who are acting and those who are doing nothing are taking care not to say so. One would like to think that France is at least giving economic aid to this resistance but, why, by officially ruling out military aid, give Mr Brezhnev in advance a gift which he has certainly never offered in similar circumstances?

It is true that this subject should be approached cautiously. The idea of making Pakistan the "Afghan resistance's North Vietnam" by supplying it with all the heavy equipment which the communist block gave to Hanoi during the Indochina war is easier said than done. It comes up against the uncertainty felt by Pakistan, which is not anxious to be exposed to reprisals in the framework of the right to pursuit which the USSR would assume and to the vacillation of the United States itself which, although supplying aid, refuses to do so publicly and prefers not to be "caught redhanded." However, everybody, including Paris, admits that it is above all in the field that the matter will be settled; the "gesture" which the Kremlin has just made by announcing a partial withdrawal of its troops is due as much to the Afghan resistance's courage as to international condemnation or to the "gesture" which Mr Giscard d'Estaing felt obliged to make by going to Warsaw. In any case, there was no need for this French concession.

The argument invoked by the president of the republic is even stranger. Even if you are quite legitimately seeking a political solution to the Afghan crisis, it is difficult to see how this could be obtained from a partner who has used arms on a large scale by assuring him that his efforts will not be opposed, in other words by refusing to give his victim the means of defending himself against an intrusion you yourself deem unacceptable. Husak is demonstrating every day in Czechoslovakia what a "political solution" obtained under these conditions can look like. Does Mr Giscard d'Estaing hope that international condemnation will reach such heights that it will replace the effort being made by the Afghans in the field and exert sufficient pressure on Moscow? For that you would at least have to advocate "multidirectional" sanctions, in economic and other spheres, against the USSR. This is, to say the least, not what the French president is doing.

Another remark which it would have been better not to make is the following: "Any nuclear attak on French territory would automatically spark off a strategic nuclear response." [paragraph continues]

Mr Giscard d'Estaing's motives are understandable: The president of the republic, sensitive to insinuations--strengthened by a recent IFOP-LE POINT opinion poll--that he would never dare to press the nuclear button, has specified in what circumstances he would do it: in a direct attack with nuclear weapons against national territory. This is, indeed, one of the hypothetical situations in which the deterrent force is to be put into action. However, a potential adversary will read something different into this remark: An attack on France using conventional weapons will not spark off a nuclear response; at least, this response will not be "automatic," which is one way of saying that it is rather improbable.

In this sphere it is only natural that the risks run should preserve some degree of uncertainty. Nobody now expects the leader of any nuclear power to expressly define all the bases in which his force will be used. However, it is better to avoid giving details which seem to rule out a number of hypotheses.

The French deterrent force was set up to avoid not only nuclear war but any kind of war; its aim is to ensure France's independence at least as much as its citizens' survival. It is because a medium-sized European country does not have much chance of withstanding the 175 Soviet divisions that the possibility of resorting to the ultimate weapon has been maintained in the framework of deterrence "by the weak against the strong." For the same reasons, the Western powers and France in particular have always rejected Soviet proposals aimed at concluding treaties banning the "first use" of nuclear weapons: The Americans themselves--even though their position has become less credible over the years--have always intended to keep the principle of resorting to the ultimate weapon to counterbalance the Warsaw Pact's superiority in the conventional sphere.

Ultimately, moreover, if it was simply a question of preventing a nuclear attack it would be better to abandon all such weapons and announce that you will never house any on your territory. The USSR has said that it is prepared to conclude treaties with nonnuclear countries promising not to use or threaten to use nuclear weapons against it. The maintenance of USSR conventional superiority explains the weak response these proposals have produced. In any case France has taken an entirely different path not only by equipping itself with a nuclear force but by protecting its Albion Plateau missiles in such a way that they could only be destroyed by nuclear fire; in so doing the intention was to force the aggressor to "reveal" himself by "signing" his attack. In this case, too, escalation to the ultimate weapon is provoked the better to deter any general aggression, whether nuclear or not. Finally, is there any need to recall that French deterrence is still based on a "multidirectional" line in that it provides security against a hypothetical resurgence of German aggressiveness? All these are, therefore, reasons for not ruling out any possibility a priori.

Ambiguity, Fortunately

On the other hand the head of state's third remark contains skillful ambiguity: "France is directly concerned by the security of neighboring European states." This fact is not disputed by anybody, but it can help to dispel the unfortunate impression of neutralism or even isolationism which is given by French deterrence doctrine, especially in its "orthodox" version. It is clear that any "Finlandization" and more especially any Sovietization of the FRG would have tragic consequences for France. The only question is what Paris could most usefully do to prevent this eventuality. One option is to assert an unswerving political solidarity by proclaiming guaranteed participation in any "battle for Germany" alongside the Americans and the other allies; the main objection to this idea is that it hardly makes any difference to the military conditions of this confrontation and hence that it does not make it any more or less probable, while requiring a much greater defense effort on the conventional and tactical nuclear planes.

The other option consists in strengthening the French strategic deterrent in such a way that the umbrella thus created gradually extends beyond the national territory to cover our neighbors. This effort can be made alone and nonetheless ought not to close the door to cooperation. An opportunity arose--and was missed, as we saw--with the debate on the U.S. Euromissiles: The deployment of similar missiles in the FRG, built jointly by Paris and Bonn, whose use would be subject to a French and German "dual key" system, would have confirmed this extension of the French deterrent without there being any need to ask Germany to abandon its integration in NATO.

Despite the support shown by his political friends for the first option, Mr Giscard d'Estaing has taken care not to choose. He will probably be forced to explain his views when making the decisions on defense policy which he is planning to take this summer. Meanwhile, however, he prefers to cultivate some uncertainty which would have been appropriate in the second remark. As he says himself, some indications on defense "should be given in away which enables the interlocutor to ask himself a number of questions."

PCF ISSUES RESOLUTION ON NATIONAL DEFENSE POLICY

LD041131 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 28 Jun 80 p 6

[Text] A formidable Giscardian propaganda campaign, to which the Socialist Party [PS] is contributing, is trying to make people believe that the dangers of war have considerably increased. The Soviet Union and the socialist countries, openly portrayed as France's only enemies, are held responsible for the deterioration in the climate of detente. The aim is to justify the deployment of the Euromissiles and the revival of the arms race decided on by NATO in Washington in spring 1978. In this political context defense problems are in the forefront.

On the pretext of modernizing French nuclear weapons and adapting military strategy to the present-day world, Giscard d'Estaing has announced the manufacture of the neutron bomb and is preparing to "give battle" in Europe in the context of Atlantic strategy and against the socialist countries.

This directly calls into question the deterrence strategy which is aimed at preventing war. At the same time this places on our country the weighty responsibility for an escalation in the arms race with new weapons whose manufacture had hitherto been prevented by the action of international public opinion.

The Communists' analysis is entirely different. The balance of forces in favor of the national, social and human liberation forces is forcing imperialism to back down and no longer allows it to decide on war and peace as it would like.

The USSR and the socialist countries,by their policy and their initiatives, are constantly confirming that socialism means peace.

On the other hand it is imperialism which, facing the crisis in its system and the growth of people's struggles for progress and peace, is reviving a ruinous and dangerous arms race.

The PCF is in favor of a great policy of peace and national independence. The initiatives which France could take in favor of disarmament and cooperation would not only increase its international authority but would provide it with the best possible conditions for ensuring its independence and guaranteeing its sovereignty.

In the current international political context France's security necessarily requires that it should have a real defense system and take consistent and persistent action in favor of disarmament. The PCF is clearly in favor of an authentically national defense policy.

In May 1977, in view of the situation of the conventional and nuclear armed forces at the time, the PCF advocated the "maintenance," is other words maintaining in an operational state, of French nuclear weapons and a multidirectional deterrence strategy.

Today it confirms this choice which means preserving the credibility of our nuclear force, and this implies its maintenance and the incorporation of scientific and technical progress at a quantitative level defined only by the requirements of the country's security and independence.

This PCF position excludes any French participation in the arms race whether it be the manufacture of the neutron bomb and its use in "forward battle" or the production of new nuclear missile-launching submarines. With six nuclear submarines the naval nuclear force is credible, and only if the first submarine were to be withdrawn from service could the construction of a new submarine be justified.

At a time when the draft is under attack from many different quarters in favor of a professional force under the name of a volunteer army, the PCF reaffirms that it is in favor of a democratized conscripted army and of a 1-year term of military service.

The bad conditions in which military service is performed and the feeling of futility and wasted time which the draftees have make them reject the army. The Rally for the Republic intends to exploit this via its demagogic and electioneering proposal for a 4-month term of service aimed at establishing a professional army isolated from the nation. What is at stake today is not the length of the term of service. What we must do is improve the military and combat training of soldiers, sailors and air force personnel while enabling them to obtain better professional, cultural and sports training. The democratization of all aspects of military life will also give the army a popular content which alone can ensure real national defense.

The PCF reaffirms that only national arms production can ensure an effective and independent French defense system. By manufacturing European weapons or weapons jointly with the FRG (French-German tank, French-German-British fighter plane) the government is going against an independent defense system. That is why the PCF once again advocates the nationalization of the whole arms industry and giving state arsenals, manufacturers and establishments the vital place they must have in this sphere.

To ensure France's defense it is necessary to have a defense budget in keeping with the country's economic potential and which would no longer give the armaments multinationals large profits. Everything proves that with around 3 percent of the gross national product national defense can be run properly.

Promoting peace and disarmament and ensuring national defense are two inseparable objectives of a great French policy. The PCF calls on all men and women of goodwill, especially young people, and all peaceful and patriotic forces to rally and take action to achieve this.

For its part the PCF is not and will not spare its efforts in this vital battle for peace, disarmament and national independence.

BERLINGUER ADDRESSES PCI CENTRAL COMMITTEE ON VENICE SUMMIT

LD081517 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 28 Jun 80 pp 1, 7

[Unattributed report on PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer 27 June speech at PCI Central Committee meeting in Rome: "The Lynchpins of Our Policy"]

[Excerpts] The events of the past 3 weeks are punctuated by a number of factors, all of which move in the direction of an exacerbation of the tensions and in the light of which the present government's complete inadequacy is becoming increasingly apparent. President Carter's meetings with members of the Italian Government have highlighted more than ever the subordination of the Italian Government's foreign, economic and military policy to even those aspects of U.S. policy which conflict both with the need for international detente and with Italy's fundamental interests. L'UNITA has rightly stated that the Carter-Cossiga communique was a torpedo fired at the forces, countries and governments of Western Europe and those within the Atlantic Alliance itself which are making efforts to reestablish negotiations with the Eastern Bloc, despite the knowledge that this displeases Brzezinski.

At the Venice summit, although enjoying the position of chairman of that meeting, the Italian Government played a bit part. It neither said nor did anything that could constitute even a conditioning of the current U.S. strategy.

The Venice talks on economic policy essentially revealed Italy's acceptance of a line driving determinedly toward a recession while, as far as specific energy issues are concerned, the country is tied to approaches which fail to take into account the particular requirements of its relatively weak and fragile economic structure, compared to that of other developed capitalist countries, and which, above all, fail to take into account Italy's own opportunities of developing fruitful economic and political relations with the oil producing countries, such as Iran, and more generally with the Middle Eastern and Third World countries. It is extremely frustrating to see how opportunities for our country to take and initiative in these directions are being wasted for no other reason than to back U.S. policy and interests.

As for defense policy, it is not clear, even following Minister Lagorio's latest statements, whether or not Italy will yield to the demand for a substantial increase in military spending, which would serve above all to enable the United States to deploy a more sizeable strike force in the Persian Gulf zone and the Middle East; and it is not clear yet whether or not Italy accepts the proposals made cautiously but clearly enough by the FRG Government regarding a moratorium on medium-range missiles. In this connection surely nobody can believe that the FRG has made and is making this proposal because it wants to reduce the West's security and to achieve an imbalance of forces with the Warsaw Pact. Comrade Natta referred to Minister Lagorio's latest remarks but it does not seem that they reflect the Italian Government's stance; indeed, until yesterday the contrary seemed true.

Of course, we would like the Socialist comrades, with their own identity and initiative, to participate actively in our quest for the initiatives and means to facilitate the encounter and understanding with all the Catholic peoples forces, in the stimutaneous action aimed specifically at the DC, with a view to shifting it and altering its stances as far as possible, and especially in the struggle that must now be waged against the "preamble" line. This should be one of the aims of the quest for unity between the PCI and PSI with a view to a more effective struggle against the DC rightwing. I do agree, however, with whoever said that we must not be naive in this field and fail to see that the PSI's present leadership is not moving in this direction and that, indeed, it has at least shown acquiescence to the "preamble" DC by admittedly embarking on a dialectical and competitive relationship with it, but within a framework leading objectively to the division of the workers masses, which the present DC leaders are trying to force to break away from the Communist party.

We must bear this objective fact in mind and refrain now from committing toward the Socialist Party the errors which we have committed before toward the DC, when at certain moments and on certain issues we have sought agreement with it for agreement's sake. Of course as far as we are concerned we will not overlook any possible meetings and forms of cooperation with the PSI (and there are very major opportunities for this at the local level, and also at the national level). But we must never abandon our differences, our criticism and, when necessary, our ideological political battle: Otherwise we would eventually surrender our own specific autonomous role. And this would not aid the cause of the unity of the workers and peoples movement.

The specific political problem now emerging above any other is how to smash the present political framework and the political alliances on which it is based and how to counter the political outlook inherent in these alliances, which is reflected in the present government coalition and its continued existence. This is why we must keep alive the demand for the government to step down which we made during the election campaign. It has been said that it was incorrect to raise such an issue because we were unable to propose a government involving our participation in the short term. But, if we accepted this logic it would mean that until this is possible, that is until such a governmental solution seems reasonable and feasible, and until the conditions exist for forming a government with us, we should agree to the existing government remaining in office, even if it performs some actions which are ruinous for the country. In that case what would the opposition's function be? Merely to wait to join the government? And if it did just when would it ever join? Opposition, it is true, is exercised primarily by organizing a struggle against negative government actions to prevent these actions from being performed and to wrest even partial results in a positive direction. But opposition would be incomplete, and I am talking not in general terms but of the opposition that must be performed in the present situation, if we failed to create a crisis in a government solution whose continued existence, it is now clear, is merely worsening the country's general situation and diminishing the prospects of a government capable of tackling this situation. So the fight to change this government is now a precondition for smashing the political operation from which the government itself stemmed, which has characterized its specific actions and which it intends to continue through the government's own continued existence.

PAJETTA REFUSES TO EQUATE AFGHANISTAN WITH VIETNAM

LD041025 Rome L'ESPRESSO in Italian 29 Jun 80 pp 7-12

[Lucio Colletti interview with PCI Directorate Member Giancarlo Pajetta: "Comrades, Who Are We and Where Are We Going?"]

[Excerpt] Colletti: Listen, Pajetta, in 1966 you announced that if the Hanoi government had asked you to, your party would have even been prepared to send volunteers; in any case medical supplies and provisions were sent. The PCI mobilized public opinion with rallies, marches and appeals. But would Berlinguer now send a brigade to Afghanistan? If so, to fight on which side?

Pajetta: We would certainly not send a brigade to help the Soviet Army. We deplore its intervention. As far as the rebels are concerned....

Colletti: Why do you call them rebels? You did not call the Vietnamese rebels. You called them partisans.

Pajetta: For a communist who joined the movement in 1925 the word "rebel" does not have a pejorative meaning. If you consult the Rigutini and Fanfani dictionary you can see for yourself that "brigand" means one thing, "bandit" another and "rebel" something else again. A rebel is someone who opposes the legally recognized government. Since the present Kabul government is recognized by the United Nations, I feel the term is correct.

Colletti: What difference do you see between the U.S. aggression in Vietnam and the Soviet one in Afghanistan?

Pajetta: I have known the Vietnamese communists since 1931. I do not know the Afghan communists or rebels, however, and I certainly cannot rush to fight with people I do not know. I am not acquainted with the present situation in Afghanistan. I only know that the people who formed the communists' vanguards in that country governed in such a way as to prompt broad forms of opposition and have split even among themselves. More than that I do not know.

Colletti: Pardon me if I persist with this point, Mr Pajetta. You cannot form a verdict on such a serious situation merely on the basis of the behavior of local communists or of your personal acquaintances gained in 1931 or subsequently.

Pajetta: Agreed. I cannot form a verdict. For this very reason I do not understand why you want to send me as a volunteer on one side or another when I do not feel I can identify with either.

Colletti: I did not know the Vietnamese guerrillas. But I did take a stance, I demonstrated and did what I could, like many other people. I do not know the Afghan guerrillas; I am probably not well informed. However, it seems to me that there is one factor common to both situations: the intervention of a major power in the Third World; plus, in Afghanistan's case, the USSR's military occupation of the territory.

Pajetta: And we have condemned this occupation, although we refuse to form the first anti-Soviet international brigade, while neither [Italian Socialist Party Directorate member] Martelli nor [Christian Democratic Party Secretary] Flaminio Piccoli have considered doing so. Not even the Islamic states have recognized these rebel groups and the politicians who represent them. Should we behave as teacher's pets? Declare war on Russia? We would be stopped by every worker with any commonsense and by every communist with any common sense, which is how I regard myself, for instance.

Colletti: We were not talking about war but about mobilizing the masses.

Pajetta: We are in favor of mobilizing the masses with a view to demanding not idiotic actions such as the Olympic boycott, but work to restore peace in those areas.

Colletti: So you condemn, but you do not take sides.

Pajetta: Just as we did not take sides with the Czechoslovak opposition.

DEFENSE MINISTER URGES MORE ARMED FORCES MODERNIZATION FUNDS

[Excerpts] Rome--Question: Why are you dissatisfied with the armed forces' standard of efficiency?

Answer: We now have two armies, one first rate and the other second rate: 30 percent of our armed forces personnel are unqualified. Every soldier must know how to soldier and not spend his time in the barracks reading comic books and doing crosswords. If one day, by mischance, a war broke out, the money we are spending would be wasted.

Question: With regard to money, you are asking for more funds for your ministry's budget: Is this really necessary?

Answer: The funds established by parliament in 1975 for modernizing the armed forces are insufficient, owing to inflation. In my opinion the 1980 budget, which is projected to be 6 trillion lire, must be increased at least 3 percent. This is not much if you bear in mind that we are the only West European country spending as little as $127 a head on military organization; the others spend $300-500. Not to mention Eastern Europe.

Question: What kind of army are you aiming at?

Answer: An efficient, modern army that will meet the country's needs and effectively maintain peace. That is all. My objective is to have armed forces that will, within the context of our alliance and integrated with those of other countries with a solid democratic tradition, help form a deterrent force.

Question: You suggest that from now on the armed forces publicize abroad the goods produced by Italian industries working in the armaments field. Do you want to turn the army into an advertising agency?

Answer: It seems right to me that our military experts should publicize abroad the electronic equipment for protecting tanks, ships and aircraft which is produced by factories in our country and that they should also publicize all the other electronics instruments of a defensive nature that cannot be absorbed by the domestic market. Or do we want these factories to close down?

TANJUG CITES SLOVENE LEADER'S DEMAND FOR 'NATIONAL RIGHTS'

LD021440 Belgrade TANJUG in English 1326 GMT 2 Jul 80

[Text] Trieste, July 2 (TANJUG)--Bocis Race, president of the Slovene cultural and economic alliance in Italy, has reiterated the demand that national rights be recognized to ethnic Slovenes in the thirty-five municipalities in which they live in Italy, irrespective of their strength in numbers. Ethnic Slovenes cannot accept a division into broader and narrower areas in which they live, with differing rights to the use of the Slovene language in public administration.

Also unacceptable is the rejection of their demand that ethnic Slovenes administer their national schools for themselves and they refuse that such economic policy be conducted which would not take the interests of ethnic Slovenes in Italy into account. Race refused that the question of setting up a mixed and industrial zone at the Yugoslav-Italian border be settled by a referendum for supposed ecological reasons, behind which to be found is, in fact, resistance to any border cooperation between the peoples in Yugoslavia and Italy.

SA CARNEIRO INTERVIEWED ON POLITICAL, ECONOMIC SITUATION

LD041325 Paris LE FIGARO in French 30 Jun 80 pp 1, 3

[Marianne Lohse interview with Portuguese Prime Minister Francisco sa Carneiro: "Emerging From Isolation"; date and place of interview not specified]

[Text] Question: Mr Prime Minister, you have made Portugal's membership of the European Community "the priority of priorities." Aren't you disappointed by President Giscard d'Estaing's statements and the tendency to lump your country with Spain? What arguments do you intend to put forward?

Answer: Mr Giscard d'Estaing's statements clearly sparked off quite a stir. However, I have encountered everywhere--from Bonn to Brussels--complete support for Portugal's entry within the timetable laid down. The president of the republic explained the French position in his press conference: there is no question of postponing entry but of ensuring that the new members are fully aware of possible new rules.

This is especially the case as regards the common agricultural policy. This will not necessarily delay our entry. Our case is separate from Spain's. The negotiations are separate. In any case the Community Council of Ministers' decision has not been altered. France did not even raise the issue in Venice. I think, therefore, that negotiations will be continued.

Question: How do you envisage your contribution?

Answer: We regard it as a fundamental plan, and not a "sprint." We are experiencing an international political crisis which increases Europe's need to strengthen its defense system. This defense, however, can only be completely guaranteed with Portugal's participation, and not just at strategic level. We must have a common foreign policy and a common energy policy. Although Portugal is small and weak economically speaking, it can make a very valuable contribution. There are other aspects: our African experience, our ties with former colonies, Latin America....

Question: A propos, it seems that your political relations with Angola are deteriorating and that your position in Guinea-Bissau and Cape Verde is principally strengthened by the personal contacts which some Portuguese leaders have with some African leaders....

Answer: I would not say that. We trebled our trade with Angola in the first quarter of this year. It is no exaggeration to say that relations are not bad. We have strengthened our political and economic cooperation in Guinea-Bissau and Cape Verde. However, we must not attribute too much importance to our contribution at this level. France has a much better developed and structured African policy....

Question: You have just met with President Carter. The strengthening of your relations with the United States is sometimes portrayed in Portugal as an "alternative scenario." What form could it take? For instance, what is the position on the proposals to install U.S. naval bases on Tage or in the port of Sines?

Answer: The strengthening of our government's relations with the United States is a fact. It is not an alternative scenario. It is important for Europe that Portugal should have these complementary ties. During my talks with President Carter I observed that the strong tone of the Venice final communique was not just a tactical maneuver but a fundamental strategy which is to be maintained for years, for as long as it takes to counter Soviet influence. The Madrid conference will be very important (this question was also discussed on my initiative). New concepts of deterrence and detente will dominate the meeting. Portugal is prepared to examine requests wh h the United States and other NATO countries might make to strengthen Europe's military defense. The risks and advantages of this must be assessed. [paragraph continues]

The United States is now studying the possibility of bases for its aircraft carriers in several European countries. We are still very much at the preliminary stage.

Putting an End to Military Power

Question: The constant guerrilla warfare between the prime minister's department and the presidency of the republic, the prospect of elections and of revising the constitution seem to be complicating Portuguese political life to the utmost. Moreover the Democratic Alliance is putting forward General Soares Carneiro as its own candidate in the presidential elections. Can you explain your position to us?

Answer: There are tensions. It is important to remember that our regime is not the same as the French regime. Only the government has executive power. A majority government has only been exercising this powerfullly for a short time, without handing it over to the president of the republic or to other bodies as previously happened due to a certain vacuum and a degree of instability. It is mainly with the Revolution Council chaired by the president of the republic that problems exist. The moves to revise the monopoly held by branches of the public sector, and the possibility of private investment in all sectors have been approved by the constitutional committee. However, they have been rejected by the Revolution Council for political reasons. This is the most important confrontation. Clearly, since the president of the republic chairs the Revolution Council, this reveals what some of our European friends think: Portugal is not a full democracy. It is still subject to some military control. The constitution must be revised (this will only be possible after the election) because it is important to make it more open, less dogmatic and more programmatic. However, this must also be done because we must dissolve the Revolution Council. My government has no power--this is the only exception--over the armed forces which are dependent on the Revolution Council and the chiefs of staff.

Question: However, you are supporting a military candidate....

Answer: Soares Carneiro has stated that he would not be president of the republic and chief of staff at the same time, as is the case with General Eanes who fills both posts. I am happy to stress that the Portuguese Armed Forces as a whole are prepared to recognize the civilian political government. Soares Carneiro has been chosen for his abilities. He is an intelligent man completely involved in the democratic process.

Question: Do you feel you have partly made up some lost ground in the economic sphere?

Answer: After 5 and 1/2 months in government inflation has fallen from 25 percent last year to almost 15 percent. This has been achieved by very strict public spending controls, strict price controls and a constant call to increase productivity. This year wages will increase in real terms. As far as the fight against unemployment is concerned, it depended largely on private investment. There is enormous interest on the part of foreign investors. The key to recovery, as I have said, as the revision of the limits for public and private sectors. The Revolution Council has rejected it. Therefore we must await the elections. We have a plan and possibilities of bridging by our work the gap which separates us from other European countries. Portugal's per capita production is half that of Spain and 65 percent that of Greece. However, I think that the Portuguese now feel a great deal has to be done and can be done. In this sense the revaluation of the escudo is symbolic: it shows that we are not resigned to deterioration.

AMBASSADOR TO CSCE PREVIEWS MADRID FOLLOWUP MEETING

ID090903 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 4 Jul 80 p 9

[Jose Luis Martinez 3 July interview in Madrid with Spanish Ambassador to the CSCE Javier Ruperez: "NATO Issue Cannot, Must Not Affect Conference"]

[Excerpts] Madrid, 3 July--"The subject of NATO membership cannot and must not affect the CSCE." This was said in exclusive remarks granted to LA VANGUARDIA by Javier Ruperez, appointed Spain's ambassador to the CSCE at the latest Council of Ministers meeting. "I must add that one of the articles in the Helsinki Final Act states that member states of this body can either belong or not belong to military pacts. The conference is not the exclusive birthright of the neutral or nonaligned countries and the choice of Madrid as the venue for the conference was made without any kind of preconditions regarding our future options."

[Question] Mr Ruperez, during the past few months some prominent European politicians have advocated postponing the Madrid conference. What is your opinion of this?

No Indications That We Should Postpone

[Answer] If present circumstances continue, the conference will be held on the dates planned: on 9 September the preparatory conference (when the ambassadors to the conference will meet), and on 11 November the inauguration of the actual conference. There are no indications that lead us to conclude that the conference will be postponed. The conference has no standing bodies and therefore can only be guided by the decisions of all the permanent participant states. The dates I mentioned were decided in Belgrade and they cannot be changed.

[Question] What are the plans for Spain's participation?

Spanish Strategy Not Yet Decided

[Answer] I would like to impart to our participation a political significance of comprehension of what is happening in Europe, and in this sense I will not be pursuing a strictly party policy, but a government policy related to the major themes of our foreign policy. At present, however, it is difficult to make plans for the Spanish delegation's specific activity since the conference has its own dynamics, which is difficult to forecast. It is a body of 35 countries which functions by consensus, and this necessitates agreement. My approach is that the conference is coming to Madrid at a time that Spanish foreign policy is clear: the lines of action in foreign policy based on total integration into the West have been defined, but they have not yet been implemented; we are not in the Common Market or in NATO.

[Question] Will the conference therefore be used as a negotiating forum to achieve Spain's "westernization?"

[Answer] No, the conference is an ideal platform for seeing and analyzing what is happening in the world. Hitherto we have been detached from the coordination of groups (the Warsaw Pact, the Common Market, the neutral and nonaligned countries...) and the holding of the conference will help us to enter into more direct relations with these groups. It is a test of what could be a form of full cooperation with the Western countries. This does not mean that the conference will be a game between friends and enemies. Nor do I mean that we will not take advantage of our remaining scope for independence to work for a good result for the conference.

[Question] But the conference is taking place at a delicate moment in the international situation, as evinced for instance, by the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, which could prevent positive results from being achieved in Madrid.

[Answer] It is true that the conference is taking place at a bad and critical moment. The Afghan affair has meant a major decrease in the potential of the conference, which cannot now be held as if nothing had happened. But it is also true that the point of maximum tension and crisis has passed, although the causes of the crisis persist. Both sides can see that new forms of understanding must be sought and the conference can play an important role--on the one hand by further examining the provisions of the final act (technical, political and human cooperation among the signing states), and on the other hand by facilitating further negotiations and initiatives among the members of the conference.

Delicate Topics

[Question] What might be the greatest obstacles to the normal running of the conference?

[Answer] The conference is not the cause, but the effect, of detente and therefore the obstacles do not stem from the conference itself but reflect the outside situation. This is also useful. There is a basic obstacle in the conference's composition, namely, the existence within it of two opposed blocs. Further obstacles will emerge later when the time comes for both sides to assess the implementation and observance of the Helsinki acts, especially with regard to the exercise of human rights. Other controversial elements of foreign policy will also be discussed: the Afghan intervention, the Cuban and Soviet interventions in Africa and in general the elements which have prompted the deterioration of the idyllic atmosphere of detente that existed in the early seventies.

Political and Economic Cooperation

[Question] What benefits could Spain derive from the conference?

[Answer] First, it is beneficial to be represented on an equal footing of participation in international life. Second, as the host country, it is important to give the conference every technical and material opportunity to satisfactorily proceed. If the conference proceeds at all well we will all gain in levels of understanding and detente, not forgetting that the conference has important aspects of political and economic cooperation.

[Question] What are the first preparatory steps that you have planned, as Spain's ambassador?

[Answer] I am at present selecting the Spanish delegation, which will be operatively limited, small. It will include the necessary personnel, basically diplomats, who have already been studying the subject for months. Within the delegation I hope there will be a military representation, which will have to be appointed by the Defense Ministry. This delegation will also be open to include various advisers who can contribute their knowledge or defend our theses on specific topics.

PCE CHIEF CARRILLO TO VISIT PRC 'IN NEXT FEW MONTHS'

LD091131 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 2 Jul 80 p 18

[Unattributed report: "Carrillo To Visit China in Next Few Months"]

[Text] PCE Secretary General Santiago Carrillo is to visit China in the next few months at the invitation of the CCP Central Committee. In preparation for Carrillo's Beijing visit two members of the PCE leadership will visit the Chinese capital in the next few weeks.

This will be the first important meeting between the Spanish and Chinese Communist Parties. It seems that preparations for it were encouraged by PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer, who was in Beijing a couple of months ago at the invitation of the top CCP leaders. The distance between the stances of the Eurocommunist parties and the CPSU has facilitated the rapprochement between the PCE and the Chinese communists.

LINK SEEN BETWEEN GISCARD-BREZHNEV TALKS, SPANISH EEC ENTRY

LD091320 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1130 GMT 9 Jul 80

[Text] Prime Minister Suarez thinks that the French position on the question of Spanish membership in the Common Market could be tied up with the Soviet Union's interest in preventing at all costs the possibility of our joining NATO. This is what is being said in Western diplomatic circles in Madrid and it is an opinion to which considerably plausibility is being attached, DIARIO-16 writes today.

In talks with some of his advisers and other people of importance in various fields, the Spanish prime minister has linked Giscard's slamming the door directly to the meeting which Giscard had with Brezhnev in Poland just before. The version of events which is going around has it that the terms of the deal between Giscard and Brezhnev may have included a promise from Moscow that the French Communist Party would take a quiet line when it comes to next year's presidential elections, the newspaper continues.

The Spanish prime minister is of the opinion that Soviet pressure to keep Spain out of NATO would be assisted if our membership in the EEC were delayed, since, as Foreign Minister Oreja has said, Spain would not contemplate being part of the Western defense system without also being integrated into the West's economic system.

PCE CENTRAL COMMITTEE POLITICAL RESOLUTION

LD261155 Madrid MUNDO OBRERO in Spanish 17 Jun 80 p 4

[Apparent text of political resolution approved at 15-16 June PCE Central Committee meeting: "PCE in Favor of Democratic Majority Alternatives"]

[Text] At the conclusion of the debate on the political situation created in Spain as a result of the motion of censure against the government submitted by the PSOE to the Congress of Deputies, the central committee resolves:

1. To approve the stance adopted by the standing committee and the communist group during the parliamentary debate.

2. Public opinion now expects that this motion will not remain a mere testimonial gesture and will be followed by political action on various levels to really achieve a change of government and a change of policy.

The unblocking of the autonomy process, an approach to the problems of the economic crisis with criteria of solidarity and progress, the defense of public freedoms and human rights, the eradication of terrorism and the guaranteeing of public safety and, together with this, the need for a peaceful, independent and nonaligned foreign policy, imperatively require such a change of government and of policy.

3. The Suarez-Abril Martorell tandem have already amply demonstrated their inability and exhaustion in directing national policy. Citizens were able to ascertain this through radio and television, which broadcast the debate in the Cortes. At the same time, hope for the possibility of a change has been created. In order not to disappoint that hope, the central committee deems it necessary for the forces which supported the censure; in particular the PSOE and the PCE, to take political initiatives aimed at formulating a government alternative which will be possible in this chamber, since it is inconceivable that the present government, which is in a clear minority, should remain so until the 1983 elections, and an early dissolution of the Cortes would not be desirable for democracy and the economy.

A government capable of achieving that majority would have to be based on a leftwing agreement, the nationalist groups and sectors located in the Union of the Democratic Center [UCD]. This does not necessarily imply a split in the UCD: it would be possible as soon as a more open and progressive option that that embodied today by Suarez and Abril prevails in it.

Only an agreement of this kind would make it possible for a new majority to take shape in the present Cortes. If the will to achieve that agreement does not manifest itself, any further submitting of motions of censure would be pointless.

4. In view of this situation, the PCE Central Committee addresses the PSOE, proposing to it that a comparison be made of the two parties' stances on the following topics:

A. How to conduct the action for a new majority, and policies on which this could be based;

B. How to break the deadlock in which the present government's policy has placed the autonomy problems;

C. What is to be done to keep the issue of NATO frozen during this legislative period, and, if the government raises it, to force a situation whereby a decision of this kind would not be made by a simple majority in this Cortes but would be submitted to a national referendum.

In this exchange of views which we propose between the PSOE and the PCE these topics are certainly not exhaustive; the progress of the municipal councils controlled by a left-wing majority and other topics would be included in the agenda we propose.

5. In examining the problems of the economic crisis and its special characteristics, which indicate that it will be protracted, the central committee deemed that the experience of this period demonstrates that the government's economic policy is incapable of extricating the country from stagnation and has caused an increase in unemployment, which at this rate is endangering the development of the democratic process itself.

The traditional liberal bourgeois idea that by increasing productivity, reducing personnel, curbing earnings and reducing taxes you increase the profit margin of employers, who in turn invest, expand their enterprises, create new jobs and restore an upward trend in the business cycle with the pull of the market, is ineffective in this crisis and with its characteristics in Spain.

We are seeing how unemployment is increasing, domestic demand is falling, foreign markets are closing and private investment is inevitably being reduced without prospects of profits.

The implementation of a medium-term economic plan, which will create employment, revive the economy and stimulate demand, by using public funds, private credit and even foreign credit, is the means which we deem most effective for reversing the trend.

But only the state, including in this term not only the central administration but also the autonomous institutions and the municipal councils, can do this. In view of the characteristics of Spanish enterprises, with weak structures--which in many instances need radical reorganization--there are no private capitalist groups capable of being the driving force behind an economic recovery. And we are not questioning here the role of entrepreneurs or of the laws of the market but noting a situation which is as it is and in which, if the state does not resolutely undertake that role, we could change, in the course of the crisis, from being a developing country to being an underdeveloped country.

Certainly, it is necessary to reorganize and democratize public enterprise and reform the administration for the state to be able to undertake that role effectively. Efficient planning and an accumulation and rational distribution of the maximum amount of resources are essntial.

And this option is not determined by preferences for one economic model or another; it is a matter of following the only possible path for reviving the national economy, preserving the interests of the broadest social and economic sectors.

Without prejeudice to certain differences in the PSOE's economic program and in the alternatives advocated by the PCE, there are underlying fundamental points of agreement.

The central committee advises the committee appointed by the executive committee to finalize its economic alternatives to speed up its work, so that a process of consultations and exchanges with other political and social forces in order to seek the broadest possible agreement on these topics can be started in the immediate future.

6. The urgent need for a medium-term plan is clearer when we are witnessing the development of protectionist trends in developed capitalist countries, constant increases in the price of crude and crisis phenomena in the processes of European economic integration, as is indicated by the situation posed for the EEC by Britain, Giscard d'Estaing's statements and the ambiguities of the Venice meeting.

Under these circumstances, a change in the style of Spain's negotiations with the EEC is essential, making them far more open and guaranteeing parliamentary control over them and active participation by the economic and trade union sectors concerned.

It is important for us to enter Europe, but guaranteeing that Spain's interests will not be harmed.

7. Finally, the central committee decided at its plenum to promote the implementation of the decisions made at the meeting of secretaries general of party organizations with a view to revitalizing the party's activity, especially that of its grassroots organizations, and to extending it throughout the country, filling the gaps currently existing, and to all sectors of the people.

The political and organizational strengthening of the party, of its democratic internal life and of its unity in action is essential for accelerating the creation of conditions favorable to unity among the left and the broadest forces and to the attainment of a genuine policy of progress.

NORWEGIAN FOREIGN MINISTER REVIEWS EUROPEAN QUESTIONS

LD080827 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 3 Jul 80 p 8

[Elisabeth Holte report: "Possible Opening for Talks"]

[Text] "After Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt's visit to Moscow we can now glimpse certain possibilities for starting missile talks between East and West," a cautiously optimistic Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund said at his summer press conference yesterday, before beginning his vacation next week. Frydenlund pointed out that the frequent East-West contacts in recent weeks, in Vienna, Warsaw and Moscow, show that there is once again movement in the difficult international situation. But he did not want to go so far as to call it a turning point. Frydenlund's press conference was otherwise dominated by the question of contingency stockpiling of Allied military equipment in northern Norway and his approaching Moscow visit. The foreign minister also announced at the press conference that the Norwegian ambassador in Tel Aviv had informed him that Prime Minister Menahem Begin has urged Maj Sa'ad Haddad, leader of the Christian Phalangist forces, to improve relations with the UN force in southern Lebanon. Some improvement has already been noted in the UN area, after a long period in which there have been considerable problems with Haddad, who has claimed for example that UN soldiers are collaborating with the Palestinians in the area.

As far as the foreign minister's visit to Moscow is concerned, a final date has not yet been set, but Frydenlund will try to have the trip arranged for September. There have been no new signals from Moscow on the unresolved negotiations on the Barents Sea since Ambassador Jens Evensen's visit to Moscow in April of this year. Frydenlund said that it would be natural to bring up the question of Allied contingency stockpiling in northern Norway during his talks in Moscow and he intended to give a full account of the Norwegian view that such stockpiling does not represent any break with traditional Norwegian base policy. It is on the contrary a prerequisite of the policy's credibility, he said. Frydenlund stressed that such stockpiles have become necessary because of the buildup of forces in the seas around northern Norway and that Norway has clearly stated the terms governing such stockpiles--including Norwegian control and Norwegian personnel. He said that they could not be considered a threat to any neighbor, either in size or location. Earlier in the day Frydenlund was in contact with Defense Minister Thorvald Stoltenberg, who is on an official visit to the United States. He was told that Stoltenberg did not have the least impression of American pressure or impatience, because Norway has not yet decided exactly what it wants in this regard.

Under no circumstances can the new NATO missiles be deployed in Western Europe before 1983 and Frydenlund expressed the hope that forthcoming talks would reach a so-called zero option--that the talks will make it unnecessary to deploy new missiles either in the East or the West. However, there can be no doubt that the Labor Party has considerable internal problems regarding contingency stockpiling. When asked if stockpiling would not be as great an internal problem for the Labor Party as the modernization of NATO's European missiles, Frydenlund said that the problem then was that there was not enough time for advance internal discussion of the problem. By ensuring that the government does not reach a decision before the committee under the chairmanship of Secretary of State Bjorn Bruland presents its report in January next year, the Labor Party will this time have the necessary time for an internal settlement. When asked whether it would not be better to wait until after the National Party congress next March to reach a decision on the matter, the foreign minister pointed out that the question has already been discussed in the Storting and other affected bodies. Frydenlund was, however, put under considerable pressure on the question of contingency stockpiling, so that he finally asked sarcastically if this was going to be "the summer's popular song."

The foreign minister is of the opinion that there are a number of important matters which greatly need the pause for thought that the summer holiday represents: The situation in Europe, relations with the Soviet Union, new economic trends in the world, the new missiles in Europe, and Middle East problems. He also said, as a contribution from the public relations department, as he himself put it, that Norway's role has become more interesting recently, first and foremost because of oil. "Norway has a reasonably good reputation in the world, even though I would personally warn against exaggerating the importance Norway can have in an international context," Frydenlund said, commenting on the many eminent foreign leaders who have recently visited Norway.

On the subject of Norway's relations with the EEC countries, which are achieving ever greater integration of their foreign policy, Frydenlund said that it is important to try to prevent a gulf from arising between Norway and the small nations inside the EEC. He believes that an "adjustment" is needed in international cooperation, so that Europe's economic and political strength is better reflected--but without meaning that there is any intention of reducing the U.S. role in the process.

On the future Norwegian line on the question of boycotting South Africa, Frydenlund said that a Dutch proposal including an oil boycott is coming, but that he did not know the details at the moment. He said, however, that it would be natural for the Scandinavian countries to discuss the Dutch move at their foreign ministers' meeting in Oslo at the end of August.

EEC'S JENKINS COMMENTS ON TALKS IN OSLO

LD090909 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 5 Jul 80 p 32

[Unattributed report: "EEC Contact With Scandinavia Strengthened"]

[Text] "I have gained the impression that there is great interest in Norway about the imminent expansion of the EEC. Many have asked if the community is being turned toward the south when first Greece and then Spain and Portugal are joining," EEC Commission President Roy Jenkins said at a press conference to mark the end of his official visit to Oslo. "I can answer that the EEC in the future, too, will strike a balance which is centered on central Europe. The EEC intends to broaden contacts with the nonmembers in Scandinavia. The expansion of the Community will not be allowed to take place at the expense of countries like Norway." Jenkins stated that the Community's expansion and future trade between Norway and the Community were the two most important questions discussed in his talks with Prime Minister Odvar Nordli, Foreign Minister Frydenlund andother Norwegian Government members. He said that even though the present free trade between the EEC and Norway seems good, there is a desire on both sides for greater cooperation. Shipping, foreign exchange policy and energy are areas where further cooperation is possible.

In reply to a question about the EEC's foreign policy cooperation, Roy Jenkins said that he had been led to understand that there was some interest in Norway for some sort of formal Norwegian connection, but the question was not raised by the Norwegians during the talks in Oslo. "The Norwegian Government would like to be kept informed of the EEC's foreign policy cooperation and of the attitudes of the individual member nations, but I think that we both had the view that such information can best be acquired through bilateral contacts with the different member nations." The EEC president was received at an audience with the king on Friday. After the end of the official visit Jenkins and his wife traveled to the Norwegian mountains for a few days holiday before they return to Brussels.

EGYPT'S 'ALI HOLDS 'EXTREMELY CORDIAL' TALK WITH CARRINGTON

NC082040 Cairo MENA in English 2005 GMT 8 Jul 80

[Excerpts] London, July 8--(MENA)--Egyptian Deputy-Premier and Foreign Minister Kamal Hasan 'Ali conferred here today with Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington for about one hour. The meeting, the first between the two men and the first high-level encounter between officials of the two countries since the Venice declaration on the Middle East situation on June 13, was described by well-informed sources here as "extremely cordial". During the meeting, Lord Carrington assured 'Ali that Britain and the European states were keen on providing any help in the interest of peace in the Middle East and that the European initiative did not contradict the Camp David accords or the U.S. efforts to bring about peace in the area.

'Ali exchanged views with Lord Carrington on the latest Middle East developments in the light of the agreement that was reached recently in Washington on the resumption of the Palestinian autonomy negotiations in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, it was learned. 'Ali briefed the British foreign secretary on the reasons that had led to the suspension of the negotiations in May, as well as on the outcome of his recent talks in Washington with American officials. He also briefed Lord Carrington on Egypt's viewpoint on the current Mideast developments and its stance on the Venice declaration.

Lord Carrington, on his part, briefed the Egyptian high-ranking official on the assignment of the EEC mission which will shortly tour a number of Middle East capitals to contact the parties concerned with the Arab-Israeli conflict. The findings of the mission would help forge the EEC's future initiative.

PLO REPRESENTATIVE MEETS WITH FOREIGN OFFICE OFFICIAL

[ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT report]

[Excerpt] London--ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT has learned that the PLO representative in Britain, Nabil ar-Ramlawi for the first time yesterday held an official meeting with a British Foreign Office official inside Foreign Office premises. An Arab diplomatic source described the meeting as a "step forward" in the British official stand. Ar-Ramlawi had gone to the Foreign Office where he met with Mr Miles, the official in charge of the Near East and North Africa section, and discussed with him the latest developments in the Middle East and Palestinian-British relations.

Ar-Ramlawi told ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT that he informed the British official that the PLO considers the Venice European summit declaration a "step forward" on the Palestine problem and the PLO but that, at the same time, the PLO believes that the European stand does not yet measure up to the desired initiative that would deal with all the facts in the area. He also told him that the statement was not comprehensive and did not deal with all the fundamentals of the problem. Nor did the statement refer to the question of recognizing the PLO and the Palestinian people's right to return and to establish their own independent state, which are basic factors in any just and lasting peace in the area.

For his part the British official explained his country's attitude and the European stand, saying that it represents a first step toward comprehensive peace.

It was learned yesterday that the fact-finding mission which the Venice summit decided to send to the Middle East will begin its mission at the end of July under the chairmanship of Luxembourg Foreign Minister Gaston Thorn. Ar-Ramlawi said that the PLO will meet the mission if it is asked to meet it officially and publicly.

GOVERNMENT TO CHECK REPORTS OF NATO BASES IN NORTH

[Text] Abu as-Sa'id Qirawiyah, PLO representative in Nicosia, was received today by President Kiprianou to whom he conveyed a personal message from the leader of the organization, Mr 'Arafat. 'Arafat's message analyzes the latest developments in the region, conveys his thanks on Cyprus' support to the Palestinian people's struggle and expresses the wish for a truly independent and united Cyprus.

SPOKESMAN DENIES TURKEY PROMISED TO RETURN FAMAGUSTA

NC071140 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 7 July 80

[Text] In reference to a press report yesterday that Turkey had promised to return Famagusta to its citizens but had failed to keep its promise after Cyprus' rejection of the American plan to resolve the Cyprus issue, the government spokesman stated that the content of the report is misleading. He stressed: No promise by Turkey on the return of Famagusta to its Greek Cypriot citizens has been mentioned to the Cyprus Government. On the contrary, he added, in his contacts with the Cyprus Government the American side's representative has continuously stated that the Turkish side had never promised that Famagusta would be returned. Moreover, the government spokesman concluded, the Turkish side's main argument in rejecting the American plan was based on the plan's provision on Famagusta.

KIPRIANOU CITES NEED FOR DIALOGUE WITH TURKEY

NC061236 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 6 Jul 80

[Excerpts] President Kiprianou has stressed: If the Turks are ready for an honorable dialogue to find a Cyprus solution that is based on a biregional federation, then we are ready to sit at the negotiating table and seriously negotiate.

President Kiprianou was speaking in Limassol last night at a gathering of DIKO [Democratic Party] leading members in Limassol and its suburbs. He added: If the Turks are not ready for such a dialogue, then our struggle will continue until they are. At the same time, he said, we will strengthen our domestic front by consciously realizing the crucial state of the times and our responsibilities and we will continue and intensify our crusade internationally. He stressed: Only through constant internationalization [of the Cyprus issue] and world pressure will Turkey abandon its unacceptable positions. President Kiprianou went on: We have systematically knocked on all doors and will continue to do so even more intensively whether in the West, the East or in the nonaligned area. We will always keep the Cyprus issue within the United Nations, having as a target the implementation of the UN resolutions, which contain all the essential prerequisites for a just and lasting solution that would safeguard the prosperity of all Cypriot people, both Greeks and Turks alike, and security in the area.

Mr Kiprianou then referred to the need for unity of the state and people. He said: I do not oppose anyone and I call on everyone to join in a democratic dialogue in order to ascertain our points of disagreement and whether we can restore general unity on the national issue. He stressed: I am ready to discuss the line and tactics of the struggle, both inside and outside the national council, with anyone who holds a responsible position. However, until the people's unity is attained, it is imperative to strengthen DIKO's ranks so that it may play its decisive role in correctly promoting the national issue and strengthening the country's leadership. He added: Of course, in this unity I do not include the unrepentent coupists.

President Kiprianou went on to say that, in the present circumstances, it is impermissible for the criteria for promoting the national issue to be personal or partisan. He stressed: It is absolutely impermissible and inconceivable that parties, for strictly partisan reasons, will not be participating in the rally to protest the Turkish invasion. I am confident that Eleftheria Square will be flooded with people on 21 July. He added: Those who portray themselves as defenders of the line and name of Makarios have forgotten that Makarios, together with the organizations, established this annual rally [marking the sixth anniversary of the Turkish invasion] as a show of resistance against the Turkish invasion. President Kiprianou called on the parties to revise their stand on the rally, which, he said, was of a nonpartisan nature.

Comments on Makarios Policy

NC081849 Nicosia Domestic Television Service in Greek 1730 GMT 8 Jul 80

[Text] Today President Kiprianou stressed: We are ready for an honorable dialogue on the basis of the 19 May agreement, but we will simultaneously and systematically mobilize ourselves even more in the international field to create the suitable prerequisites so that Turkey can be pressured to abandon its expansionist policy and finally accept a reasonable and nationally acceptable Cyprus solution. President Kiprianou was speaking today at a meeting of leading members of the Democratic Party [DIKO] of Nicosia Town and District. He also stressed: We are not intransigent, as some people try to depict us. We do not lack courage, as some people try to depict us. We have the courage to agree to an acceptable solution, but we also have the courage to reject an unacceptable solution.

The president of the republic also declared that the policy being followed was charted by the late President Makarios and was aimed at a truly independent, free, integral, sovereign, nonaligned and demilitarized state. President Kiprianou stressed: It is a policy that aims at safeguarding, not selling out, the people's rights. He added: Makarios accepted federation and moreover, biregional federation. I repeat that this is the position we also accept. However, Makarios never agreed to sell out the people's rights, nor did he accept any form of confederation or any partitionist solution. The president of the republic stressed: I categorically state that the leadership of this country will never accept a partitionist solution, because this would be tantamount to Cyprus' committing suicide and thus its final destruction.

President Kiprianou again called on the responsible representatives of the people to weigh their duties so that a dialogue might start and the correct line be established--the line of Cyprus' salvation, the line of an honorable solution--to utilize Makarios' line as he himself conceived it and repeatedly explained it. President Kiprianou said: Party disagreements may exist and are permissible on other issues, but on the national issue the people must be united in targets, aims and line so that the Turkish side will stop hoping for the possibility that our front will collapse because of our own conflict, as was also the case to a certain extent in the past. In conclusion, the president of the republic called on everyone to be present at the 21 July rally on Eleftheria Square so that the indomitable Cypriot people can once again demonstrate their determination to continue the struggle for the country's salvation and vindication.

PURGE ISSUE PROMPTS HOUSE RESOLUTION, GOVERNMENT STATEMENT

House Resolution

NC032006 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1900 GMT 3 Jul 80

[Excerpts] The House of Representatives concluded tonight its debate on the purge issue, submitted by Deputy Papaioannou, with the approval of a resolution submitted jointly by the Democratic Party and AKEL. This resolution states that the issue of the purge remains open. The resolution was approved with 19 votes in favor and 5 abstentions.

The resolution adds that, guided by the national interest and for the service of the Cyprus struggle, the house urges the government to take, as soon as possible, all the necessary measures for the return to Cyprus of the archcoupist Sampson so that he may complete the rest of his sentence. The resolution further calls on the government to bring to court, as soon as possible, the ministers of the coupist government of Sampson for taking part in the coup and to take all the necessary measures to insure that those responsible for crimes before, during and after the junta-fascist coup are arrested and brought to justice to pay the consequences of their crimes. Finally, the resolution asks the government to implement without further delay or loss of time the measures that the president of the republic announced in 1978 regarding those who illegally possess arms and to punish as an example those who commit illegal acts.

Official Government Statement

NC041612 Nicosia Public Information Office in English 4 Jul 80

[Press release of 4 July 1980 official government statement on purge]

[Text] On account of the discussion of the question of the purge in the House of Representatives and the adoption of a relevant resolution, the government wishes to repeat its position on this matter. The government regards the enormous question of treachery and of apportioning of responsibilities to those mainly responsible for the calamity of our country as open. This question will be closed only when the file of treachery is opened and all those who are in any way involved in or contributed to the hideous crime against our country are punished. This position was declared very recently by the president of the republic, who said: "The question of the treachery has not been closed nor has the file of Cyprus. At the right moment the file will be opened and the responsibilities of those mainly responsible will be established."

As regards the purge in the public service, it is stressed that there has been no deviation from the procedures envisaged in the relevant legislation approved by the House of Representatives. The charges made in this connection against the president and the government in the House of Representatives yesterday are, to say the least, unfair and objectively unfounded.

It would be advisable to recall the objective difficulties which appeared in the implementation of this legislation. As previously stated, the evidence given to the disciplinary boards in several cases was far from giving a complete picture of the activities of the accused, at least as these emerged from the original complaints. The unwillingness of several prosecution witnesses, including present critics of the government, to state all they knew about the activities of the accused and the change of initial statements by witnesses made it impossible for the competent organs to establish the real truth regarding the guilt or the degree of responsibility of each accused person. Moreover, persons who at first appeared as accusers of coupists later turned into their defenders or gave vague and evasive replies. The result was that some of the accused against whom there were complaints about serious acts or omissions aimed at the consolidation of the coup, were acquitted of the charges against them or were found guilty of secondary disciplinary offences. Also, it should not escape our attention that under the legislation the purge would cover only the cases of civil servants who involved themselves in the coup, and as regards the nongovernment sector, the cases of unrepentent persons.

Speaking in this spirit in the House of Representatives on October 30, 1975, the AKEL deputy Mr A Ziartidhis said: "Our party, which believed that the purge had to be carried out one day and punishment had to be meted out--did not encourage--and I repeat this--this popular demand. Nor did it foster it. We were aware of the existing difficulties and these difficulties were very great. Far from encouraging and fostering among the people the demand for punishment and purge, we were among those who warmly supported the policy of oblivion and amnesty. I know his beatitude did not need our encouragement to declare the policy of oblivion--the decision was his but if he needed encouragement at the time we would give it to him because we believe that that was the right policy at the time."

The government in its desire to expedite the implementation of the purge procedure made use also of the powers vested in it by the relevant law and removed immediately from their posts, in the public interest, a number of persons who served in the public service, the educational service and the security forces. It should be repeated that no compensation has been paid to dismissed employees. Regarding any pension rights, the matter has been left to be settled after their recourses to the supreme court have been tried.

Concerning the Sampson question, the government's decision to temporarily suspend his sentence and allow him to go abroad for medical treatment was based on recommendations by medical boards, which included specialists invited from abroad, and on the advice of the attorney general of the republic. Furthermore, regarding the suspension of Sampson's sentence, the president of the republic had in good time briefed all the political parties, which did not react. As already announced, the government is taking the necessary measures for Sampson's return to Cyprus to serve the remainder of his sentence. The government is taking all necessary measures and the appropriate services are examining the files of the person who may be involved in the perpetration of murders during the coup, with a view to bringing them before justice. Finally, it stated that the government will consider very carefully yesterday's resolution by the House of Representatives and will take the necessary decisions.

AKEL Statement

NC050738 Nicosia O AGON in Greek 5 Jul 80 p 8

[Text of 4 July AKEL spokesman's statement on official government statement on purge]

[Text] With its statement, the government has most shamefully misrepresented and distorted the clear stance taken by the AKEL-leftwing parliamentary group in October 1975 on the purge issue. The government excerpted a paragraph from the speech made by Deputy A. Ziartidhis during the debate on the relevant bill. The obvious intention of this malevolent distortion was to portray the AKEL-leftwing parliamentary group as opposing the purge. The dimensions of the distortion in the government statement become apparent by merely reading the minutes of the relevant house session at which the leftwing parliamentary group, through a special resolution and explicit speeches by its members, demanded a complete purge and exemplary punishment of the coupists. For the sake of truth, the relevant minutes of the house session, which the government, through the public information office, has invoked in its shameful attempt at distortion, will be released tomorrow, Saturday.

[Text] Prime Minister Rallis received Colombian Foreign Minister Vargas at the political office and discussed various issues with him. Earlier, Vargas, who has been in Athens since yesterday on an unofficial [as heard] visit, had a talk with Foreign Minister Mitsotakis. During this meeting the two ministers expressed their satisfaction with the good relations between Greece and Colombia. Mitsotakis accepted an invitation by Vargas to pay an official visit to Colombia. The two ministers also agreed that a mission of Greek experts will visit Colombia to study issues of economic cooperation and, specifically, possibilities of purchasing Colombian coal for Greek energy program needs.

I AVYI REPORTS RESIGNATION OF EDIK SECRETARY GENERAL

AT081533 Athens I AVYI in Greek 4 Jul 80 p 1

[Excerpt] I AVYI has learned that about a month ago the secretary general of EDIK, Kostas Tsirimokos, submitted his resignation to chairman of the party I. Zigdhis.

As of yesterday EDIK had not made any statement. However, certain reports mention that Tsirimokos' resignation is not unconnected with consultations which are taking place among centrist forces, especially with efforts for their reunification.

Tsirimokos had dropped the idea of reunifying the centrist forces under a collective leadership. Zigdhis did not reject that idea; actually he showed that in principle he agreed with it. But he avoided undertaking an effective initiative which, according to Tsirimokos, could have led to implementation of the idea.

FOREIGN MINISTER ERKMEN DEPARTS FOR 3-DAY VISIT TO BULGARIA

TA090913 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 0900 GMT 9 Jul 80

[Text] Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen left today for an official visit to Bulgaria. In a statement at Istanbul's Yesilkoy Airport, Erkmen said that during his visit beneficial talks would be held on the subject of further promoting relations between the two countries. Recalling that the declaration of neighborly relations signed between Turkey and Bulgaria in 1975 was being fully implemented, Erkmen said bilateral agreements in the fields of cultural relations, transportation and foreign trade between the two countries were still in effect. Erkmen said that work would be conducted for the orderly implementation of the agreements existing between Turkey and Bulgaria. Erkmen's visit to Bulgaria will last 3 days.

In his message to the new Jordanian prime minister, Demirel expressed his good wishes.

ISLAMIC MAYORS DISCUSSION OF COOPERATION, JERUSALEM ISSUE

TA031157 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 3 Jul 80

[Text] The mayors of Islamic countries' capitals, who are currently in Ankara for the administration council meeting of the union of their municipalities, were received separately by Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel and Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen today. Demirel received the mayors at the prime minister's office at 1100. The mayors of Riyadh, Kuala Lumpur, Jerusalem [as heard], Conakry, Islamabad, Amman, Mecca, Baghdad and Ankara attended the meeting. Before that, the Islamic mayors were received by Erkmen.

In a statement during the meeting, Erkmen stressed the importance of the Islamic Conference decisions determining the Islamic character of the Arab territories occupied by Israel and especially of Jerusalem. Erkmen noted that the close cooperation among Islamic countries should be strengthened by governments and municipalities as well as by the people. Ankara Mayor Ali Dincer briefed Erkmen on the meetings of the union. Dincer said that Israel's moves to make Jerusalem its capital and the attacks against certain Arab mayors in the occupied territories were denounced during the administrative council meeting. Dincer also announced that a research group was being formed to deal with the problems of Islamic capitals' municipalities and that the municipalities would hold joint symposiums, seminars and education meetings.

INVESTIGATIONS INTO CORUM INCIDENTS CONTINUE

Interior Minister's Briefing for Caglayangil

[Text] Acting President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil received Interior Minister Mustafa Gulcugil at the Cankaya Mansion at 1200 today. The meeting was held at the invitation of the acting president. The interior minister briefed him on the incidents that had occurred and the measures which were taken in Corum. Gendarme Commander Gen Sedat Celasun and Security Director General Ismail Dokuzoglu were also present at the meeting.

'Sensitive Areas Meeting'

TA072032 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 7 Jul 80

[Text] A meeting was held under the chairmanship of Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel in Ankara to discuss the situation in areas where, to prevent anarchy, state forces must be kept ready to intervene more effectively and quickly.

In a statement before the "sensitive areas meeting," Demirel said that a general assessment will be made on anarchy, destructiveness and secessionism and that the steps taken in this struggle will be reviewed. In reply to a question, Demirel said that meetings were held on the Corum incidents the day before yesterday and yesterday and that the issue might again be discussed at the meeting. The meeting which began at the prime minister's office at 1830 lasted 3 hours. No statement was issued after the meeting. Ministers of State Orhan Eren and Ekrem Ceyhun, Justice Minister Omer Ucuzal, Interior Minister Mustafa Gulcugil and Gendarme Commander Gen Sedat Celasun participated in the "sensitive areas meeting," in which all aspects of the situation were assessed and efforts to fight anarchy were reviewed. The National Intelligence Organization under secretary, the chairman of the Martial Law Coordination Council, the Interior Ministry under secretary and the security director general were also present at the meeting.

Military Commanders' Visit

TA081148 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 8 Jul 80

[Text] Investigation is continuing into the Corum incidents of last Friday in which 22 persons were killed and 36 others wounded. Corum Prosecutor Ertem Turker said that the situation was calm in the city and that the security forces were continuing their operations. Chief of the General Staff Gen Kenan Evren, Ground Forces Commander Gen Nurettin Ersin, Air Force Commander Gen Tahsin Sahinkaya and Gendarme Commander Gen Sedat Celasun went to Corum today. A statement by the Office of the Chief of the General Staff says that General Evren and the commanders accompanying him will proceed from Corum to Amasya, Samsun and Ordu for inspections. The chief of the general staff and the commanders accompanying him will return to Ankara tomorrow.

NSP Leader on Government Partiality

[Text] National Salvation Party deputy leader Suleyman Arif Emre has expressed the view that the Corum incidents occurred as a result of government partiality. Emre has said: This fire can only be extinguished by a peaceful and impartial administration.

In a written statement issued in Ankara today, Emre said the party leaders, who are taking sides regarding anarchic incidents and who have made enmity a basis for their policy, are responsible for the current situation in the country. Pointing out that the political party leaders should cease accusing each other at a time when citizens are shedding each other's blood, Emre called on the party leaders to display a peaceful and fraternal attitude and unite against anarchy. Noting that it is now evident that biased parties cannot govern the country, Emre said: Unless these parties withdraw and yield the power to National Salvation, there will not be a just and impartial administration in the country and the situation will worsen daily.

VOTCP Accusations

TA081101 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0800 GMT 8 Jul 80

[Text] The death toll in last Friday's Corum incidents, which were provoked by the Demirel government, the Nationalist Action Party [NAP] fascists, the Corum governor and the Corum security director, has risen to 21. More than 40 persons were also seriously injured. It has been ascertained that this mass murder, reminiscent of that which occurred in Kahramanmaras, was carried out by fascist murderers trained at the Karabaglar NAP Camp, in Izmir. In Corum the fascists also destroyed the houses and shops of persons affiliated with the RPP and known as progressives.

Reports published in newspapers on Sunday and Monday claim that the death toll is much higher than the official figure. They point out that most of the murdered citizens were Alawites and that most of them had suffered atrocious torture before being killed by the fascists. Both HURRIYET and CUMHURIYET report that the fascists used the social security hospital building in Corum as their headquarters, transforming its basement into an arsenal and using it to torture their victims. The report adds that police forces were on guard around the hospital in accordance with the request of a hospital official. Efforts were made to keep the soldiers away from the hospital. Cries of "death to those who defend the communists" were heard from the hospital when the soldiers tried to protect the people.

It has been ascertained that the mass murder in Corum was planned and perpetrated by the fascist NAP. Members of the ETKO [Army for the Liberation of Enslaved Turks], the clandestine terrorist organization affiliated with the NAP and trained at the Karabaglar Camp, were brought to Corum from Izmir in a big red truck 24 hours before the bloody incidents. Acting on a tip from a news agency, the Izmir forces raided the Karabaglar Camp, where 350 persons between the ages of 14 and 22 belonging to the NAP or the idealist clubs were being trained for mass murders by a number of retired officers belonging to NAP. It was these youngsters who were transported from the camp to Corum in a red Ford truck on Thursday, a day before the incidents. The Izmir security forces which raided the camp on Friday discovered that the camp had already been evacuated.

INDEPENDENT DEPUTY JOINS RPP; ECEVIT COMMENTS

TA081136 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 8 Jul 80

[Text] Deputy Serafettin Elci, an independent from Mardin, has joined the RPP. As a result the number of RPP seats in the National Assembly has risen to 209. In a statement at the ceremony held at the parliament building on this occasion, RPP leader Bulent Ecevit warned that the fascist danger has reappeared in Turkey in larger proportions. Ecevit added that the Turkish people's firm belief in the democratic system would deal with this threat.

COUNCIL OF EUROPE CONFERENCE RESOLUTION ON AFGHANISTAN

ID031416 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1300 GMT 3 Jul 80

[Text] Parliamentarians of the Council of Europe, who are meeting in Madrid, this morning agreed on a resolution which says that the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan compromises and destroys the spirit of Helsinki. The Italian delegate abstained from voting on the resolution.

The most important matter at this morning's session was the subject of European security and cooperation. On this point the contribution which captured most interest was that made by the political affairs committee, whose report was drawn up by Spanish Senator Jose Luis Lopez Henares.

In his report Lopez Henares said that the invasion of Afghanistan and the detention of Sakharov have damaged the policy of detente and have led to a deterioration in East-West relations, particularly between the United States and the USSR. In this situation, the Spanish senator said, the specter of the cold war rises again and will hang over the Madrid conference.

WIENER ZEITUNG: NEW EASTERN MBFR INITIATIVE EXPECTED

[APA report: "New Eastern Initiative at Forces Reduction Talks?"]

[Text] In the wake of the recent talks between Soviet state and party chief Leonid Brezhnev and FRG Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, the Soviet Union will today present a new proposal at the Vienna negotiations on reduction of troops in Central Europe which aims at "bringing the talks out of the current impasse." This was said by informed conference circles on Wednesday. For the time being no details were revealed about the contents of this initiative, but it was said that with this step the Eastern side intends to accomodate certain Western ideas regarding the reduction procedure.

The NATO states have repeatedly pointed out that the greatest difficulty for a reduction agreement is the numerical superiority, existing according to Western information, by about 150,000 men of the Eastern armed forces in the Central European region. The Eastern side, on the other hand, stresses that there is an approximate military balance in Central Europe, and that the main stumbling block at the negotiations is the Western refusal to stipulate as early as in the first phrase, which is to affect only the armed forces of the Soviet Union and of the United States, fixed reduction quotas for the other states concerned as well.

EUROPARLIAMENT COMMISSION DEBATE ON MADRID CSCE CONFERENCE

LD080841 Paris LE MONDE in French 26 Jun 80 p 4

[M.S. report: "The European Parliament Political Commission Advocates Participation in the Madrid Conference"]

[Text] Brussels--The European Parliament Political Commission organized a public debate on 23-24 June in Brussels on the preparation for the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE), which is to begin on 11 November in Madrid. The 2-day session will culminate in the compilation of a report which will be submitted to the vote of the Strasbourg assembly at its October session. The European representatives should recommend to the national governments of the EEC to go to the Spanish capital determined to make the Soviet Union respect its obligations on human rights enshrined in the Helsinki Final Act. This is the common stance which has become clear during the Brussels discussions.

Only the French Communists, contesting the choice of international experts who were invited to speak, rejected solidarity with their colleagues. Denis left the hall right at the beginning of the meeting after declaring that the political commission's initiative is a "cold war operation."

"The Community and its Western partners must not renew the error of Helsinki and Belgrade. The Nine can no longer allow themselves to be carried onto the ground which interests the Soviets, namely, economic cooperation, without demanding something in return in the other areas of cooperation, namely, security and human rights."

This was how Estier, (French Socialist), vice president of the political commission, summed up the debates.

All the speeches went in the same direction: the three facets of the CSCE, namely, security, economy and trade and human rights, must be closely linked. But despite Afghanistan, despite the fate reserved for dissidents in the Soviet Union and the Eastern bloc countries, there has never been any question of advocating a boycott of the Madrid conference. Only Vladimir Bukovskiy considered it necessary to set a preliminary condition. According to the Soviet writer, "before going to Madrid, the Western countries must require the Kremlin to honor in their entirety the eight points on human rights included in the Helsinki act."

EEC TO REVITALIZE TIES WITH TURKEY AFTER BRUSSELS TALKS

[Own correspondent Philippe Lemaitre report: "Cooperation With Turkey Resumed]

[Excerpt] Brussels (European Communities)--Cooperation between the EEC and Turkey, which has been in a state of limbo for several years now, is going to be somewhat resumed. In particular, financial aid provided by the Community will increase palpably over the coming years. An effort will also be made to facilitate Turkish agricultural produce entering the markets of the Nine. These are the results of the association council which met on 30 June in Brussels. Turkish Foreign Minister Erkmen on this occasion repeated this country's intention to submit a formal demand for membership of the EEC in the coming months.

USSR PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION ARRIVES IN VIENNA

AU081315 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 8 Jul 80 p 2

[Summary] On Monday, 7 July, an eight-member Soviet parliamentary delegation arrived at Vienna-Schwechat Airport for a 1-week visit to Austria. It includes Ivan Kebin, deputy chairman of the USSR Supreme Soviet Presidium, and Konstantin Belyak, USSR minister of machine building for animal husbandry and fodder production. The Soviet guests had a talk with Nationalrat and Bundesrat deputies on Monday afternoon. On Tuesday and Wednesday they will visit several enterprises in Styria and Carinthia, and on Thursday they will return to Vienna, where some more talks and visits are scheduled.

LEBANESE FOREIGN MINISTER CONCLUDES OFFICIAL VISIT

[Special DIE PRESSE report by "L.M."]

[Text] Vienna--After a second, shorter talk with Foreign Minister Pahr and a reception by President Kirchschlaeger, Fu'ad Butrus, Lebanese deputy prime minister and foreign minister, concluded his official 3-day visit to Austria and flew back to Beirut on Wednesday afternoon.

In a talk with DIE PRESSE, Butrus confirmed that he had discussed with his Austrian opposite number primarily the Middle East problem and the prospects of solving the Palestinian question, taking into consideration the rights of the Palestinians. According to Butrus, he and Pahr also discussed possibilities for solving the Lebanon problem in the framework of the Middle East crisis, as well as the need for Lebanon's survival despite the crisis. The talks did not touch on economic questions.

At a dinner given in his honor Butrus expressed the conviction that the difficulties in Lebanon could be overcome once the Palestinian problem is solved. In reply to the question whether the establishment of a Palestinian state would ease the Palestinian problem in Lebanon, Butrus replied that this depended on where this state would be established, and whether this would be done with the consent of the Palestinians and the Arab states. If so, this would indeed ease the situation in Lebanon, since in that case the Palestinians would no longer be refugees even if they were to stay in the country, and they would no longer have any reason to fight for a homeland.

As far as the Syrian troops in Lebanon are concerned, he said, it is true that they have not reached all the goals they had set for themselves. Meanwhile they have been regrouped, but the present situation in the country does not permit their withdrawal. He said he hopes that the domestic political development and the Lebanese Army's recovery of its strength at a later time would make possible a withdrawal of the Syrians.

As far as the PLO is concerned, he declared, his country has recognized it--taking into consideration the realities--as the legitimate representative of the Palestinians. The Camp David agreement was rejected by his government, together with the other Arab states, at the Baghdad conference.

BELGIAN FOREIGN MINISTER ON EUROMISSILES, MADRID CONFERENCE

LD071527 Brussels LE SOIR in French 29-30 Jun 80 p 3

[Francis Unwin report: "Nothomb and the Euromissiles: Preserving Our Prestige or Making Speeches"]

[Text] On his return from Ankara Foreign Minister Nothomb drew certain conclusions from the 25-26 June NATO ministerial session. In particular he was pleased at the understanding for the Belgian viewpoint which gave priority to the negotiation element in the 12 December declaration (the decision to equip with Pershing-2 missiles and cruise missiles; offer of negotiations to the USSR). He recalled what for him must be the main aim of our diplomacy at the moment: preserving Belgium's credibility. Which implies, although the minister did not say so explicitly, that the Belgian decision to deploy 48 cruise missiles by 1983 cannot be deferred indefinitely.

The minister expressed pleasure at the statement made in Ankara by his German counterpart, Genscher, who virtually urged those colleagues who would find it useful to also make an "exploratory trip" to Moscow. But he considered it impossible for Belgium, on pain of losing all prestige, to at least await (as Van Miert proposes) the results of the Madrid Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE) at the end of the year before making known its decision on deploying cruise missiles.

"It is a question," he said, "of choosing between a stance that is definite and one that is not. It is easy to make speeches on disarmament at Habay-la-Neuve but we might question their practical use."

And he dwelt, in the light of this, on the final paragraph of the Ankara communique, which emphasizes that NATO's needs in terms of Euromissiles "will be examined in the light of the concrete results obtained by negotiation."

On the subject of the Madrid conference, he noted that this communique took up the French proposal already formulated in December 1979 in Brussels on seeking a mandate for further negotiations, still under the aegis of the CSCE, on "measures of confidence, significant on the military level (that is going beyond the framework of simple notification of maneuvers), able to be verified and applicable to the whole of the European Continent, that is notably to the entire European part of the Soviet Union."

But the implication is still that conducting this further conference will depend on the results obtained in Madrid, and that one cannot really imagine the USSR accepting the principle of these "verifiable" measures.

SCHMIDT INTERVIEWED ON RELATIONS WITH FRANCE

LD081149 Paris LE FIGARO in French 7 Jul 80 pp 1, 2

[Christine Clerc and Jean-Paul Picaper interview with FRG Chancellor Helmut Schmidt: "Helmut Schmidt: Unity of Views With France"--date and place of interview not given]

[Text] Question: Is it now possible to talk of "Helmut Schmidt and Giscard d'Estaing" in the same way as people once spoke of "Charles de Gaulle and Konrad Adenauer?"

Answer: I think it is. This is a continuity which it is important to stress. Since the Elysee Treaty, which is associated with the names of Adenauer and De Gaulle, French-German cooperation has been substantially developed and this is not solely dependent on the friendship which binds President Giscard d'Estaing and myself; this cooperation now covers vast spheres of French and German policy, the French and German economies and also the two countries' cultural life. The fact that a political book written by Valery Giscard d'Estaing has been translated into German and published here although it only deals with French politics is significant and shows the interest Germany has in France, and it is equally significant that the modest work I wrote (note 1: "The Desire for Peace") should be published in France. I believe it is possible to say that the desire for cooperation has never before been so great in European history. Since you are making the comparison with De Gaulle and Adenauer I would add that this is especially the case in the foreign policy sphere.

Question: Do the French overestimate German power?

Answer: The French know that France and Germany have different influences according to the sphere in question. The German nation is divided and that constitutes not only a serious handicap in foreign policy but also a wound in the German nation's soul--a wound which cannot be healed in the short term. On that score France has no problems.

On the other hand in the economic sphere Germany might seem particularly well placed to some French people. However, the French should not forget that they have an extremely rich economy and that their technology is a world leader. The nuclear power stations, computers and also traditional industries such as automobile manufacturing and ship building bear witness to that. France is a leading industrialized nation just like Germany, both suffering from the serious handicap of having no raw materials of their own. Both are forced to feed themselves by their intelligence and their work.

There are three significant differences in France's favor. France is a military nuclear power, Germany is not, does not want to become one and should not become one in the view of all our European partners, including France.

Second--Even if this point is less important--France has the right of veto in the Security Council where we have neither a permanent seat nor the right of veto.

Third--and this is much more important--we Germans depend on the guarantee of other states, namely France, the United States and Britain, for Berlin's freedom. You give a guarantee, therefore, and we receive it. I think that the Germans are well aware of all that.

In addition, I would like to stress that our conventional army is, of course, very sound and we cooperate within the same defensive alliance, but since France has moved away from the alliance somewhat on the military integration plane since the General's days, it is only natural that Germany should have more influence within that alliance although it is a nonnuclear power. On the other hand France has more freedom to maneuver than us.

What we must point out to the Germans and to the French is their consensus on central - strategic questions: First on the desire for close cooperation between France and Germany after the Elysee Treaty; second, on the desire to give the European Community its own identity; third on the desire to belong to the Atlantic alliance for similar reasons, namely the common conviction that in face of the Soviet Union's vast military and political power we need an adequate Western counterbalance in Europe. When I read, for instance, what President Giscard d'Estaing said 2 weeks ago on the decision France is going to make in the nuclear armaments sphere, the reasons involved by the president of the republic seem to me to be very similar to the reasons which have led us to place German territory at the disposal of U.S. nuclear arms.

We both want to maintain a balance in Europe in face of the Soviets' vast power. I am anxious to stress this.

There is another point of agreement which I would like to emphasize: the mutual desire to cooperate with the Soviet Union and the East European states on the basis of this balance, in other words to practise what is known as the detente policy. In view of the military intervention in Afghanistan, President Giscard d'Estaing and I published a joint statement last February, which I regard as fundamental, in which we told the whole world and the Soviet Union that the intervention in Afghanistan jeopardizes that detente.

We agree on that point too. We are also agreed on the tone which the French president took with the Soviet General Secretary Brezhnev in Warsaw 3 weeks ago and the tone which I also took with the Soviet general secretary in Moscow last week We could not be closer to each other and nobody can be more aware of this than the Soviet general secretary. It would be a good thing for all German and French people to realize it too.

The German Nation Is Particularly Exposed

Question: Would you hope that France might be prepared to fight a "forward battle" to protect Germany?

Answer: There are joint NATO deployment plans in which the French Army is not included since France adheres to the treaty but does not take part in military integration. That is a distinction which European newspapers frequently disregard. However, France maintains forces to the east of its border on German territory and I have no doubt at all that those forces would really fight in an emergency. I am sure that France will not withdraw its troops at the very moment when they are needed. Otherwise their presence on German territory would be pointless. Our mutual understanding is such that I am fully confident.

As regards the neutron bomb, this is how I understood what the president of the republic announced: France has revealed that it is technically capable of developing such weapons and that it is on the point of doing so. However, it announced at the same time that the real decision to put these weapons into mass production and introduce them into the French Army would be made at a later date. I have nothing to add. It is a very natural option.

What struck me as more important in the president's press conference 2 weeks ago is that it clearly reflects the intention to modernize not only neutron tactical weapons [as published] but also the entire deterrent force. [paragraph continues]

This intention to modernize is based on the same reasons as the decision taken by the NATO council last December. I find this logical and necessary and I conclude that the French and German leaders have the same views on this question too.

It is naturally in Germany's interest for negotiations to take place and for limitations to be effectively agreed since German territory is clearly one of the main targets for such weapons and hence the German nation is particularly exposed. That is one of the reasons why I advocated opening dialogue on mutual limitations between the Soviet Union and the United States when I was in Moscow last week.

As for the question of a joint French-German defense system, I think I have already answered it implicitly.

"Brezhnev Does Not Intend To Deceive Me"

Question: Following your visit to Moscow and President Valery Giscard d'Estaing's visit to Warsaw, French public opinion is wondering whether Brezhnev did not deceive you both? Is he not pretending to grant concessions in order to consolidate Soviet nuclear superiority? Is he not using all possible means to prevent the deployment of U.S. Pershing missiles in Europe?

Answer: President Giscard d'Estaing is much too shrewd to be deceived by anybody in international affairs. I am guilty of believing that the same is true of me. I would add that Leonid Brezhnev and the Soviet leaders are also much too shrewd to think that they could deceive Giscard or Schmidt. Nor will they cherish the illusion that they can isolate France or Germany from the Western Alliance. Furthermore they will not believe that they can prevent France from modernizing its nuclear weapons or prevent Germany from implementing the modernization decision taken by NATO last December.

The Soviet leaders are all capable of seeing the clarity, determination and unanimity with which France and Germany have acted in this sphere not only in the last 4 weeks but in recent decades. The Soviets are not under any illusions. Anybody in France who reads the speech I made in the Kremlin on Monday evening cannot doubt that nobody could deceive me.

Neither France nor Germany believes it is a good thing to insult a world power which, like the Soviet Union, values its respectability. Although we speak firmly and clearly we remain polite. We are dealing with a power which knows that we would have to draw conclusions from the maintenance of Soviet troops in Afghanistan and that we are on the point of drawing conclusions if the Soviets' Eurostrategic weapons are not limited by negotiations.

Reunification: The Task of the Next Century

Question: Some people fear that Germany will try to bring about its reunification at the price of neutrality.

Answer: I told you at the beginning: The split in the German nation will be a painful wound as long as it lasts. Germans of both East and West are striving to heal this wound. At present it does not seem possible to me. And I think it probable that this is a task for the next century. I cannot see so far ahead. I am neither a prophet nor a meterologist.

But one thing is certain: The Germans will not abandon their desire to live under one and the same roof. If France were divided, no French person would abandon this desire. I do not think that in the long term this striving can be satisfied by paying a price, as you put it. I believe rather that there will be progress in cooperation in the whole of Europe, which will make the present division of Germany gradually less perceptible.

Naturally we touched on these questions in the Kremlin. But both of us knew that these are problems belonging to a more remote future for which there is no possibility of a solution at present. Present relations between the two German states were also touched on in Moscow, but this is not a question to be dealt with in any third country.

In these relations between the two German states and among the people who live there, we have made some considerable progress. But this progress cannot satisfy us. For us, the most important thing would be for the Germans of the GDR to have permission to come and see us and then be able to return home; this would allow contact between families, friends, fiances--in short, between Germans--to be maintained. This is the sphere where I hope for substantial improvements in the eighties. And this will doubtless be one of the topics I will have to examine with Honecker at our next meeting.

Question: In your book "The Desire for Peace," you repeatedly speak in praise of compromise. For French people, who are used to hearing the spirit of resistance extolled, this is surprising and even shocking. Do you really believe in the virtues of compromise or are you afraid to intimidate people?

Answer: For many Germans, too, the virtue of compromise is a shocking thesis. Older Germans whose education still bore the traces of the Wilhelmian spirit as well as those who were brought up at the time of Hitler have a tendency to regard it as a virtue to defend both their individual convictions and national interests intransigently. When they hear, or pronounce, the term compromise, Germans sometimes tend to regard it as a dirty word.

I am convinced that nations and states must learn to effect compromises with other states. I am trying to make my people understand that compromise, for example with neighbors, is absolutely necessary for good-neighborliness and peace. Moreover, I think that at the heart of a democratic society and state, compromise is a necessary category. In a democracy, the majority must not purely and simply crush the minority in questions which are fundamental for the minority on the human or moral plane.

Thus I am convinced that we need to cultivate the art of compromise with regard to neighbors, adversaries and allies, even inside our own society, our own parliament and our own party, just as within the family and between a couple. But I do know too that there are naturally some compromises which have a rotten flavor and which must not be accepted under any circumstances. There are many compromises in the world with which I would not like to be associated because they have a rotten flavor either morally or politically. So what is necessary is to decide in each case, with political judgment and in all conscience, if a compromise is necessary, if there are the right indications for it and if it is honorable.

Question: Your office is decorated with several bouquets of red roses, which in France are the symbol of the Socialist Party. Do you really consider yourself a socialist?

Answer: In Germany the flower of the left is not the red rose but the red carnation. It is pure chance that there are red roses here. Everyday I have different flowers. Perhaps there will be yellow roses on Monday. But to reply to your question: Yes I am a man of the democratic left in Germary, but not very leftwing: fairly near the center of German political life.

GISCARD SPEAKS ON FRENCH-GERMAN TIES IN LUEBECK

ID092018 Hamburg DPA in German 1810 GMT 9 Jul 80

[Text] Luebeck/Hamburg--In Luebeck today, French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing reemphasized the friendship and solidarity between the Federal Republic and France.

At a reception held in the audience hall of Luebeck's historic town hall tonight, he said that this friendship has a "secure value for Europe and the world today."

In the presence of Prime Minister Stoltenberg of Schleswig-Holstein and Federal Defense Minister Hans Apel, Giscard delivered a speech in German, in which he said: "If we gather around our countries all the imagination, wisdom and generosity available on our continent," Europe will regain its influence in the world. Stoltenberg said that he and the citizens of the republic's northernmost state are pleased that Giscard had chosen the Hanseatic city of Luebeck, with its proud traditions, for his only excursion to the north.

Earlier today, Giscard met Bavarian Prime Minister Franz Josef Strauss in Wuerzburg. The French president reiterated the need for Europe to share a leading role in world politics. Strauss said that the French-German community is the core for the crystalization of growing cooperation in economic, foreign and security policy. It is not directed against the United States.

Giscard d'Estaing and Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt will meet in Bonn tomorrow to start 2-day consultations. Their talks wich Leonid Brezhnev will be the most important topic of discussion.

Return to Bonn

LD100958 Hamburg DPA in German 0830 GMT 10 Jul 80

[Summary] Luebeck--French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing ended his visit to Luebeck this morning and returned to Bonn where 2-day German-French talks are due to begin this afternoon. He was seen off at Luebeck-Blankensee by Schleswig-Holstein Premier Gerhard Stoltenberg.

Press Comment on Visit

DW091220 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 9 Jul 80

[Press review on French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing's visit to the FRG]

[Text] The French visitor was in Baden-Baden yesterday where he stressed again the special responsibility of the two neighboring countries for Europe. FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG writes in this respect: The visit by the French president to the Federal Republic just could not have been more pleasant. Giscard d'Estaing has seen how much people here are interested in France, how much sympathy they have for his country and he will certainly see that some eulogies are attributable to the Germans' propensity for exaggeration. As long as it does not do any harm there is no need to worry. But the French visitor pointed beyond the two neighboring countries to Europe, which he wants to be a factor in world politics. Who would not like to follow him in this respect? Only, the Europeans have failed thus far to become a world political force. Who but they are responsible for the fact that they have been unable to date to protect themselves even halfway against the Soviet military machinery? The joint appeal of German and French troops in Baden-Baden is to us a welcome signal: The Federal Republic wants to have as many units of the French Army on its soil as possible; it wants the French contribution to our joint defense to be as large and as close as possible. But without the United States our continent cannot be protected against Soviet blackmail, says FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG.

BADISCHE ZEITUNG stresses: During his visit to the Federal Republic, French President Giscard d'Estaing leaves no chance unused to confront his hosts with the message which is the real subject of his trip, namely that Germany and France should cooperate even more closely to enable an independent and strong Europe to play a more important role in the world. In this respect Giscard d'Estaing broaches a subject which is of utmost delicacy to Bonn at this very point, because it involves the basic orientation of German foreign policy which has tried thus far to strictly keep Atlantic commitments and European interests in balance. But rarely before has it been more obvious than in recent months that these goals may become incompatible, especially if and when a more decided emphasis on Europe's political intensity coincides with a U.S. weakness in leadership. However, unlike Paris, Bonn has to take into account its loyalty to and dependence on Washington. This checks its preparedness to follow the French president's visions unconditionally.

The Kassel HESSISCHE ALLGEMEINE notes: France and Germany have concluded the reconciliation phase and are in a phase of friendly relations. But they have yet to learn the role of joint action in world politics, because the cordial welcome for the French president in some German federal laender cannot obscure the fact that there are still many rocks on the road to a supranational policy. Yet it is no exaggeration to talk about special relations today, not only of the governments but also fo the people. Giscard d'Estaing's visit has again made us aware of them.

The Hanover NEUE PRESSE writes: Although Bonn and Paris have good relations, Europe is far from being perfect. On the contrary, too strong an axis across the Rhine may also block its unification. In addition, the former sworn enemies, Germany and France, which have obviously become friends, may agree on a general line, but they are very far away from agreeing on how these problems should be solved in detail. Giscard d'Estaing and Schmidt are by no means the dynamic duo of world politics, but their friendship and that of their countries is certainly a stabilizing factor in a troubled world. Europe can profit from this if it bewares of euphoria and arrogance.

SCHWARZWAELDER BOTE states: Really practicing European cooperation is more than just declaring it desirable in solemn speeches. We should also not forget in all those praiseworthy European wishful dreams that the security of Western Europe is only guaranteed by the Atlantic alliance with the United States, no matter how much self-confidence Europe displays.

REACTIONS TO NEW SOVIET DISARMAMENT OFFER REPORTED

[Article signed Ban.: "Moscow's Demand Complicates Talks"]

[Excerpt] Bonn, 8 July--The Soviet view which became known in the course of Chancellor Schmidt's Moscow visit, that in further talks on arms control measures the "forward based systems" should be included, in Bonn's opinion is not a prerequisite for negotiations but an expansion of the issue to be discussed. However, the Moscow demand would complicate and possibly delay the talks. Diplomatic circles point out that the Soviet side, too, has not yet explained definitely which weapons fall within this category. The only thing that was clear is the fact that they are systems which are not based in the United States and are able to reach Soviet territory and fly back to their bases. This Soviet definition in any case contains the F-111 aircraft with a range of roughly 2,000 kilometers.

In the exploratory talks that the Western alliance would have to hold the question would have to be discussed as to whether such weapons should only be decided on in future negotiations or whether their number should also be limited. [paragraph continues]

It was said in Bonn that the national positions within NATO would be determined by September. The United States has made it clear that they would study the Soviet "reaction" to the West's negotiating offers in an openminded and "constructive spirit." It was pointed out that prior to further NATO consultations in the autumn, talks would be held between Washington and Moscow in order to definitely clarify the subject of the negotiations.

It was stressed in Bonn that Moscow no longer insisted on its conditions (suspension of the decision to close the arms gap and ratification of SALT II) for the resumption of talks. However, the Soviets demanded the ratification of SALT II before a SALT III treaty on medium-range weapons could be signed.

The program of the NATO decision to close the arms gap would continue during the negotiations. If the talks were to extend beyond the year 1983 when NATO will be in a position to station medium-range weapons in Western Europe, the extent of their deployment could depend on the stage of the talks. There were doubts at this point as to whether the new Soviet SS-20 missiles with a range of roughly 1,000 kilometers should be included in the talks, because NATO kept to the idea of parity and balance of forces. Reports were also confirmed that the French, British and Chinese missile capabilities should not be considered in the preliminary talks. This would, however, be different if agreement were to be reached on SALT III.

SPD Manager Bahr

[Text] Bonn--In the opinion of SPD Federal Manager Egon Bahr, new possibilities and promises regarding disarmament talks in the nuclear medium-range missile sector were found during Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt's Moscow trip. Bahr said on South-West Radio today that Washington was aware of this. Although the Soviet Union's offer of talks on disarmament in the medium-range missile sector without the precondition of a ratified SALT II agreement is not yet a guarantee for the success of negotiations, the "deadpoint" has nevertheless been overcome.

On German-Soviet relations, Bahr said a dimension of reliable continuity has now been achieved. The Federal Government made plain in Moscow its firm, long-term intention to deepen detente within the framework of its alliance. Both sides could now adjust to this, the SPD politician emphasized.

The text of Bahr's remarks was prereleased by the SPD in Bonn.

Bundeswehr Inspector General

LD041419 Hamburg DPA in German 1256 GMT 4 Jul 80

[Excerpt] Vienna--The inspector general of the Bundeswehr, Gen Juergen Brandt, sees in Moscow's readiness for negotiations on the limitation of nuclear medium-range missiles a chance to move again towards an East-West balance. Brandt said this at a press conference in Vienna today at the end of a 5-day visit with Austrian Army officials. Brandt replied in the negative to a question on whether the development of the neutron bomb in France would alter NATO's strategy.

DIE WELT Commentary

DW100847 Bonn DIE WELT in German 10 Jul 80 p 6

[Commentary signed W.H.-E.: "Unanimously"]

[Text] The choir singing in America about the results of the chancellor's visit to Moscow is confusing with its many voices. Therefore, one must be all the more grateful to U.S. Ambassador Stoessel for creating clarity in his Bitburg speech with regard to the official American assessment.

Stoessel sings the high song of NATO, its cohesion and determination to hold firmly to its decision to close the arms gap. His statement fits into this tenor, namely that Washington attributes great significance to arms control negotiations with the Soviet Union as "one" method to achieve a stable security balance in Europe. The other method, which is not described in detail, is the agreed on closing of the arms gap by the alliance in Europe, which must be seen in context with the American rearmament program, for which the Senate has alotted $52 billion. Washington obviously expects something to come from arms control negotiations only if its rearmament prompts the Soviet Union to make concessions.

It corresponds to this perspective that Stoessel coolly termed Brezhnev's offer for talks as "a hint the federal chancellor had brought along from his Moscow visit." Even if Stoessel termed this hint "important," the reserved selection of words is obvious. Regardless of when the Americans sit down together with the Soviets at the negotiating table, the main thing is that Brezhnev will not succeed in separating the Americans from the Europeans.

DEFENSE MINISTER APEL STRESSES NATO SOLIDARITY

LD041654 Hamburg DPA in German 1618 GMT 4 Jul 80

[Text] Bonn/Bremen--America, in the opinion of Federal Defense Minister Hans Apel, must take its European NATO partners' interests into account when making judgments and decisions. "Solidarity is not a one-way street," Apel said in an interview with WESER-KURIER of Bremen. This solidarity demands that the interests of the little as well as the big alliance partners be taken into account. In this connection, the minister also warned against the formation of groups within NATO. "The power and solidarity of the Atlantic alliance are derived from the participation of all on equal terms," he emphasized. Asked about the division of labor within the defense alliance, Apel explained that the Europeans could well have to accept additional tasks in the Atlantic should the United States have to withdraw ships for deployment in other ocean areas. "Given the present situation, I cannot imagine that the Americans are going to withdraw troops from Europe," he said.

CDU/CSU PROGRAM CALLS FOR EXPANDING NATO RESPONSIBILITIES

[Ruediger Moniac article: "CDU/CSU: NATO To Be Expanded"]

[Text] The CDU/CSU security policy experts are saying publicly what is being discussed within responsible circles of the Federal Government only behind closed doors and among confidants: They advocate an expansion of NATO responsibility in terms of security beyond the traditional borders of the alliance. They also call for using the political unification process for harmonizing military defense efforts within Europe and developing the core of a European nuclear strike force, which exists in the form of a British and French nuclear arms, into a strategic nuclear potential for Europe in close coordination with the United States.

These ideas are contained in a security policy draft program developed by the CDU/CSU which is to be adopted and presented in the next few weeks by the responsible party bodies. In the light of the explosive nature of the Union's ideas, German domestic policy will be faced in the federal election campaign with a large controversy about the course of Bonn's foreign and security policy.

In the part of the program which deals with NATO, the CDU/CSU very plainly calls for developing the cooperation of the alliance states beyond military planning and into a coordinated joint political action. It says in the draft program that NATO needs to have a "coordinated general concept regarding the policy of the West for a measured use of all economic, technical, financial and other power instruments to make the Soviet Union pursue a policy of worldwide restraint and peace-promoting readiness to cooperate."

The Union considers one of the central tasks of NATO to be safeguarding of the energy and raw material supplies of the Western world. It is impossible to fulfill this task without an expansion of "the geographical scope and the limited range of action (of NATO)." However, it does not mean, as Bundestag Deputy Manfred Woerner said recently, that Bundeswehr soldiers are to be dispatched to the Persian Gulf.

In the view of the Union parties, the military element must no longer be repressed in Europe's political unification. The program calls for "European defense policy cooperation" (EVZ) in which nuclear issues are to be discussed as well. CSU Bundestag Deputy Ekkehard Voigt said in this respect that this goal was of a long-term nature, but a European federal state was unthinkable without strategic nuclear weapons, but only in close cooperation with the United States, however.

SCHMIDT ADDRESSES MIDEAST PEACE SETTLEMENT ISSUES

LD081544 Hamburg DPA in German 1433 GMT 8 Jul 80

[Excerpt] Bonn/Amsterdam--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has reaffirmed the will of the Federal Government to assist in a just peace settlement in the Middle East. On Tuesday evening, at the celebration by the World Jewish Congress in Amsterdam of the 85th birthday of Nahum Goldmann, who was the president of the congress for many years, Schmidt said that the Federal Republic's good relations with Israel and the Arab countries serve above all the aim of "helping toward a comprehensive, lasting and just peace in the Middle East."

Schmidt said that the Federal Republic's relations with Israel have a "special moral quality." It was and will remain one of the German principles for any peace settlement in the Middle East that Israel--like all other states in the region--has a right which should be recognized by all to live within secure borders and in peace. He named as a further pillar of Bonn's Middle East policy good relations with the Arab states. "For the sake of peace we also support justice here, and also the legitimate right of the Palestinian people to freely determine their affairs themselves within the framework of an order acceptable to all," Schmidt said.

Schmidt agreed that a peaceful and just Middle East solution is an extremely difficult task: "But I refuse to believe--also in view of our own experiences--that it cannot be mastered." It has to be possible, among Jews, Christians and Muslims, to find the path to peace in the Middle East. "You can rely on the fact that the EC countries want to help in this," he said. The Egyptians and the Israelis have shown that it is possible to create a climate of trust in the Middle East, too.

The chancellor conveyed to Nahum Goldmann the birthday greetings of the Federal Government and of, as he put it, many friends in Germany and the millions of his fellowcountrymen who are extremely grateful for everything that Goldmann has done for reconciliation between the two peoples after the period of the murder of the Jews by the Nazi regime.

STRAUSS COMMENTS ON MIDDLE EAST, WEST BANK

[Text] Bonn--Franz Josef Stauss, CDU/CSU candidate for the chancellorship, said following his visits to Israel and Egypt that he does not regard the contradictions between the two states as in any way unbridgeable. In the Union press service today he writes that Jerusalem and Cairo expect the Europeans to support the solution outlined at Camp David, which alone could make possible in the foreseeable future a permanent Middle East peace without the danger of fresh military hostilities. "I gained the impression that the Israelis and the Egyptians do not regard it as helpful when the Europeans differ from the Americans in their Near and Middle East policy, and when America and Europe are pulling in different directions."

Strauss said that the Egyptians link the fulfilling of the Camp David agreement with the demand for full self-administration and full autonomy for the population of the West Bank of Jordan. They are obviously not calling for allowing military armed forces, but rather for setting up a security policy from among the population of this region. The Israelis want to safeguard their military security and presence in this region with their own forces. However, the contradiction is not so great that it could permanently stand in the way of a reasonable solution.

Strauss said he believes that the region should not become either a part of the State of Israel or an area of mobilization for the destruction of this state. He again described the demand of the Europeans for the Israelis' right to exist within secure borders together with simultaneous full military sovereignty for a Palestinian state on the West Bank of Jordan as a foolish formulation. He said he had stated these views in Israel and Egypt and that the partners in his talks agreed with him.

On Visit to Egypt, Israel

[Interview by Cairo correspondent Peter Schmalz with Franz Josef Strauss, CDU/CSU candidate for chancellor and minister-president of Bavaria; date, place of interview not given]

[Text] Welt: Mr Minister-President, you are the only German politician to visit Israel and Egypt in a short interval lately. Where lie the differences of opinion between the two countries according to your current experience?

Strauss: The Egyptians and their state president demand, under the key Camp David agreement, full autonomy for the populace on the West Bank of the Jordan, but obviously not the admittance of armed forces. They demand the establishment of a security police from the ranks of the populace of this area. The Egyptians are going much farther in their ideas than Begin seems prepared to go.

Welt: And the Israelis?

Strauss: The Israelis want to safeguard with their own strength their military security and military presence in this area. The Egyptians have some sort of military security posts in mind. The antagonism between the two is not too great to be bridged. But none of the two sides must make demands or establish facts that would create insurmountable obstacles for a reasonable solution, which in turn would be the prerequisite for a peaceful solution in the Middle East.

WELT: You have repeatedly mentioned stumbling blocks in Cairo. What obstacles do you see?

Strauss: I have mentioned this in Israel. It have warned against giving so much priority to the settlement policy that it would block the way to an agreement. It is not our task here to go into detail, that must be left to the two countries and their negotiating delegations.

WELT: How would you term the situation in which these two countries are at present?

Strauss: On the one hand in a state of hope and expectation, while on the other hand in a state of uncertainty and disappointment. But that is typical for the floating situation that occurs over and over again in disrupted negotiations.

WELT: You have said much in your meetings about the situation of the Europeans with a view to the Middle East. What do the Egyptians expect from the Europeans and particularly from the Federal Republic?

Strauss: The Egyptians do not expect the Near and Middle East policies of the Europeans to be different from that of the Americans, that America and Europe pull on two different ropes. The Egyptians expect the Europeans not to agree to an annexation of the area west of the Jordan by the State of Israel. Naturally the Egyptians expect the Europeans to support their demands, which go farther than Israel's preparedness to meet them. On the other hand, however, the Israelis expect the same. The Egyptians indicate that the elections in the United States and probably also in Israel will be over before one will get on more firm ground, before some land will be in sight. Eventually they expect the Europeans to show more world-political responsibility vis-a-vis the Soviet expansion in Africa, the Maghreb, North Africa and the Middle East; they expect them to show more vigilance and preparedness to take over responsibility.

WELT: This is the political part, but the Egyptians also have economic hopes.

Strauff: Egypt has grave economic problems. They have been caused in part by the damage and losses suffered in many wars. They lie in the fast growth of the populace and they lie in still high military burdens. Vigilance exists less with regard to an Israeli aggression, which is not feared at all. It exists with regard to military developments in Soviet-armed Libya which is in part supported by Soviet-Cuban and East German experts. But some things must also change here in the country. On the one hand As-Sadat is fighting a hard fight against certain traditions, while on the other hand he is fighting certain habits and a certain way of acting whcih are not in accord with the demands of a modern and dynamic economy. But that is an educational process that cannot be mastered all at once with dictatorial force.

WELT: Will you bring some concrete suggestions back home to be discussed with Bavarian firms in Munich--such as MBB (Messerschmidtt-Boelkow-Blohm) or Siemens?

Strauss: The Egyptian side has the explicit wish to set up a firm named Siemens Egypt as a joint venture. The establishment of a modern technical aviation center by MBB was brought up for care and maintenance as well as spare parts, production an training.

WELT: Did you have to talk in another tongue in Egypt than you did in Israel?

Strauss: It is always difficult to express oneself in complicated matters so that one's formulations will not be misunderstood. Although I have objected to setting up one more Arab state with military sovereignty, one cannot say that I am against autonomy and the right to self-determination. But sometimes there is a collision of two principles. In such a case no side ought to stick to a principle doggedly or establish facts which would lead to an insurmountable hindrance obstructing a further step which in this case would be a very far-reaching step.

WELT: Would it not then be better for a German politician to avoid these areas?

Strauss: That would also be a solution. It would presuppose, however, that one joined an order of Greek monks and withdrew to the Athos Mountain.

FRG PHARMACEUTICAL FIRMS IN IRAN REPORTEDLY 'EXPROPRIATED'

LD091206 Hamburg DPA in German 1110 GMT 9 Jul 80

[Text] Frankfurt--According to the Federal Association of the Pharmaceutical Industry, the Iranian Government has expropriated German pharmaceutical firms in Iran. This announcement, which was made public in Frankfurt today, reports measures by the Iranian Government which "are in the nature of expropriation and flagrantly violate the still valid German-Iranian agreement on the promotion and reciprocal protection of capital investments."

The German directors of the firms have been forcibly replaced effective immediately with Iranian citizens with the permission of the appropriate ministry. Authority over bank accounts and deposits has been withdrawn from the German firm directors, according to the pharmaceutical association. In some cases, German staff have been forbidden to enter the firms' premises.

According to information, during the past few days the German heads of firms were contacted by persons with power of attorney from Iranian ministries under which the directors' and managers' authority over the firms was withdrawn without a reason being given. "When the firms' directors pointed out the possible illegality of these measures, it was described by the Iranian side as an 'insult to the Islamic revolution,'" said the announcement.

The Federal Association of the Pharmaceutical Industry said it has requested the Foreign Ministry and the Federal Economics Ministry to "intervene, as far as existing possibilities allow, to secure the investments of German firms."

ENVOY UN TO DISCUSS EEC MIDEAST INITIATIVE

LD090647 Paris AN-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AD-DUWALI in Arabic 30 Jun-6 Jul 80 pp 28-29

[Interview granted to Raghidah Durgham by West German UN Representative Baron Rudigar von Wechmar in New York--date not given]

[Excerpts] New York--[Question] The Venice summit statement has been opposed by Israel and considered insufficient by the PLO. Is the statement regarded as a prelude to a European initiative or is it an initiative in itself?

[Answer] I regard it as both an initiative and a prelude to an initiative. The statement defines our stand and suggests that some or all of us send a mission to the area to talk to the parties concerned, to ascertain the facts and to search for a solution to the Middle East problem. In our view, such a solution goes beyond the current direct discussions between Israel, Egypt and the United States. What is meant by listening to the other parties is that the PLO should be associated in the process of finding a solution. The statement has been subjected to criticism for various reasons, but this did not prevent us from trying to adopt a stand that is independent of some of the forces that have been active so far. We did not expect applause for the statement, and although it has been welcomed by a certain party, we have been accused of adopting a stand biased toward one side against the other.

[Question] The Community's statement is tantamount to an annex to, and not an amendment of Resolution 242. Thus, you confirmed the effectiveness of the resolution and added two points to it: the Palestinian people's right to self-determination and the need to take the PLO into consideration as a party which could participate in the negotiations in the future. If these points as contained in the Venice statement had been presented in a draft resolution to the Security Council, would the European Community have supported it?

[Answer] The question is who would present such a draft resolution to the Security Council? The Nine states would not do that. We have previously said that we do not intend to present a request to amend Resolution 242 in the Security Council. I can see a Security Council session convening on this subject if another party "snatches" these points. Does any party intend to snatch these points and present them to the Security Council in the form of a draft resolution?

[Question] If a certain party snatches these points, would it not be difficult for the Western states to oppose them once they appear in a draft resolution?

[Answer] I do not see any difficulty in ratifying or approving them as a draft resolution in the Security Council as long as the proposed paper reflects the Venice statement to the letter. I repeat that I cannot imagine any of the European Community states opposing a draft resolution that reflects to the letter the statement that has been approved by the heads of states.

[Question] Should the United States announce in advance that it would veto such a resolution, as President Carter has done previously, would the European Community vote for the resolution?

[Answer] We must differentiate between what President Carter said about the Venice statement and Washington's attitude after the statement, which it considered useful. I cannot imagine the statement as it is being "snatched" and presented to theSecurity Council. Both sides have criticized it. Therefore, it is difficult to imagine that an Arab state or the PLO will adopt a draft resolution such as this and present it to the Security Council. I believe that whoever tries to use this document will seek to amend it, expand on it or introduce amendments to it. In such an event, it would be a totally different subject.

[Question] Can you not influence Israel to make it halt its attacks and stop killing hundreds of people and displacing thousands of others? You cannot influence it to halt its direct interference in Lebanese affairs and to leave the Lebanese alone to remedy their problems and build their country?

[Answer] We are doing this but to no avail, as you know. Our hands are tied because Israel is convinced that its actions are justified and it does not want to listen to the advice of others. What can we do? Should we attack and occupy Israel?

[Question] But you claim to be an independent power. All of you are helping Israel, especially in the economic field. Can you not influence it?

[Answer] We are using all means of diplomatic and political contacts to convince Israel that this policy of hers does not lead to calming the situation in southern Lebanon.

[Question] But you have failed, Mr Ambassador?

[Answer] Perhaps we have failed, or at least we have not been able to achieve tangible progress so far. But this does not mean that we are not continuing our attempts to influence the Israeli Government and to persuade it that it is in everybody's interest to help the UN forces in implementing their task so as to enable the Lebanese Government to restore order and security to Lebanon.

[Question] We are in a funny situation. The Europeans cannot influence Israel over a clear subject such as southern Lebanon, so why do they claim to be able to play a role in a subject that is more complicated, such as that of the Middle East?

[Answer] There is a parallel situation to what you term our failure with regard to southern Lebanon. In its relationship with Israel, even the giant--the United States--could not persuade it to halt its policy in southern Lebanon. Perhaps we have failed, as you say, but the United States has also failed. But this should not prevent us from continuing our search for a solution to the problem of southern Lebanon and the Middle East problem as a whole.

[Question] Do you not believe that failure is due to your refusal to take the necessary steps?

[Answer] No. I believe that we must take things step by step. We must deal with facts.

[Question] You oppose the policy of settlements and regard the existing settlements as illegal. Are you prepared to take economic measures against Israel if it decides to build new settlements?

[Answer] Certainly we will not do so at the present time. We must avoid resorting to threats, boycotts or economic sanctions. The heads of the nine states agree on this. I believe in negotiations and persuasion.

[Question] So principles, condemnation and denunciation are one thing and the application of principles is another. Is this not--forgive me for using this rude word--a policy of hypocricy?

[Answer] Do you think that the measures you are talking about will make the Israeli Government stop building new settlements?

[Question] Economic sanctions might succeed here?

[Answer] I doubt it.

[Question] Then why did the European states impose sanctions on Iran, knowing that they would not lead to the release of the American hostages?

[Answer] This is a vivid example of what I have already said.

[Question] Then was the decision to impose sanctions against Iran wrong?

[Answer] If the sanctions have not led to any result, as you have said, and if the same idea is to apply to sanctions against Israel--that is, the hostages will not be released and Israel will not stop building settlements--this proves that we cannot achieve anything worth mentioning.

[Question] Were the European states wrong in the decision to impose sanctions on Iran?

[Answer] I am not saying that they were wrong but the recognized fact is that the hostages have not yet been released.

[Question] The problem of the hostages is 250 days old, whereas the settlements problem is over 10 years old. Why have the Europeans taken practical measures over the hostages issue and avoided even talking about measures over the settlements issue?

[Answer] You yourself have said that the hostages have not been released. Therefore, sanctions have not created a situation leading to the release of the hostages. I do not see that any Israeli Government, now or in the future, can be forced into abandoning a certain policy through sanctions.

[Question] You do not think that the European states are likely to adopt any sanctions against Israel over the settlements issue?

[Answer] I hesitate to answer this question with an absolute yes or absolute no. We will cross that bridge when we come to it.

[Question] How do you assess the U.S. attitude regarding the subject of Jerusalem?

[Answer] I am at a loss. I do not actually know the official U.S. stance over the Jerusalem issue. Following President Carter's retraction of the U.S. vote at the Security Council because of the reference to Jerusalem, I began to wonder if there was a definite official U.S. stand on Jerusalem. I believe that there is a stand but I am not aware of it.

[Question] Chancellor Schmidt will go to the Soviet Union at the end of this month. What are the priorities of his discussions there?

[Answer] There are two main subjects: the current international situation--Afghanistan, Iran and the Middle East--and the decision made by the NATO states last December. He will also discuss in Madrid conference which is expected to be held in November on peace and European cooperation and which will be tantamount to a continuation of the Helsinki and Belgrade conferences, and the possibility of convening the East-West European conference on disarmament in 1981.

[Answer] Let me tell you very frankly that this is a myth. We consider ourselves serious allies of the United States. We have not deviated from this. At the same time, we believe that in the disputes the world is witnessing, the means of communications must be kept open. It is useless for the two superpowers to adopt hostile stands. We Europeans, both Eastern and Western, believe that it is our duty to bring the two superpowers to the same table, such as the meeting that took place between Gromyko and Muskie last month.

[Question] In the wake of the European summit statement, are the West German officials prepared to receive the leaders of the PLO, particularly Yasir 'Arafat?

[Answer] I do not believe that we have reached this stage yet. We have spoken with PLO officials. I personally speak with the PLO's UN representative, Zuhdi at-Tarazi, but not at an official level. It must first be established that the PLO is a party to the negotiations. So far, we have said that the PLO's participation is necessary but it is not yet a party. The decision to have the PLO participate is being made through a process of negotiations that could lead to this.

[Question] Logically speaking, I would expect the European fact-finding committee to contact the PLO when it starts its task in the area?

DER SPIEGEL SPECULATES ON GDR CURRENCY REFORM

DW091314 Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German 7 Jul 80 p 16

[Unattributed article: "GDR Currency Reform?"]

[Text] Despite a strong denial in the SED central organ NEUES DEUTSCHLAND, high GDR officials do not rule out a currency reform of the Eastmark "in the longer run." East German financial experts fear that the GDR might be forced to reorganize its currency, because GDR money increasingly flows to the West--not only as a result of the fact that for years East German industrial enterprises have bought the urgently necessary foreign exchange at floating rates from Western banks. Other Eastern bloc states, above all Hungary and Poland, also sell GDR marks brought into the countries by the growing flood of East German tourists in capitalist money markets via the Vienna "Central-Wechsel-Und Creditbank Actiengesellschaft," for instance. Since 1918 this bank has been in the possession of the Hungarian National Bank.

EPPLER TO QUIT AS WUERTTEMBERG SPD LAND CHAIRMAN

DW100900 Hamburg DIE ZEIT in German 11 Jul 80 p 1

[Article signed H.B.: "Pressure of Thought"]

[Excerpt] Erhard Eppler, the land chairman of the Baden-Wuerttemberg SPD organization, will not run as candidate for this office in 1981. Following the election defeat of 16 March he renounced the leadership of the faction in Stuttgart; with his announcement he will be saying a final farewell to land policy, exchanging a piece of influence for a piece of freedom, as he put it.

ELYSEE SPOKESMAN ON PORTUGUESE EC MEMBERSHIP

[Unattributed report: "Giscard d'Estaing Has Confirmed that France Is 'Favorably Disposed to Portugal's European Vocation'"]

[Text] Elysee spokesman Blot made the following statement on 1 July after the meeting between Portuguese Prime Minister Sa Carneiro and the president of the republic:

"1. France long ago adopted a favorable position of principle toward Portugal's European vocation. The president of the republic confirmed this position of principle to Sa Carneiro;

"2. France states that in two fundamental spheres, namely, the Common Agricultural Policy and financial solidarity, the negotiations concerning the British contribution had led some of France's partners to again question some of the Community rules. So these points must receive the necessary clarification before it is possible to discuss them with prospective members.

"3. Negotiations for Portugal's membership have begun. They will continue and can make progress in all spheres of Community matters whose rules are not in question."

While entertaining Sa Carneiro to dinner, Barre expressed the wish that the negotiations continue "lucidly" so as to avoid "pretenses" and to forestall "future causes of misunderstanding, irritation and conflict."

ARGENTINE FOREIGN MINISTER VISITS PARIS

[Unattributed report: "Argentine Foreign Minister Has Made a Visit to Paris"]

[Text] Argentine Foreign Minister Carlos Pastor made a discreet visit to Paris from Saturday, 28 June through Wednesday, 2 July. During his talks Pastor apparently discussed the nuclear energy problem and the question of French arms sales to Argentina. In May Argentine Economy Minister Martinez de Hoz also visited the French capital and mentioned the possibility of nuclear cooperation between the two countries. Argentina is planning to build six power stations by the end of the century and has major uranium deposits.

Pastor's visit to Paris follows a series of official talks he had in Vienna and is part of a diplomatic offensive launched by the Argentinian Government in Europe. Pastor left for Madrid Wednesday, 2 July and will then go to London, the last stage on his trip.

PRESS VIEWS GISCARD STATEMENT ON NEUTRON BOMB

L'HUMANITE Criticism

[Yves Moreau editorial: "Nato Rejoices"]

[Text] The aspect of the Elysee press conference which DPA highlighted with evident satisfaction on Thursday evening was Mr Giscard d'Estaing's statement on the neutron bomb.

As is known, these statements revealed that the development of the neutron bomb was undertaken at the end of 1976, that the first tests have been carried out and that the decision to produce this weapon could be taken by 1982 or 1983.

NATO is rejoicing. "Very good news," the Atlantic organization Secretary General Joseph Luns exclaimed, adding: "All the Allies are pleased, especially the Americans."

In Washington the State Department merely said: "The news does not really surprise us." In other words we were expecting it.

Indeed it must be remembered that 3 years ago the United States was preparing to produce the neutron bomb too. Mr Carter was forced to back down in face of the general indignation aroused throughout the world by these preparations. In April 1978 he had resigned himself to announcing that he was postponing his decision on this question.

This was a postponement but not a final abandonment. If France, a member of the Atlantic alliance, were to assume a responsibility which the United States deemed temporarily inopportune, Washington and NATO would be open once again for the neutron bomb.

This is a frightening responsibility, since it would not simply be one more weapon but the emergence of a new generation of nuclear devices. The neutron bomb, which is minaturized, extremely maneuverable and only requires small vehicles, spares buildings and industrial installations but acts like a "death ray" wiping out all life. It causes little damage but it kills.

It is a "clean" bomb and it is so easy to use that it is dangerously tempting. Indeed such a weapon would lower the nuclear threshold to such an extent and increase the probability of a nuclear war so much that its introduction into arsenals would increase the chances of the irreversible step being taken quickly.

For the U.S. strategists the neutron bomb provides an additonal advantage. Like the pershing-2 and cruise missiles, the neutron bomb would be transported by a medium-range device; it would therefore be intended for use on a possible European battlefield--the United States being spared and hence waging war by putting other people's lives at risk.

It is not a deterrent weapon, in other words one which aims to rule out the possibility of a conflict; quite the reverse. It is a weapon which perfectly suits the so-called "forward battle" Atlantic strategy.

London's THE GUARDIAN rightly points out, moreover, that the remarks made by Mr Giscard d'Estaing on Thursday "confirm his departure" from General de Gaulle's views in the defense sphere.

[Union for French Democracy leader] Lecanuet made significant admissions in this connection on Europe 1 yesterday morning, saying out loud what the head of state secretly thinks. Naming the Soviet Union as the "only" possible "adversary," he did not hesitate to state that France should be prepared to be first to use nuclear weapons, and more precisely the neutron bomb.

Like FRANKFURTHER ALLEGEMEINE ZEITUNG and other West German newspapers, he stressed Mr Giscard d'Estaing's statement that "France is directly concerned by the security of neighboring European states." According to Mr Lecanuet, this is "a key sentence" which he spelled out in the following way: France should "move its military means forward onto our partners' territory to protect them should the need arise." In other words wage war for the king of Prussia...

In any case this is no longer national defense. Moreover Mr Lecanuet prides himself on still advocating " a European defense policy or even a European army of the European defense community type which was rejected by the French Parliament a long time ago."

In these circumstances the seal of approval which Mr Lecanuet awards to Francois Mitterrand is seen for its true value. "Mr Mitterrand's Atlanticism, as reflected in his recent press conference," he rejoices, "marks a great evolution on his part and accentuates the divorce between the foreign policy desired by the PS and that desired by the PCF."

Indeed the PCF is fighting for national independence and peace. The neutron bomb would bind France even more closely to the United States and Bonn and at the same time would raise the arms race to a particularly dangerous level. The implementation of this plan must be prevented and instead we must demand that our country take initiatives to avert the dangers, for instance by proposing an agreement by which all states would henceforth agree to ban the development and production of new mass extermination weapons.

LE MONDE Commentary

LD070731 Paris LE MONDE in French 28 Jun 80 pp 1, 10

[Jacques Isnard commentary: "An Open Strategic View"]

[Text] As he sat under the Elysee's ceilings, the head of state only really came alive when explaining his defense policy. In a firm and almost dogmatic tone he hammered out principles--more than expounding them--and lashed out at those who speak lightly on complex problems or who cast doubt on his aptitude, as armed forces chief elected by the nation, to brandish the nuclear thunderbolt against a possible aggressor.

However, it is necessary to go beyond this show which might impress those who probably needed reassurance, to eventually find the essence of the message which Mr Giscard d'Estaing probably wanted to put across: As far as defense is concerned there can be no impasse if by impasse you mean basing defense on a system covering a number of hypotheses but not guaranteeing them all.

In fact this is the second time in his 7-year term that the president of the republic has used this truism to cover this defense policy line. He did so in June 1976 when speaking to the Higher National Defense Studies Institute.

The invocation has one meaning: It affirms that there is no defense policy without constant efforts to update and develop all military means which express and underlie this defense policy. It is revealing that the head of state should have explained his views at length on the types of weapons regarded as vital before the end of the centruy, aside from a short--but striking--digression on the need to maintain some ambiguity on the timing and conditions for French participation in Europe's collective security.

Speaking to invited journalists Mr Giscard d'Estaing gave the impression of expressing himself as how he hears chiefs of staff or military exprets called on to explain a particular subject expressing themselves in the Defense Council meetings he chairs. However, unlike them, the head of state went straight to the conclusions to be drawn without bothering to explain the ins and outs of the choice.

This can be noted with the two decisions he echoed: First, the initiative taken last week to plan before the end of this year the characteristics and performances of the mobile strategic launcher which will complement the missile-launching nuclear submarine force after 1992, and, second, the "irrevocable" refusal to alter the draft term.

Of all the president's revelations in the defense sphere, the announcement that France will start designing a mobile strategic missile is probably the most important.

We already knew the favorable viewpoint held by the general staffs who intend to protect the nuclear retaliation means deployed on national territory from any detection or preemptive destruction by making them mobile and constantly moving them on an articulated vehicle, a railroad convoy or transport plane according to the technical option to be chosen in a few months. However, it was not hitherto known that Mr Giscard d'Estaing had adopted this principle which the United States recently adopted and which the Soviets have implemented with their tracked batteries of SS-20 missiles in Europe.

Therefore France should not accept any impasse in strategy since the plan is henceforth to continue diversifying the panorly with mobile strategic launchers. The nuclear submarines will not be the only arsenal of national deterrence by the year 2000.

The other confirmation given by the president of the republic, namely maintaining military service at 1 year, also corresponds to the long-established philosophy of the general staffs.

Skill

On this point Mr Giscard d'Estaing helped to strengthen the military chiefs' conviction that a short term of service makes it possible to train a soldier but not an army capable of fighting. In fact this argument is not directly addressed to the leaders of political parties such as the Socialist Party and Rally for the Republic which recently advocated altering the period spent in the army. These two political parties proposed an extension of the term of military service in technical or front-line units and a shorter period for recruits who served in regional or territorial defense corps.

The accusations which Mr Giscard d'Estaing leveled at those who advocate a different formula from the current organization of military service, accusing them of wanting to "demolish" the French Army, bring about France's "abandonment" or "resignation" and of talking "technical nonesense," are not only pointlessly harsh but are in fact excessive; they may conceal the military hierarchy's inability to think up reforms, to show imagination with regard to a system which, while not being the worst possible, is nonetheless certainly not satisfactory.

It could be of course that these remarks are aimed at reassuring officers about their raison d'etre and the meaning of their mission in the army which, for years,has, by tolerating an increasingly selective service, turned its back on the principle of universal conscription.

As far as other points were concerned, in other words the neutron bomb, the president of the republic merely recalled--but with the influence inherent in his position-along the lines of his Defense Minister Yvon Bourges and his Armed Forces Chief of Staff Gen Guy Mery, that France would be wrong to deprive itself of an enhanced-radiation tactical weapon if its scientists and engineers succeeded in developing it.

The general staffs and the CEA [French Atomic Energy commission] say they are confident and ready to move from nuclear physics experiments carried out in the vast laboratory formed by the Murora underground test center, to the "militarization" of a neutron device for operational purposes. The head of state is giving them another 3 to 5 years before his final decision to mass produce the weapons in a given form. This will leave time to allow the 1981 presidential election to define the French political scene more clearly and time also to register the acquisition of the Euromissiles by the United States and their NATO allies countering the Soviet SS-20 missiles.

Mr Giscard d'Estaing gave no further details. Like Mr Bourges and General Mery he succeeded in avoiding questions on the place and role of the neutron weapon in the national deterrent and on the circumstances in which it would be used--for which, nonetheless, he would be responsible.

It is the epitome of skill to allow the technical and military debate to go on in public the better to disguise the strategic thinking behind deliberately maintained ambiguities.

RESUMPTION OF U.S.-USSR ARMS TALKS HYPOTHESIZED

LD081009 Paris LE FIGARO in French 4 Jul 80 p 3

[Paul-Marie de la Gorce article: "Theater Nuclear Weapons: The Real Stake in the U.S.-USSR Negotiations"]

[Excerpt] What in fact is the real significance--strategic and political--of the Soviet reactivation of negotiations?

The Western countries have one aim: to stop and if possible to reduce the deployment of SS-20's, which make their forces in Europe very vulnerable and render NATO's traditional strategy completely outdated.

The USSR wants to preserve its armaments system and to prevent the deployment of Pershing-2 and cruise missiles, not so much because it fears their effectiveness, which is very relative, but so as not to have to deploy other armaments systems in retaliation, for example an air defense system against cruise missiles. The gap between the two camps' aims is great and an agreement would not be easy.

But the negotiations themselves would be of important political significance. It would mean that even if disagreements and confrontation are going to continue on Afghanistan, attempts could be made to make progress in other spheres. This is what Chancellor Schmidt wished from the first and it is what experience of international relations suggests: Detente has never been universal, it is possible for it to concern some parts of the world while rivalries and struggles go on elsewhere: This was evident during the Vietnam war.

But this was obviously not the wish of the U.S. Government, which wanted to respond to the Russian intervention in Kabul with economic, psychological, and political sanctions: The failure of these will perhaps lead it to change direction. It is true that most observers were expecting this, but only after the presidential elections in November.

Finally, France will remain apart. There is little doubt that it will support any resumption of negotiations between the NATO countries, in particular the United States, and the USSR because this is in accordance with its policy. But it will certainly not allow its nuclear devices, part of which can be classed as medium-range weapons, to be included in a U.S.-Soviet arrangement when, by their capacity to strike at the heart of the enemy, they are all part of a "central system" defending France itself.

PREMIER BARRE GIVES INTERVIEW ON ECONOMY

LD100847 Paris LE MONDE in French 9 Jul 80 p 8

[Unattributed report on 7 July French television Channel 2 interview with French Premier Raymond Barre: "Mr Barre Asserts That the 1981 Budget Will Not be Inspired by 'Election Considerations'"]

[Excerpts] The prime minister answered questions on the economic and social situation, stating in particular:

"I understand why the French people are worried.... At the moment some anxiety is fully justified in view of the international situation.... Despite this legitimate feeling of anxiety we must not give way to discouragement because, especially as far as France is concerned, there are many reasons for thinking that we are capable of coming through this dangerous period. It will not be easy. I would be the last to say that the coming years will be easy and I think that all those who fail to tell the French people this are sending them down paths which will lead to mistakes should these people be heeded. We must realize that the coming years will be difficult.... I may have been the only person saying this for the past 4 years but I have never stopped saying it.... I repeat it now because I am convinced that there is no other tone I can take and also because I am convinced that the French people are capable not only of understanding it but also of assessing their own capabilities. What I find striking are the French people's capabilities, everything they are doing in numerous spheres. Despite the difficulties, and it is that which may enable us to 'see the light at the end of the tunnel,' To cite the well-known expression, or more precisely to spend the next few years in conditions which are relatively better than could be expected."

Citing several passages from the OECD report on the development of the French economic situation, Mr Barre said he thinks that the international experts' predictions are not particularly pessimistic and he indicated that the government "will not launch into hasty action": "I am thinking," he explained, "of all the proposals from various quarters for stimulating economic activity and for a 5 percent or 6 percent growth rate. I would like to point out," he added, "that since I have been prime minister I have had no recession in economic activity to my credit but I have had--nobody can deny it--a growth rate which has never fallen below 3 percent and which, last year, rose above 3.5 percent, depite statistics which must be interpreted in a certain way. This is a lasting and balanced revival of the French economy. Next year the situation will be difficult because if the recession in the United States takes shape, as unfortunately seems likely, and if, in addition, we observe a slackening of economic activity in the FRG... we will have to make a great effort to achieve an adequate growth rate. However, I hope that the French economy will be able to achieve a satisfactory growth rate since the government is going to support investment. In the next budget I intend to introduce measures to encourage investment so that the favorable investment trend which we are now seeing can be continued throughout 1980.... In the 1981 finance law there will be tax incentives for productive investment."

"My Heart Stops Beating"

Paying tribute to "the French people's effort," the government chief replied, without mentioning his name, to the criticisms recently made by Mr Pierre Juillet, former adviser to Georges Pompidou and Jacques Chirac, about the way in which the head of state and the prime minister are running the country's affairs (Note 1). (In his letter to the "companions" dated 21 June, Mr Juillet wrote in particular: "Poor Gaullists, ill-at-ease in your black suits, you piously celebrate the 18 June appeal but you keep quiet while France sleeps and do nothing while it drowns"): "When I hear or read some statement about France sleeping my heart nearly stops beating, for who can believe that France has slept during the past 3 years? Unfortunately, it has had to face not only the legacy of the past but the major problems caused by the international economic situation. Far from falling asleep France has worked and when you see our farmers, our business chiefs, our wage earners, our cadres and our engineers carrying on their activities not only in France but on foreign markets..I think it is scandalous to say, for purely political motives, that France is sleeping."

Mentioning the preparation of the 1981 draft budget and the forthcoming presidential election, Mr Barre said: "It is unbecoming to claim that the president of the republic, the prime minister and the government members might be tempted, out of election considerations, to deviate from the path to be followed. Do you think for a moment that I would join such a maneuver? [paragraph continues]

Do you think the president of the republic would agree to destroy or allow others to destroy what has been achieved in France, by French people's work, putting France back on its feet? Do you think that just because, for political reasons, the people I mentioned before say anything that comes into their heads, they have to be believed? The 1981 budget will be drawn up in such a way that France's budgetary administration follows the same lines as it has over recent years, in other words, prudent management of public finances."

After evading questions on the possibility of a forthcoming ministerial reshuffle and his personal role during the 1981 presidential election campaign, Mr Barre said, when questioned on Mr Michel Debre's candidacy and the appeals for a "national upsurge" by the former prime minister: "Much good may it do him!...This is no news to me. He has always said that. He makes a speech along these lines to the National Assembly once a year. I sit on the ministerial benches, listen to him, reply and so it goes on."

In conclusion, the prime minister stressed: "If I were not sure of the policy I am pursuing I would not be worthy to be prime minister. I cannot hesitate like Buridan's donkey (Note). (Jean Buridan was rector of University of Paris in 1327. Larousse recalls, "he is said to have been responsible for what is known as the "Buridan's donkey" argument, which illustrates the position of a man pulled in two directions who is unable to choose: Would a donkey which is equally thirsty and hungry and is equidistant from a bucket of water and a feed of oats start with the water or the oats?") At a given moment you have to choose and stand by your choice. That is what I do. I do so under the president's authority....I am not boasting, as has been alleged, when I say that there is no alternative policy. Moreover, all reasonable people at national and international levels know this."

Would [Socialist Party First Secretary] Francois Mitterrand, for instance, be "forced to implement the same policy" if he were in power? To this question Mr Barre replied: "He might follow a different policy but I would give him less than 1 year in which to assess the consequences of his policy and the French people would then see....Such policies lead straight to disaster."

MARCHAIS SCORES GISCARD, MITTERRAND AT PRESS CONFERENCE

LD081105 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 28 Jun 80 pp 5-6

[Apparent text of report presented to PCF Central Committee by PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais on 27 June: "Extent of Struggles Demonstrates Aspiration for Change"]

[Excerpts] In the press conference which he held yesterday [26 June] the president of the republic, discussing the economic and social situation, once again resorted to a crude smokescreen. In his view the situation is improving. He maintains this while, in reality, economic activity has been stagnating since November. The industrial production index is virtually static. Stocks are tending to mount up even further. Production looks as though it will decline: The recession is getting started in France.

At the same time inflation remains steady at record levels: more than 6.4 percent from January to May according to the official index, corresponding to an annual rate of 15.3 percent.

Similarly the overall employment situation is still deteriorating: 2.3 percent more [presumably, unemployed people] in 1 month, 8 percent more since the beginning of the year. Last year 3 million wage earners were unemployed at some time.

Finally, the deterioration in foreign trade is reaching worrysome proportions: FR28 billion deficit since the beginning to the year; FR7 billion in May alone.

Mr Giscard d'Estaing is fully aware of all this. That is why he has revived the old excuse of oil to explain the cause of our problems, although it is becoming increasingly clear that the cause of the crisis should be sought in the profit race with the monstrous confusion and waste it involves. Moreover the president of the republic took care to evade a question asked by a journalist from LIBERTE on the coal issue, although in Venice just a few days ago he supported a policy of increasing coal production in the United States and the FRG, which ultimately means giving France a "coal bill." Moreover Mr Giscard d'Estaing took pains to justify the violation of freedoms.

Alignment With Washington and Bonn

Similarly, his foreign policy stances demonstrate the capitalist regime's need to maneuver and scheme while pursuing a policy contrary to the interests of national independence and sovereignty. As we have said, the president of the republic has to take account of our people's attachment to national independence and of the extent of the struggles to promote peaceful coexistence, detente and disarmament waged by our party and other peace-loving forces. In addition there are clashes of interests among the imperialist countries. All this leads Mr Giscard d'Estaing to take initiatives such as the Warsaw meeting, participation in the Olympic games or the stance he took yesterday in favor of a political solution to the Afghan affair. However, this can in no way disguise the fundamental nature of his line: Giscardian policy is more than ever before--as yesterday's press conference demonstrated--a pro-Atlantic policy, a policy of European integration and a policy which ties France ever closer to the United States and the FRG.

What did the president of the republic actually say yesterday?

Not one word on the disarmament question.

Not one word on the new U.S. nuclear missiles which NATO intends to deploy in Europe. On the other hand, however, the president of the republic used the situation in Afghanistan as a pretext to justify the revival of the arms race and the U.S. refusal to ratify the SALT II agreements, although everybody knows that this decision was taken before [the events in Afghanistan]. Finally, Mr Giscard d'Estaing delivered an outright plea in favor of the neutron bomb. In other words the president of the republic to some extent gave an official blessing to the abandonment of the deterrence strategy in favor of a policy which tends to tie our country increasingly to the U.S. adventurist policy and make it accept the arms race at the risk of being drawn into a conflict on the European Continent.

At the same time Mr Giscard d'Estaing reaffirmed his desire to see Europe enlarged as quickly as possible to include Spain and Portugal, which confirms, as I wrote in L'HUMANITE, that his statement on a so-called "pause" in the expansion process was merely a bluff--a little petty political, electioneering ploy.

Finally, as regards the Middle East problem, the president of the republic hid, as usual, behind a smokescreen, refusing in particular to take a clear position on the question of the Palestinian people's right to a state and a homeland and on clear recognition of the PLO which would take the specific form of officially inviting Yasir 'Arafat to visit France.

Petty political maneuvers and duplicity, therefore, continue to characterize the president of the republic's foreign policy.

It is, above all, the Socialist Party's [PS] current attitude, its now complete abandonment of the union and of change, which is providing Mr Giscard d'Estaing's government with its most valuable trump cards.

What is the PS' present situation?

It is encountering very serious problems. The rightwing line which Francois Mitterrand has imprinted on it since 1977 has driven it into a deadlock. This situation is increasingly forcing it to come out into the open and present its social democratic policy in its true light. Many PS members are now discovering the consequences of abandoning the joint program. We are beginning to receive evidence of this.

Of course this process is not without vacillations and contradictions. The Socialist leaders have not given up trying to cover their line with a leftwing veil and this leads PS organizations in some cases to propose joint action with our organizations. However, at the same time--and this is the essential point--the PS is in all spheres openly following a policy which completely turns its back on previous PS pledges for union and change.

From this viewpoint Francois Mitterrand's press conference last Tuesday [24 June] is particularly revealing.

Open Abandonment of Joint Program

What did Francois Mitterrand actually say?

For somebody who, to quote the press, made a "broad survey," he showed exemplary discretion on social questions. His statements contain virtually no trace of the social objectives included in the joint program.

As far as foreign policy is concerned, Francois Mitterrand excelled himself in Atlanticism and pro-American stances in all spheres. What did he say about Afghanistan? He said that the withdrawal of Soviet forces is due to "the deterioration of the economic situation in the USSR"; the root of the problem is "the new (Soviet) territorial thrust forward which the occupation of Afghanistan constitutes"; the Afghan rebels must be "recognized at the international level." What did he have to say about the expansion of the Common Market? He is in favor of it. The neutron bomb? The "French arsenal" must not be deprived of this weapon. And so forth....

Finally, as regards the sphere of democracy, Francois Mitterrand did not say a word about the strengthening of Giscardian authoritariansim. Quite the reverse: At a time when, as I have shown, the government and employers are hitting out harder and stronger against the people's movement, Francois Mitterrand was at pains to label Mr Giscard d'Estaing as a perfect democrat. "France," he stressed, "is one of the few countries in which democracy governs civilian life." In short, Francois Mitterrand is pleased with Mr Giscard d'Estaing. He said so himself. I quote: "Things are not going badly in France...."

Francois Mitterrand Has Closed All Doors to Union

This therefore demonstrates the increasingly close convergence between Francois Mitterrand and Mr Giscard d'Estaing. Consequently he has carefully closed all doors to union.

During its national convention the PS had already rejected any joint action with us even on specific and limited objectives. Last Tuesday Francois Mitterrand deliberately made this refusal of any action or discussion a key aspect of PS policy for the coming period. As the Socialist newspaper LE MATIN points out, "He repeated several times that the PS would not negotiate with its leftwing partners." Francois Mitterrand had probably never since 1977 so clearly and openly demonstrated his jubilation at having completely closed the leftwing-union chapter.

Ultimately if we were to pick just one aspect of the main PS leader's press conference it would be this: This complete and avowed rejection of the union and of change. As another daily newspaper writes quite correctly, Francois Mitterrand "is now trying to glean votes on his right after seeking them on the left." All the signs are that he has now adopted the policy and practices of the old French section of the Workers International, and everybody knows where they led some 11 years ago....

Pursuing Implementation of 23rd Congress

What must be done in these circumstances?

We must continue to implement the 23rd Congress strategy with ever more courage, initiative and tenacity.

At our congress we defined four major areas of action to enable us to remove the obstacles which the joint program experience had brought to light and to progress, through democracy, toward change and socialism. We must abide by these areas of activity. This is the only way to succeed.

First, we must continue to be present and active in all the struggles which the workers are waging at the grassroots level. As I said at the beginning of this report: Life is hard, much too hard today for millions of people. All those people need us. We must stand by them, defend them, help unite them in action and support their struggles until their demands are met. Moreover in addition to the most severely exploited people, millions of other workers, farmers and intellectuals are taking or can take the path of struggle. Major regional and national problems require our intervention. We must be present on all fields of struggle. Far-reaching action can and must be taken even during the summer vacation period now starting.

Second, we must promote the truth, wage the ideological struggle and continue the political debate in all circumstances. We Communists have a clear outlook: We want to extend the people's movement through struggles; we want to defeat the right, defeat Giscard d'Estaing; we want to bring about radical democratic changes making it possible to destroy capital's domination; we want to move along the democratic path toward a socialism which has no model anywhere else--a French brand of socialism. This revolutionary outlook of ours must be constantly explained and put across, taking care to clarify the conditions for solving the crisis and the real stances adopted by the various political parties.

As we have already said, it is the question "to change or not to change" which determines the whole political debate. It is this essential fact which explains why the question of change and of socialism--and, of course, of the socialism which is being built in the world--is at the heart of the ideological struggle. The pressure exerted by the class adversary on this question is considerable. All commentators, sections of the media and political circles from right to left are unanimous in saying that the socialist countries constitute the apocalypse. The complete monolithism of the predominant tone on this subject is frightening.

Nonetheless we must not allow ourselves to be daunted. Of course, we do not have the vast propaganda facilities of our adversaries. However, we have on our side one weapon which they cannot tolerate: the truth. We do not say that socialism is paradise in answer to those who portray it as hell on earth. We reveal the truth about those countries--the truth as it stands without disguising flaws but also without disregarding the vast positive achievements.

We can win this great battle. We can defeat this frenzied campaign of lies and stupidities which is being unleashed from all sides. Our own battle, but also that of democracy and the quality of the political debate in France, depend on this.

Union Must Be Workers' Concern

Third, we must continue to take resolute steps to ensure that the union becomes more the concern of the workers themselves. Francois Mitterrand's latest remarks show that meetings between officials, compromises between leaders and statements from the top certainly cannot lead the people's movement to success. The union which we want--the union of all victims of capital's policy, the union of the people's forces, the union of the left for democratic change--can only be built by extending and increasing the awareness of the people's movement. This is the goal to which we are devoting all our forces. There is no other way.

PCF'S GREMETZ ADDRESSES 'MEDITERRANEAN 80' CONFERENCE

[Robert Decombe dispatch: "Security in the Mediterranean"]

[Text] Dubrovnik, 27 June--The "Mediterranean 80" roundtable meeting which opened in Dubrovnik this morning is being attended by political forces from the various Mediterranean countries. The meeting's objective is to help prepare for the Madrid CSCE meeting.

After paying tribute to Tito, League of Communists of Yugoslavia [LCY] Presidency member Aleksandr Grlickov opened the debate. PLO Representative Hammud (Hidi) made a speech in which he stressed in particular that one of the conditions for security in the Mediterranean lies in the settlement of the Palestinian problem which presupposes recognition of the PLO and the Palestinian people's right to build their own state.

PCF Central Committee secretary and Politburo member Maxime Gremetz made a speech in the afternoon. He stressed in particular that the Mediterranean, cradle of civilization, area of contacts and trade, is also a strategic region. Forming the intersection between several continents, it brings industrialized and underdeveloped countries face to face. It represents an area of confrontation between imperialism and the forces of socialism, democracy and national liberation. It is experiencing several conflicts, of which the most dangerous is the Middle East. It constitutes a major area for the accumulation of conventional and nuclear military forces.

Maxime Gremetz stressed the importance which should be attached to the question of Mediterranean security at the Madrid conference.

"The Mediterranean's character has been modified with peoples' access to independence and the fall of the fascist regimes in Spain, Portugal and Greece," he stated, "but imperialism has not given up. The decision to deploy U.S. missiles in Europe is aggravating tension. NATO, whose main force is the U.S. 6th Fleet, is maintaining its pressure on Europe's southern flank and wants to limit the thrust of socialism and the workers movement and to interfere with the liberation movements. In addition to the desire to integrate Spain into NATO and to the role which has fallen to Turkey after the overthrow of the shah of Iran, French, British and Italian forces are being redeployed. While the French Government has to take account of the national and international situations, it nonetheless has a specific role. Hence the redirection of its naval forces from the Atlantic to the Mediterranean. In addition it is becoming involved in the production of the neutron bomb. France is moving from the deterrence strategy to the 'forward battle' strategy, the enemy being designated as the USSR." [paragraph continues]

Maxime Gremetz pointed out: "While the United States is redeploying its forces in the Indian Ocean, Europe is being given the job of redeploying its forces in the Mediterranean. It is easy to see," he added, "how illusory the ideas of a Europe which is independent of the United States are. In order to make the Mediterranean a lake of peace and a zone of security, the forces of peace and progress must deploy their action," he said, "in two complementary directions: the solution of conflicts, especially the Middle East conflict, and the start of real disarmament throughout the region."

After quickly presenting the conclusions of the Paris communist and workers parties' conference, Mr Gremetz recalled that the PCF advocates a number of interim measures: "Extension of the military confidence-building measures adopted in Helsinki to the countries bordering on the Mediterranean; banning nuclear-armed ships and submarines; signing of the nonproliferation treaty (and all the international treaties) by all the Mediterranean states; ban on the introduction of new weapons; limits on foreign fleets; dismantling of foreign military bases."

Another aspect should be broadly considered for this region: Economic relations and the need to end the inequalities maintained by neocolonialism. Maxime Gremetz recalled the PCF's proposals for establishing a new world economic system.

DISSENSION DEVELOPS WITHIN PCF PARIS BUREAU, NEWSPAPER STAFFS

Paris Federation Bureau

LD071109 Paris LE MATIN in French 18 Jun 80 p 2

[Alex Liebaert report: "PCF: Fiszbin's Friends Penalized"]

[Text] There is a new development in the crisis affecting the PCF Paris Federation: During a federal committee meeting Monday night, [PCF Politburo member]--Paul Laurent made a blistering attack against former Federation First Secretary Henri Fiszbin, who had demanded that a discussion be opened among militants on the PCF's presidential campaign. However, what was even more important was that, despite opposition by a numerically important minority, the federal committee decided to reduce by four the number of federation bureau members. Three of the leaders thus dismissed from this body are Henri Fiszbin's political friends.

Far from being resolved, the sometimes insidious and sometimes open crisis which has affected the PCF Paris Federation for more than 1 year has now reached a new stage.

On Monday night, the Paris Federation Committee discussed at great length the publication of an interview by one of its members (former Federation First Secretary Henri Fiszbin) in LE MONDE on 12 June. The former Paris leader demanded that Communist Party members be directly associated with preparations for their party's presidential campaign, in particular by opening discussion tribunes in the party press. Georges Marchais' reply on France Inter Radio the same day was a categorical "no."

On Monday night, PCF Secretary member Paul Laurent returned to the charge during a federation committee meeting. According to him, Henri Fiszbin's statements were "a direct attack against the PCF leadership aimed at undermining the principles of party organization, especially democratic centralism. This is unacceptable.

However, apart from these polemics, the federation committee meeting was marked by a much more significant event. Following a proposal aimed at reducing the federation bureau's personnel, deemed too numerous, the federation committee decided to reduce its membership by four. The first abolition concerns an official who asked to be relieved of his functions "for professional reasons," but this does not apply to the other three leaders "withdrawn" from the bureau.

Now these three men, Jean Gager, Andre Reau and Bernard Gibaud, were all members of the Paris Federation leadership at the time when Henri Fiszbin was its first secretary. They openly expressed their solidarity with their leader by resigning one after another from the Paris Federation Secretariat. What is more, one of them, Jean Gager, released the text of an especially tough letter to the PCF secretary general in which he protested against the accusations leveled against the Paris Federation leadership.

It seems, therefore, that the PCF has decided to try to settle the questions stemming from the "Fiszbin affair" once and for all by relieving the former first secretary's supporters in the federation bureau of their responsibilities, on the pretext of reducing the membership of that body.

However, the fact that this decision was adopted by 60 votes against the 15 votes cast by federal committee members who opposed this measure, with 1 abstention, shows that opposition exists within the federation committee which is not afraid of asserting itself openly. In March 1980, the federation committee adopted a document after 8 hours of discussion in which it expressed its disagreement with a book ("Les Bouches S'Ouvrent") ["Mouths Are Opening"] in which Henri Fiszbin explained his disagreements with the PCF leadership. This document was adopted by 72 votes against 14, with 1 abstention. Obviously, internal opposition within the Paris Federation has not crumbled, despite pressures by the party leadership.

Editorial Staffs

CONTINUING TREND TOWARD 'DISSIDENCE' AMONG PCF JOURNALISTS SEEN

LD040957 [Editorial Report] Paris LE MATIN in French on 27 June 1980 carries on page 4 a 1,200-word unattributed report on the resignation of L'HUMANITE Economic Service Chief Jean-Pierre Gaudard because of his "deep and virtually complete disagreement with the party's current policy." The rest of the report consists of an article by a PCF official writing under the pseudonym Marc Ribas commenting on this resignation and that of revolution journalist Francois Hinckler which "demonstrates the growing malaise among communist journalists." Ribas discusses the history of this "malaise" which, he claims, goes back to the April 1978 post-election period. Ribas adds: "It can be estimated that after the party leadership's intolerable stances in the Boulin affair, the Fiszbin affair and the Afghan question more than half of L'HUMANITE's and L'HUMANITE DIMANCHE's editorial staff have joined the 'dissident' ranks in the past few months." He concludes that this trend will continue.

VANBREMEERSCH REPLACES MERY AS ARMED FORCES CHIEF OF STAFF

[Pascal Krop report: "Giscard Chooses New Armed Forces Chief of Staff"]

[Excerpt] Army General Claude Vanbremeersch was yesterday appointed armed forces chief of staff by a cabinet decision. He will replace Guy Mery, who asked to be relieved of his post. This general officer [Vanbremeersch], who had been the First Army's commanding officer and governor of Strasbourg since July 1979, is close to Valery Giscard d'Estaing and was his private chief of staff from June 1975 through June 1979. In addition, reliable circles reveal that Army Chief of Staff Gen Jean Lagarde does not intend to leave his post in the near future, as had been announced.

PORTUGUESE PREMIER CONCLUDES TALKS WITH COSSIGA, DEPARTS

[Text] Rome, July 10 (ANSA)--Portuguese Premier Francisco Sa Carneiro has said here that he is convinced that 1983 will be the year of Portugal's entrance into the European Economic Community. In a press conference here at the end of his visit to Rome this week, Sa Carneiro said that he had found great understanding towards his nation in all of the European capitals he went to. The premier said that certain matters regarding the EEC's farm policies and the joint budget may have to be re-discussed in connection with Portuguese entry into the Common Market. Sa Carneiro came to Rome at the invitation of Italian Premier Francesco Cossiga. He left the Italian capital yesterday for Athens.

The Italian Government said that it saw no justification for any delay in Portugal's inclusion in the Common Market. In talks that Sa Carneiro had here with Italian Premier Francesco Cossiga the latter stressed that Italy saw no reason not to keep to the timetable set up two years ago when Lisbon first requested admission into the Community. Italy considers Portuguese membership an important political step, despite the objective economic problems it poses. Cossiga said that membership could help consolidate the pluralistic structures of the young Portuguese democracy.

The talks here showed that Rome and Lisbon are in substantial agreement on all of the big international issues of the day. Cossiga and Sa Carneiro discussed Afghanistan, Iran, the Middle East, East-West ties, and detente. Official sources stressed Portugal's total alignment with the joint positions voiced by the EEC in the field of foreign policy. Sa Carneiro also showed great interest in the economic, fiscal and financial measures just launched by the Italian Government to combat inflation and bolster the lira. Both sides expressed satisfaction with bilateral relations, whose development is also demonstrated by ever more frequent contacts at the highest level. Just last May Portugal's head-of-state Antonio Ramalho Eanes paid a visit to Rome.

PAJETTA ADDRESSES DUBROVNIK MEDITERRANEAN 80 CONFERENCE

LD080845 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 30 Jun 80 p 5

[Silvio Trevisani dispatch: "Pajetta Tells Dubrovnik Conference on Regional Issues: Mediterranean Is Nobody's Private Estate"]

[Excerpt] Dubrovnik--There is a storm in the Mediterranean and its waters are disturbed. Europe is indecisive, for it says and does some things but fails to say and do others. It knows that it cannot continue acting like the puzzled tourist for long, but it is hesitant. The next appointment is in Madrid, at the CSCE conference, on which depend many of the hopes of a world which wants change and is calling for detente and peace; but one of the places at Madrid, which is on a par with the rest, will be reserved for the Mediterranean, with its problems, its tensions and its conflicts. Without this presence, which must be real and united, the expression "European security" will be meaningless.

Precisely this was the subject of discussion at the "Mediterranean 80" roundtable in Dubrovnik, which was organized by the Socialist Alliance of the Yugoslav Republic of Croatia. The political figures and scholars who came from all the Mediterranean countries said and repeated: The Mediterranean as a sea of peace is a vital issue for Europe. This is not difficult to understand: In this region the problems of the four points of the compass, north, east, south and west, are all involved. It is here that the two superpowers' military and political blocs touch and ancient civilizations and great cultures and religions which are difficult to reconcile contend.

"The world is in crisis," PCI directorate member Comrade Gian Carlo Pajetta said during the debate. "One of the causes is the crisis in the bipolar management of detente. The time for disputing which of the major powers should be stronger is over and so too is the time when 'realism' could be interpreted as the acceptance of the superpowers' domination. A new balance must be born: The major powers exist and are part of the world; they are also in this sea and we cannot ignore their strength, but they in turn must not ignore their duties and responsibilities."

The Mediterranean, Pajetta added, "is nobody's private estate and the balance that must be reestablished must be among everyone and not just bilateral. This seemed to be the possible means of action in the Middle East when it was decided to hold the Geneva Conference, but then came Camp David and one side decided to act against the others. The balance was broken and it was considered possible to exclude other legitimate protagonists."

Now the situation is difficult: There is the Palestinian problem, for without a solution accepted by the Palestinians there can be no peace. The Arab world is split and Europe is only just now beginning to understand that such issues cannot be disregarded. "Therefore," Pajetta continued, "everyone must make their contribution. There must be recognition of the reality of a historical process which is still under way: Israel's existence and the Palestinians' right to a state. The policy of obstinate refusal is no longer an element of unity in the Arab world. The recognition of both realities would be a new factor that would facilitate a detente process and respect for everyone's legitimate rights. The world demands tolerance; to search for it and guarantee it will be an essential contribution to peace. Europe can do a great deal in this direction and it needs it in order to guarantee its own security and stability."

But, Pajetta concluded, there are other major problems as well, and not only the decisive one of relations between the old continent and the oil-producing countries, between development and underdevelopment. "We must work to ensure the victory of understanding and cooperation among differing cultures and histories, religions and ideologies. This is an essential element in building a new balance, a new international economic order, which is indispensable for coexistence and cooperation."

TRUDEAU DISCUSSES NATO STOCKPILING, ALLIED TIES IN NORWAY

[Unattributed report: "Trudeau: NATO Stockpiles Delicate Question for Norway"]

[Text] The question of the contingency stockpiling of allied military equipment in Norway and the security problems on NATO's northern flank were the main topics at the talks Canadian Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau had with Prime Minister Odvar Nordli before ending his visit to Norway.

At a meeting with the press before his departure Trudeau said that stockpiling heavy allied equipment on Norwegian soil in peacetime is a delicate question for Norway, which must take several matters into consideration because of its proximity to the Soviet Union. The Norwegians must consider the possiblity that such contingency stockpiling can give rise to concern in the Soviet Union and perhaps lead to a further increase in the Soviet military presence in the north.

Canada alone among Norway's NATO partners has earmarked a force for deployment in Norway should the need arise. The force consists of over 4,000 men, and Trudeau said that the main reason for his visit was to take a closer look at the areas in northern Norway where Canadian forces may possibly be deployed, and to be briefed on various defense problems there.

On the question of the contingency stockpiling in Norway of equipment for this force, Canada cannot make any decision until Norway has made up its mind. The question is at present being analyzed by the Norwegian authorities, and only when Norway has come to a decision and perhaps expressed its wishes can the Canadian Government take up the matter, Trudeau said, adding that this stockpiling could involve considerable expense. Canada has committed itself to increasing its defense expenditure by 3 percent per year in real terms, and any possible expenditure on contingency stockpiling in Norway will have to be found within this margin.

The Canadian prime minister informed the press that according to military experts it would now take around 20 days to transport the Canadian force and all its equipment to Norway, whereas with contingency stockpiling it would only take 24 to 48 hours to have the force in position and ready for action in northern Norway.

The two prime ministers also discussed the situation following the invasion of Afghanistan, and in this connection the European security conference (CSCE) scheduled for Madrid in the fall.

"I think that now, in the light of the experience we have gained since the invasion, there is a growing feeling that the NATO countries must consult each other to a much greater extent so that we stand more united, for example, at the conference in Madrid, in the United Nations and in other places where Afghanistan is discussed," Trudeau said. He also mentioned that Norway's role as a bridge between OPEC and the industrialized nations was discussed during the talks. Norway, which is both an industrialized country and an oil producer, can play an important role in drawing the OPEC countries further into the work on the so-called North-South problem.

Trudeau also advocated broader cooperation between Canada and Norway to combat acid rain, which could become a great problem in Canada as the United States begins to use more and more coal-fired power stations.

PRC TO MODERNIZE FIGHTER PLANES USING UK EQUIPMENT

OW092209 Paris AFP in English 2200 GMT 9 Jul 80

[Text] London, July 9 (AFP)--China is to modernize its fleet of fighter planes with the know-how and equipment of at least two British firms, it was learned in aeronautical quarters today. A first order worth 40,000,000 pounds sterling (about 95,000,000 dollars) has just been placed with the Marconi Avionics Company after 18 months of discussions. It specializes in the manufacture of electronic equipment. A second order--believed to concern arms for aircraft--is now being negotiated with the "Dynamics" division of British Aerospace, the big nationalized aeronautical company. That division makes guided missiles.

Marconi Avionics, a subsidiary of the General Electric Company, refuses to reveal the nature of the material ordered. But observers believe that it consists of various electronic instruments which help pilots to pinpoint targets and to attack them. The equipment would be fitted in particular to Soviet MiG-19 and MiG-21 planes still in the Chinese Air Force. Marconi says only that the five-year contract concerns delivery of part of the equipment, manufacture of another part in China under license, training of Chinese personnel and after-sale services. The company is to open an office in Beijing soon with a staff of about a dozen to help to carry out the order.

Payment will probably be made through the credit of 1,200 million dollars which British banks placed at China's disposal two years ago and which has scarcely been used.

UGANDAN FOREIGN MINISTER SPEAKS ON AMIN, BINAISA, OLYMPICS

LD092054 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1822 GMT 9 Jul 80

[Text] Uganda sees no threat from ex-President Amin, now living in Saudi Arabia, Ugandan Foreign Minister Mr Erifasi Otema Alimadi said in London today. He told a press conference: "We have not asked Saudi Arabia for his return to face trial. He is not a threat. He can only walk into prison in Uganda if he comes back."

Mr Otema Alimadi, in talks with Lord Carrington at the Foreign Office, was told that the promised British aid of 5 million pounds for 1980/81 was still available.

Mr Otema Alimadi also raised the question of Commonwealth observers visiting Uganda to see that the elections scheduled for September were "free and fair."

According to the Foreign Office, Lord Carrington expressed sympathy for this nation operating under the auspices of the Commonwealth. He promised to keep in touch with the Commonwealth secretary on the possibility.

Mr Otema Alimadi confirmed that ex-President Binaisa was now under house arrest in Uganda. "He is being well treated and well fed. We are restraining ourselves in not talking about him. I am not able to reveal what I know about him," he said.

He confirmed that the commission now running the country had reversed the decision of ex-President Binaisa and would now send a team to the Moscow Olympics. Asked to explain the reversal he said: "You should ask Binaisa. It is not for the British to talk to us about politics in sport. Your rugby team is now touring South Africa."

KIPRIANOU ADDRESSES NATIONAL GUARD OFFICERS ON DIALOGUE

NC091917 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1630 GMT 9 Jul 80

[From the "Echo of Events" program]

[Excerpts] President Kiprianou delivered a speech this afternoon at the Filoxenia Hotel during a gathering of national guard officers. At the beginning of his speech, President Kiprianou congratulated the national guard officers for the excellent work they are doing and said efforts will be made to strengthen their force for the fullest defensive protection shield. The president of the republic further reviewed the developments that have taken place since 15 July 1974.

President Kiprianou also stressed that the dialogue which began as a result of the 19 May agreement has broken off exclusively because of the Turkish stand. He went on:

[Begin recording] I want to stress that we are not unreasonable nor intransigent. At the same time, however, we are determined not to accept the faits accomplis. We are determined not to accept anything which, sooner or later, would result in the partition of Cyprus or would mean the consolidation or legalization of the faits accomplis. We are willing to discuss a solution for biregional federation under the basic provision that it will be a question of federation and not confederation, namely, a camouflaged partition. We are ready for a reasonable solution that would sell out neither the rights of the state--the independent Cyprus state--nor the rights of citizens. [end recording]

Further on, President Kiprianou described Turkey's policy in the Cyprus issue as expansionist, and continued:

[Begin recording] We will continue our peaceful efforts for an honorable dialogue. I repeat, we accept the biregional federation as elucidated by Archbishop Makarios himself, who never stated that he was prepared to accept the selling out of the rights of the Cypriot citizens. [end recording]

In conclusion, Mr Kiprianou said:

[Begin recording] Concerning the national guard, I would like to express my satisfaction once again with the work being done. A very significant job has really been done and the government will continue to strengthen you. Do not allow anyone to slip away from the path of duty and become involved in other things which are unrelated to the soldier. Soldiers should not be involved in politics,nor, moreover, in any form of subversive groups. Discord has already brought many evils to this country. Some time ago, Ismet Inonu, former Turkish prime minister and predecessor to Ecevit, replied that he had no reason to accept any proposal when UN mediator Galo Plaza submitted his well-known proposals to Ankara and Inonu rejected them. Galo Plaza told him: I do not think there will be a better opportunity for the Turkish side for an honorable [Cyprus] solution. Inonu replied: The Greeks will solve the problem for us.

The disaster has already occurred because of Greeks, let the catastrophe not be completed because of Greeks. On the contrary, we must consciously realize the harm that has been done, we must put aside passions and hatred, stop any attempt to undermine the state, stop any attempt by anyone to become involved in areas outside his responsibility. The armed forces have the concrete duty to defend the homeland. Do not allow anyone to slip away from his goal; his destination is one and only one: To strengthen the country's defense shield. This is all I wanted to tell at this gathering today; this is the message I wanted to convey to you and, with it, to convey to you something else: There will be many difficulties. However, I firmly believe in the power of justice and I believe that, no matter how small we are numerically, we have the power of justice and faith in the future of this country. I believe that, sooner or later, the people will be vindicated. I thank you. [applause] [end recording]

Interior and Defense Minister Veniamin and National Guard Commander General Komninos were also present at the national guard officers gathering.

FOREIGN MINISTER ROLANDHIS COMMENTS ON ROMANIAN RELATIONS

AU032041 Bucharest AGERPRES in English 1743 GMT 3 Jul 80

[Text] Bucharest, AGERPRES, 3 July 1980--Cyprus considers the results of the summit Romanian-Cypriot dialogue of last year to have favoured the materialization of the determination to promote our relations with friendly Romania in all domains, stated the Cypriot minister of foreign affairs in an interview granted to the Bucharest weekly LUMEA. Stressing the special interest evinced by his government and people in the intensification or the Cypriot-Romanian political dialogue at all levels, Nikolaos Rolandhis expressed the hope that President Nicolae Ceausescu would visit Cyprus. The continuation of contacts at various echelons, just as the exchange of views on bilateral relations and international issues, based on the joint solemn declaration signed last year by the presidents of the two countries will influence in the positive the evolution of the Cypriot-Romanian relations, stated the Cypriot foreign minister.

Summing up the main foreign policy orientations of his country and defining peaceful coexistence as the fundamental goal of the foreign policy promoted by Cyprus, N. Rolandhis said inter alia: Cyprus' foreign policy is flatly directed toward non-alignment. Such a policy ensures Cyprus' real independence and the freedom to make its choice. We aspire after a world in which all states, even the small ones, may enjoy real sovereignty. Cyprus, a victim of the policy of strength, declares for noninterference and brands the use of force in the settlement of disputed issues.

The Cypriot minister declared for an adequate preparation of the Madrid meeting.

Approaching objectives of Balkan collaboration, the minister considered the Balkan collaboration to be an essential condition and a positive contribution to the achievement of European security, as the continent's peace and security are indivisible.

ATAKOL REJECTS CONCESSIONS ON SECURITY, BIZONALITY

TA091645 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1530 GMT 9 Jul 80

[Text] Minister of Foreign Affairs, Defense and Tourism Kenan Atakol has said that the issues of bizonality [last word in English] and security carry vital importance for the Turkish Cypriot community and no concessions can be made on these issues. In a statement to the Turkish News Agency, Atakol commented on a statement made by the Greek Cypriot Foreign Minister Rolandhis to the effect that the words "bizonality" and "security" were hindering the resumption of the talks, that the impasse would continue so long as these words existed and that they should be eliminated.

Noting that at least Rolandhis was open about his views regarding the Turkish Cypriots, Atakol said that with this statement Rolandhis has made it clear that the Greek Cypriots wish to grant no rights to the Turkish Cypriots other than the basic rights granted to minority communities, to treat Turkish Cypriots as second and even third class citizens and to lave the security of the Turkish Cypriots to the mercy of the Greek Cypriot police. Recalling Rolandhis' remark that the Turkkish Cypriots would have the freedom of movement and would be free to engage in trade, agriculture and tourism depending upon the wishes of the Greek Cypriot leadership, Atakol added: Rolandhis has said all this openly and with ease. Thus, the issues of bizonality and security are of vital importance and we cannot make concessions on these issues. In reply to a question, Atakol said: The only obstacle to the resumption of the intercommunal talks is the fact that the Greek Cypriot leadership does not see the realities of Cyprus, that it considers the island a Greek one and that it denies the Turkish Cypriot right to equal citizenship.

PORTUGAL PREMIER SA CARNEIRO ARRIVES ON OFFICIAL VISIT

[Text] Portuguese Prime Minister Francisco Sa Carneiro arrived a short while ago in Athens from Rome on a 3-day official visit on an invitation from Prime Minister Rallis. At the airport the Portuguese prime minister was welcomed by Prime Minister Rallis, Foreign Minister Mitsotakis, Director General of the Foreign Ministry Ambassador Theodhoropoulos, the Greek ambassador to Portugal and the Portuguese ambassador to Greece and other officials. Sa Carneiro is accompanied by Portuguese Foreign Minister Diogo Freitas do Amaral and by Secretary of State for European Integration Rui Almeida Mendes.

At 1800 today Carneiro will confer with Mitsotakis and at 2100 he will attend a dinner in his honor by Prime Minister Rallis at Maximos Palace. The talks will be continued tomorrow and will conclude with the signing of a cultural agreement between Greece and Portugal. At 1100 tomorrow morning and after the signing of the agreement, Carneiro will be received by President of the Republic Karamanlis and at 1330 he will give a luncheon for Rallis at the Portuguese Embassy. At 1700 tomorrow Carneiro will hold a press conference for Greek and foreign press correspondents. Carneiro will depart Athens on Friday morning.

Talks With Rallis, Others

[Excerpts] Greek-Portuguese talks started at 1800 today at the Foreign Ministry. The talks will be continued and will end tomorrow morning with the signing of a Greek-Portuguese cultural agreement. On the Greek side the talks were attended by Prime Minister Rallis, Foreign Minister Mitsotakis, Minister on Relations With the EC Kondoyioryis, Secretary General of the Foreign Ministry Ambassador Theodhoropoulos, Greek Ambassador to Lisbon Mouzos and other Foreign Ministry officials. On the Portuguese side the talks were attended by Prime Minister Sa Carneiro, Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Do Amaral, Secretary of State for European Integration Mendes, Portuguese Ambassador to Athens Cunha and the other members of the entourage of the Portuguese prime minister. This evening Rallis will give a dinner in honor of his foreign guests.

On his arrival and after inspecting the guard of honor at Hellinikon Airport the Portuguese prime minister made the following statement to the press:

[Begin Sa Carneiro recording in English with Greek translation superimposed] I am happy for my visit to Greece which is the first visit by a Portuguese prime minister. We will discuss with Rallis bipartite and international issues. As it is known, as of next year Greece will be the 10th member of the European Economic Community and it will take an active part in decision making. My government has commenced negotiations for my country's accession to the Community and we hope that Greece will support us. The experience of Greece in such negotiations will decisively help us toward attaining our goal. I am also certain that my visit will contribute to the tightening of the already good relations between Greece and Portugal and, in conclusion, I would like you to pass on to the Greek people our best wishes and my appreciation. [end recording]

Dinner Toasts

[Excerpt] Warm toasts were exchanged between the Greek and Portuguese prime ministers during a dinner last night.

Addressing Sa Carneiro, Prime Minister Rallis said, among other things: The reasons we are happy with your visit to Greece are threefold: 1) Because this is the first contact between our two countries at the highest political level during the past 35 years; 2) because of the recent restoration of democracy for the peoples of the two countries; and 3) because the two countries are situated at two extreme positions in South Europe and they are faced with a great number of problems.

After referring to the world economic crisis, to the energy problem, to inflation and unemployment, the prime minister stressed that Greece is deeply dedicated to theprinciples of respect for international law and the UN Charter and it sincerely wants to preserve peace. We cultivate good-neighborly relations with all countries, Rallis stressed, and we seek solutions to our bipartite differences through peaceful means, a dialogue and the processes provided under international law. On the tragic, as he described it, problem of Cyprus, Rallis said Greece supports its solution within the framework and in accordance to UN resolutions.

Continuing, Rallis referred to the accession of Greece to the European Community and characteristically stressed: Our accession is not aimed at guaranteeing for ourselves any material benefits because participation in the European Community presupposes a great and often hard effort. Instead, this has to do with the contribution of our forces, no matter how small they may be, to the forces of the other countries of the community so that the difficult but promising goal of a united Europe may be achieved. Rallis then referred to the Portuguese desire to join the EEC and concluded: For my aides and I our talks have been a source of happiness and satisfaction. I am convinced they mean the start of an ever tightening cooperation between the two countries both within the bipartite and the European framework.

In his reply, Sa Carneiro said, among other things, that his visit to Greece is more than a formal gesture. On the one hand there is his desire to better know a country which will become a member of the EEC and on the other hand his desire to gain from the experience which Greece has already acquired from its negotiations with the community. The cultural agreement we will sign tomorrow, Sa Carneiro stressed, is an example of the new phase into which we want our bipartite relations to enter. After the so many common ties we have, we cannot live so far apart from one another.

During this first visit of a Portuguese prime minister to Greece, Sa Carneiro concluded, we will exchange views on domestic problems and discuss international issues and exchange details related to the process of negotiations and accessions to the EEC, which has such peculiar and detailed aspects.

EXORMISI REPORTS MILITARY REJECTION OF AEGEAN CHANGES

AT051235 Athens EXORMISI in Greek 5 Jul 80 p 14

[Text] "The country's established defense system in the land, sea and airspace territorial sectors cannot tolerate new arrangements or revisions which may arise from any active questioning of the operational responsibility of the Greek Armed Forces in the Aegean area."

This passage is, among others, included in a memorandum submitted by the supreme military command to the government and which, according to our information, was personally requested by Prime Minister Rallis during a large-scale briefing conference that was held 20 days ago at the national defense general staff.

It is specifically mentioned in our report that this memorandum, which has already been handed to the prime minister, basically defines the developing dangers to our national security and specifically, to the integrity of the eastern islands complex in case of an overthrow or even a limited change to the current status in the Aegean.

In general, this memorandum from the Supreme Military Command to the prime minister first lets it be clearly understood that the Greek Armed Forces, in their capacity as responsible defenders of the entire national territory, reject every new U.S.-NATO concoction related to a limitation of airspace from 10 miles, established by the international treaty, to six miles, a fact which would have immediate effects on the equivalent sea territory under Greek sovereignty.

This sensitivity demonstrated by the Supreme Military Command on national sovereignty over the Aegean, which also coincides with the obvious concern of Greek public opinion, has a special importance today as a result of the "pessimism" demonstrated by Foreign Minister Mitsotakis after the end of the spring NATO ministerial conference held in Ankara.

Foreign sources in Athens and in Ankara confirmed that the first step of the Greek-Turkish rapproachment, about which Mitsotakis spoke, was taken silently with the joint acceptance of the abolition of control over the flights by NATO military aircraft, including Turkish aircraft, within the zone of the "Athens FIR," for which it was obligatory, until now to submit flight plans to the appropriate Greek authorities.

This measure, which was fundamentally abolished during the latest Turkish air maneuvers, opens up new prospects for the permanent goals of the Turkish staff on Greek airspace as well as the sea perimeter around the Greek islands.

From this viewpoint, foreign observers in Athens were also surprised over the reply of Prime Minister Rallis to the latest charges by Papandreou in which Rallis shared the unjustified optimism of Mitsotakis but on the other hand hinted that such dialogues produced nothing in the past and that in the same way they will produce nothing in the future.

In the meantime, a French political observer in Ankara commenting on the alleged protest by Mitsotakis to Genscher over the gigantic West German aid to Turkey, mentioned that a severe diplomatic note from the Greek Government to Bonn would have been more preferable to its participation in the NATO conference, where Greek positions were not on the daily agenda while the pressure of the Allies against Greece for the arrangements which must be undertaken through our country's realignment to the military wing.

COMMERCE MINISTER MEETS WITH ARAB ENVOYS

[Summary] Greece will serve as the bridge linking the Arab world with the EEC. This role will be granted to our country by its linkage with the EEC on 1 January 1981. This was stressed in a meeting held today between Minister of Commerce Dhimas and ambassadors of Arab countries in Athens. Both sides also expressed interest in more substantive cooperation in the commercial, industrial, investment and cultural fields. The meeting of the Arab ambassadors with the minister of commerce took place on the occasion of completion of the operating charter of the newly-established Greek-Arab Chamber of Commerce. Both Minister Dhimas and Deputy Pavlos Vardhinoyiannis, who attended the meeting as chairman of the parliamentary committee for the Arab world, recommended that a dialogue should begin to promote relevant Greek-Arab issues.

FOREIGN MINISTRY ANNOUNCES DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH ANGOLA

[Excerpt] Effective today diplomatic relations on the ambassadorial level have been established between Turkey and the People's Republic of Angola. A statement by the Foreign Ministry's Information Office says diplomatic relations between the two countries are aimed at the creation of friendship and cooperation based on mutual respect of national sovereignty, territorial integrity, noninterference in internal affairs and equality. The statement adds that the Turkish ambassador to Lagos will also serve as Turkey's ambassador to Angola.

ACTING PRESIDENT CAGLAYANGIL MEETS WITH ECEVIT, DEMIREL

In a statement after the meeting, which began at 1700 and lasted 1 hour and 45 minutes, Ecevit said that they discussed their views on the presidential elections with the acting president. He said that he and Demirel also replied to questions from the acting president and said that Caglayangil will hold meetings with the leaders of the other parties and groups represented at the assembly. Ecevit noted that Caglayangil will hold a meeting with all the leaders of the parties and groups together after concluding the individual meetings with these leaders and that it was decided that the leaders attending the meeting not make any statements before all the meetings are concluded. Ecevit added that the acting president will probably make a statement concerning all the meetings.

In his statement, Demirel said that the acting president is seeking a solution to the presidential election [stalemate]. Demirel said that, during the meeting, he conveyed his views regarding the presidential elections to Caglayangil and that the acting president will assess the various views at the end of his meetings with the representatives of the other parties and parliamentary groups.

ECEVIT REVIEWS POLITICAL SITUATION AT RPP PARTY MEETING

Speaking at the RPP joint assembly group meeting which began at 1100 today and lasted 4 hours, Ecevit said that the most effective way of combating polarization is to secure a unifying nationalism and free democracy. Noting that fascism is trying to spread in the country in the fashion of a tyrannical invading state, that the division of provinces has followed the division of quarters and that domestic migration has begun, Ecevit added that the democratic regime is no longer functioning as it should. Pointing out that the parliament has not been able to function for months due to the government's hindrances, Ecevit said: It has become clear that they will recess the assemblies. They want to govern the country without the assemblies, a president, a constitution, the laws, supervision and even without a state. The state has been replaced by big capital in economy and by oppressors in the streets.

Noting that the RPP was affected by the country's problems and that it gave the impression that it was trapped in the vicious circle of its internal disagreements, Ecevit said that the party should break away from this vicious circle and assess the party's situation within the framework of the country's and the world's problems. Pointing out that the RPP was becoming an alternative, on the one hand, to exploitation, and on the other, to fascism and communism, Ecevit continued: The RPP stand and struggle is aimed at ending exploitation and fascism in the country and Turkey's dependence on the outside world has, for certain powerful domestic and foreign circles, made the RPP an obstacle to be surmounted or, if this cannot be achieved, to be destroyed. Various (?Marxist) leftist circles view the RPP to be an obstacle hindering their area of development. Ecevit noted that the left and the right are waging a psychological war against the RPP in a bid to overcome this obstacle and that there have been attempts to make his party the major target of rightist militant circles through allegations that the RPP is protecting communists. Ecevit added that his party does not support fake nationalism that divides the nation to fronts, but rather the unifying nationalism of Ataturk.

Noting that Turkey is currently going through a grave crisis, Ecevit said: Now the only solution is to make the RPP, that is, the biggest political power and a real democratic mass organization, the support and hope of the people. How can we realize this? By restoring confidence in the RPP. Our voters of 1979 have not gone anywhere. They are waiting for us. We will first pull ourselves together and we shall be confident. Then the people's confidence and trust in us will be restored and will increase. We should assess ourselves fairly in order to believe in our party and we should not let intraparty opposition become a race aimed at slandering and weakening the party if we are to restore the people's trust in the RPP.

Ecevit said that the RPP calls for the establishment of a restoration government and the election of a president have remained unanswered. He said: We shall emerge without binding ourselves with these attempts to achieve good will. Noting that Turkey was forced to wage an arduous struggle against many sovereign forces in Turkey and in the world, Ecevit added: This will be a challenging struggle that will last for 11 months. Noting that the aim of this struggle will be elections, Ecevit said that priority will be given to organization in a bid to secure their rights during the elections. Ecevit added: We will convince our people that the only salvation is to bring the RPP to power in 1981. We shall trust our people and we will inspire confidence in them. The shortcomings of the party will be overcome--within the limits of our ability and organization--during the party congress to convene on 20 December.

Ecevit said that he did not want to engage in arguments again concerning the interpellation against the government at a time when the country is faced with so many problems. He added that, however, the issue of Necmettin Erbakan becoming the prime minister had not been discussed during his early meetings with the NSP and that it had come up in the last 2 days [of the negotiations]. Ecevit said that various party parliamentarians [presumably RPP] had gone to the NSP and suggested that this condition be proposed. Noting that he had not been consulted on the issue, Ecevit said: Now I would like to learn the reasons. The RPP joint group will continue to discuss the recent political developments tomorrow.

ERBAKAN MEETS WITH NATIONAL UNITY PARTY LEADER TIMISI

[Text] NSP leader Necmettin Erbakan held a meeting with Turkish Unity Party leader Mustafa Timisi at the NSP headquarters today. In a statement after the meeting, Timisi said that his party considers it beneficial that a new government be established and the NSP assume responsibilities in the new government.

In his statement, Erbakan said that the views that secterian differences constitute the basis of anarchic incidents do not reflect the reality and that his party regrets such statements. Erbakan said that the real reason for anarchic incidents is political and that the provocations by certain groups play an important role in this matter. He added that an impartial administration and the national view will save the country from its current problems and from anarchic incidents.

VOTCP CALLS FOR 'COORDINATED ACTION' AGAINST 'FASCIST TERROR'

TA091527 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 9 Jul 80

[Unattributed commentary: "Decisive, Mass and Antifascist Struggle Against Fascist Terror"]

[Excerpts] The cruel and bloody incidents in Corum have proved once more that cooperation between the antipeople Demirel government and the Nationalist Action Party [NAP] has reached proportions that can cause bloodshed in the country at large. The Demirel government is currently busy holding meetings to discuss the situation in sensitive areas. These meetings are being held behind closed doors. In fact, these meetings are closed to all patriotic, democratic and antifacist persons, but open to all fascist NAP members which have infiltrated into key state positions and MIT [National Intelligence Agency], as well as the members of the counterguerrilla organization and the CIA agents. It is closed to the people and open to the enemies of the people, open to those who have been involved in mass murders in Kahramanmaras, Corum, Sivas, Elazig and other cities. The aim of such meetings is probably to plan new mass murder incidents.

However, let the followers of Demirel, Turkes and men such as Koc, Sabanci, Narin, Ozal and the bloodstained and monopolist bosses grasp this clearly: Every drop of blood they shed will only serve to speedily destroy the foundations of their domination which is based on exploitation and oppression. Whoever resorts to arms is defeated by arms. The fascist terror, which is burning and destroying the cities and mercilessly massacring people without sparing anyone, can only be halted through mass demonstrations and coordinated action and through the firm and antifacist struggle of all those who are threatened by fascist bullets and are opposed to terror, irrespective of their views and party affiliations.

ASSEMBLY CONTINUES PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION WITHOUT RESULTS

WA101137 [Editorial Report] Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish on 3 July broadcast the results from the 109th and 110th rounds of presidential voting in the joint session of the Senate and National Assembly. The only candidate, Justice Party Deputy from Manisa Faik Turun, received 246 of the 393 votes cast while 40 votes were cast for other members of the assembly. There was no quorum for the 110th round. On 4 July there was no voting due to the lack of a quorum.

SUDANESE COMMERCE MINISTER LEAVES AT END OF TALKS

[Text] The Sudanese cooperation, commerce and supply minister, Faruq al-Maqbul, who has been visiting Turkey for some time as the official guest of Commerce Minister Halil Basol, returned to Sudan this evening. In a statement to a TRT correspondent at Istanbul's Yesilkoy Airport before his departure, the Sudanese minister said that he held positive meetings with government officials in Ankara. Recalling that an agreement aiming to develop the commercial relations between Turkey and Sudan was also signed during these meetings, Al-Maqbul said that this agreement constitutes a good beginning to benefit both countries.

DPA: USSR TO WITHDRAW MORE TROOPS FROM CENTRAL EUROPE

[Text] Vienna--The Soviet Union is prepared to withdraw another 20,000 troops from Central Europe in addition to the 20,000 troops and 1,000 tanks from the GDR. Moscow expects the Americans to withdraw 13,000 of their troops stationed in Europe. This was proposed by the Eastern side today in Vienna during the troop reduction talks between East and West.

An Eastern spokesman described this new proposal as a result of the recent talks between Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Soviet state and party leader Leonid Brezhnev in Moscow. He emphasized that the socialist countries are prepared for this troop reduction regardless of the as yet clearly not completed withdrawal of 20,000 Soviet troops from the GDR.

The Warsaw Pact spokesman said that with this proposal, the Eastern alliance wants to bring movement into the Vienna talks, which have been stagnating for 6 years. The East is also prepared to negotiate now that individual member states of both military alliances can individually increase their troop contingents within the framework of a yet-to-be determined common total strength (collective maximum limit). Western circles proceed from the premise that the ban on a nonincrease (pushed by the East) is mainly directed against the Federal Republic as the strongest NATO partner.

A NATO spokesman told journalists that the latest Eastern proposals will be most carefully examined in all aspects. They are, however, not comprehensive, as the problem of the real total strength of the Eastern bloc has still not been solved because the West proceeds from the premise that the Warsaw Pact has roughly 150,000 more men under arms than the West.

The East, in contrast, spoke of an approximate equilibrium in the troop strength of the two military alliances. The Western spokesman faced sharp Eastern criticism when he said that the troop reduction now proposed by the East is one-third less than proposed earlier by them. His Eastern partner replied that the West does not have the right to describe the new troop reduction proposal as negligible in light of the unilateral troop reduction in the GDR.

DPA: NO CONFIRMATION OF SOVIET MANEUVERS IN GDR

[Excerpt] Berlin--No confirmation was available either in East or West Berlin today that the Soviet maneuvers scheduled in the GDR have started. On 20 June TASS reported under a Moscow dateline that the Group of Soviet Armed Forces in Germany would stage exercises from 10 to 16 July.

A spokesman of the Soviet Embassy in East Berlin merely told DPA on enquiry that the maneuvers will take place as announced by TASS. Quarters connected with the Western allies in West Berlin have no information so far whether the maneuvers have in fact started.

LUXEMBOURG

FOREIGN MINISTER THORN VIEWS SPANISH EEC MEMBERSHIP ISSUE

LD101525 Madrid ABC in Spanish 2 Jul 80 p 11

[Angel Marcos report on Luxembourg Foreign Minister Gaston Thorn 1 July Luxembourg press conference: "Freezing Negotiations With Spain Will Not Resolve EEC's Problems"]

[Excerpt] Luxembourg--[Question] With regard to expanding the EEC, as from this July Luxembourg will be presiding over EC Council meetings. According to Giscard d'Estaing, the possibility has recently emerged of a "pause" in this expansion. Do you believe that during your term as European Commission chairman this problem can be resolved and the established timetables observed?

[Answer] I believe there have been many misunderstandings in this connection. I am not the interpreter of anyone's thoughts, least of all of the thoughts of a head of state, and therefore I must not interpret the remarks made by the president of the French Republic, since he is the one best equipped to do this. I will merely give you my opinion. There are no particularly major or insuperable problems stemming from Spain's membership application; it is simply that the problems which existed in a community of 6, which was extended to a community of 9, have taken on a new dimension at the time when the community is to be extended to 10, 11 or 12. Therefore it is not that Spain is presenting new problems but that perhaps Spain is making certain problems more tangible through its membership application. Now our task is to resolve them.

Personally, I believe that there are two approaches: one, to continue negotiations with Spain and Portugal and to examine these membership applications on their merits, as you have wished and as the government of the EEC countries have also wished. Parallel to this there are a number of problems which we should already have resolved before Britain joined and which demand a solution more than ever since Britain joined and which must be resolved before the 12 or 13 of us--I do not know how many--plunge into the unknown. But all this must be done simultaneously unless at any time we meet and decide before that this or that problem must be resolved.

But I don't believe that shelving negotiations with Spain until our problems are resolved will resolve them. And I believe that we must negotiate with Spain and at the same time resolve these problems, which have existed for many years. The two negotiations can proceed together and in any case I believe that the issues must not be dramatized. Be that as it may, I do not believe that this will significantly delay Spain's EEC membership, but that this must encourage the present nine members to work rather more diligently on resolving problems which, I repeat, we should have resolved many years ago.

[Question] Could you tell us what Spain's future in Europe is?

[Answer] It is difficult to describe in detail the role that Spain will play. For a long time we have suffered as a result of an EEC oriented too much toward the north. It is true that France and Italy imparted a Latin-Mediterranean dimension to it, though through Italy it had a somewhat national nature. The membership of Greece, on the one hand, and tomorrow Spain will impart another dimension and composition to the EEC. It will no longer be an essentially northern community but a very balanced community with more than one "foot" in the Mediterranean.

Second, each member contributes its own personality and characteristics, and hispanicism is something very important. Therefore you are opening the door to the part of the world which we, through the history of France, Germany or Britain, had neglected, namely South America and Central America. I believe that in this way you will multiply the opportunities of a future Community and, like the Benelux countries--though we are smaller--will try to make people forget that Europe is not only a dialogue between France and Germany, but something more. And this being the case, you will at the same time be facilitating the French-German dialogue, as we are trying to do.

VAN AGT COMMENTS ON SCHMIDT USSR VISIT

[Political correspondent report: "Reserved Van Agt Reaction to Schmidt Visit"]

[Text] The Hague, 5 July--Prime Minister Van Agt showed great restraint in his optimism over the results of West German Federal Chancellor Schmidt's visit to Moscow.

After Foreign Minister Van der Klaauw had briefed the cabinet meeting yesterday on the European report that his West German counterpart Genscher had earlier given to the foreign ministers of the Nine, Van Agt called Schmidt's visit "a good affair without spectacular results; but who had expected any?"

The Russian declaration of readiness to talk with the United States on Eurostrategic weapons without waiting for the ratification of SALT II does not mean all that much, according to Van Agt. In fact the Russians would only be willing to implement the eventual results of negotiations after the ratification of the treaty. Moreover, Schmidt's success in Moscow did not include an announcement that negotiations would actually take place.

According to Van Agt, the decision on the deployment of the new nuclear weapons on Dutch territory is a matter for "those who will have power and responsibility in December 1981." For him it is clear that if possible talks with the Soviet Union before December 1983 have not yielded any results, deployment in the Netherlands must go ahead. According to Van Agt this is in accordance with the Dutch reservations expressed at the NATO meeting of 12 December 1979.

SCHMIDT, GISCARD CONTINUE TALKS IN BONN 10 JULY

[Excerpt] Bonn--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing met in Bonn this afternoon for a political exchange of views. In the focus were the recent meetings between Giscard and Schmidt with the Soviet state and party leader Leonid Brezhnev as well as the international crisis points of Afghanistan, Iran and the Middle East. Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and the other ministers attending the summit had separate talks with their counterparts on their respective portfolios.

OFFICIALS MEET WITH REPRESENTATIVES OF FIRMS IN IRAN

[Excerpts] Hamburg--The German pharmaceutical firms voiced concern today at the measures taken by Iranian quarters against their plants in Iran but did not describe what has happened as expropriation. This was stated by a spokesman of the Federal Economics Ministry after a talk by representatives of German firms with senior officials of the Economics Ministry and the Foreign Ministry.

A spokesman of Hoechst AG said on enquiry that the use of the term "expropriation" in press reports was unfortunate. All that happened at the Hoechst Iranian plant was that three gentlemen called presenting a letter from the government appointing a new production manager. The previous Hoechst production manager was advised not to enter the plant again for "security" reasons. Managers at other firms on the other hand were asked to remain as advisers. Hoechst was unable to confirm that accounts and stores have been seized.

Industrial quarters surmised today that the Iranian measures are a reply to the economic sanctions against Iran agreed on by the EEC foreign ministers in Naples last May.

During the talks between the representatives of the various firms and the Bonn officials it was agreed that the six enterprises and the Federal Government should seek talks with the Iranian Government with a view to persuading it to rescind the measures. The impression of the representatives of the firms was that the Iranian authorities have not acted uniformly. Pharmaceutical firms of other countries have also been affected. According to these accounts, production by these firms is continuing but the German management is in effect no longer in charge. At the moment it is impossible to make a final assessment of the situation.

Before the Bonn talks, Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff said in a Deutschlandfunk interview that it is impossible to say at the moment what possibilities are open to Bonn to assert its rights under the agreement with Iran on the protection of German industrialists: "Anyone who takes hostages will not observe international law applying to economic agreements." He did not expect his fears to be borne out so soon.

Iranian Embassy Statement

LD101714 Hamburg DPA in German 1516 GMT 10 Jul 80

[Text] Hamburg--The Iranian Embassy in Bonn this afternoon "emphatically denied" that German pharmaceutical enterprises in Iran have been expropriated. In reply to a DPA enquiry the charge d'affaires of the Iranian Embassy, Mahdi Naveh, said: "This report is in line with the series of provocative reports which are aimed at worsening German-Iranian relations."

LAMBSDORFF REPORTS ON TOKYO MEETING WITH CARTER, MUSKIE

LD101842 Hamburg DPA in German 1536 GMT 10 Jul 80

[Text] Bonn--According to Federal Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff, U.S. President Carter and Secretary of State Muskie, during talks with him in Tokyo, described Chancellor Schmidt and Foreign Minister Genscher's Moscow talks as a "successful" visit. Lambsdorff, who represented the Federal Government at the funeral of Japanese Prime Minister Ohira, reported on his talks with the U.S. representatives in a Deutschlandfunk broadcast following his return today.

Lambsdorff emphasized that the views of the Federal Government and the U.S. leadership were identical. It was now a question of discovering the real intensions of the Soviets.

From his talks with U.S. security adviser Brzezinski, which also took place on the sidelines of the memorial ceremony, Lambsdorff draws the conclusion that the indiscretion over the minutes of the Moscow talks has not marred German-U.S. relations. Anyone who intended to achieve this has "achieved the opposite."

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE COMMENTS ON CARTER-HUA TALKS

[Commentary signed Ein.: "A Signal"]

[Text] Carter and Hua met in Tokyo on the occasion of Ohira's burial for a discussion. The Chinese as well as the Americans were concerned about political tactfulness. They tried to avoid having the host country become the platform for a demonstration against the Soviet Union. Despite Afghanistan and despite the strategic concentration of the Soviet Union in the Far East, Japan as an industrial state does not want to strain relations with the Soviet Union as a trade partner more than absolutely necessary. Carter and Hua showed understanding for this. This time the Chinese were more concerned about talking to the American President than challenging the Kremlin with words. Observers are convinced that it was particularly Hua who sought the exchange of opinion. Beijing decided to make the trip once it was certain that Carter would come. Both statesmen certainly also discussed the most recent event occupying the Far East: India's recognition of Heng Samrin, who was appointed by the North Vietnamese in Kampuchea. Thereby New Delhi, which is of strategic proximity to China, has joined the Russian line. But most of all Hua was said to have been interested in testing America's approach to China. Beijing has registered with concern that Carter's challenger Reagan is skeptical about the Chinese-American rapprochement. The possible Republican candidate for president does not want to see Taiwan abandoned. Maybe Hua wanted to give out a signal in Tokyo.

PROMISE SEEN IN EASTERN MBFR PROPOSAL

[Commentary signed Mac: "Concessions"]

[Text] Some movement is going to take place in the Vienna negotiations on arms and troop reductions in Central Europe (MBFR), talks which have been dragging on for years and which have had a difficult time of it. The recent Warsaw Pact suggestion, offering in addition to the unilateral withdrawal of 20,000 soldiers from the GDR another withdrawal of 20,000 soldiers and 1,000 tanks from the Central European MBFR reduction area if the United States in exchange withdraws 13,000 men, goes further than anything that has been heard so far in Vienna.

The suggestion primarily contains two concessions, although it has not been put that way: First, it can be concluded that the Warsaw Pact indirectly admits its officially contested numerical superiority in soldiers in Central Europe and intends to decrease that superiority; second, the Eastern side is prepared to drop the demand for an equal decrease in troop strengths on both sides. Naturally some eager beavers will consider this move a maneuver to distract attention from Afghanistan. They may have played a part in it, but it is no reason not to forcefully promote an initial MBFR agreement which shows promise.

PAPER VIEWS SOVIET ARMS OFFER TO U.S.

[Article signed R.H.: "The Gift"]

[Text] A statesman who has just come back from a delicate visit cannot say before parliament that he has heard some of his host's statement with distrust. This is left to us. The Soviets gave Schmidt something for his trip back: the Soviet preparedness to start negotiations on medium-range weapons even without suspension of the decision to close the arms gap. This is now being considered almost a great concession, although the "crisis"--an ambiguous term--is a result of the fact that the Soviets had made the Americans believe that the SALT agreement settled all essential points, although it did not include the allegedly "tactical nuclear arms." Meanwhile the Soviets surprised the West with their SS-20 missile, which is a medium-range missile threatening all of Europe, however, by its range of action and thus is considered by Europe to be a strategic weapon. Following many years of urging by the federal chancellor, NATO made the decision to close the arms gap, whereupon the Soviets produced the "crisis." Moscow sees a chance also in the future to enhance differences in the West, both domestic policy differences and differences between Bonn and Washington.

The Federal Government would like to see it differently, but a fundamental German-American difference has not yet been eliminated. A large part of the Americans follow an old principle, namely not to negotiate if one has nothing in one's hand. Therefore the negotiation offer from Moscow is not at all welcome to every strategist in Washington, because Moscow's very wish to include other arms systems in the deal, of which at least the Poseidon missiles are strategic, confirms that the Soviets have fooled the Americans with the allegedly nonstrategic SS-20 and that the "dirty trick" is to be repeated. It is the Soviets who want to continue negotiations. Only, they have to appear to be prudish, because if they are to make concessions eventually, they probably would expect something else to come out of it: the halt of the neutron weapons and the cruise missiles which start giving them trouble. True, Schmidt has not brought back a Trojan horse, but the gift will be studied critically in Washington for a long time yet. Agreement exists only on the necessity of SALT II.

MINISTER DEFINES DEVELOPMENT AID POLICY

DW100855 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 1110 GMT 9 Jul 80

[Excerpts from reporter Lenz interview with Rainer Offergeld, federal minister for economic cooperation, presumably in Bonn--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Does the Federal Government intend to link in some way or other development aid with political good conduct by the recipients?

[Answer] Well, the main aim--and agreement exists in the Federal Government on this--is to fight absolute poverty. In other words, we want to help the poorest strata of the populace wherever possible in the Third World, regardless of the form of government. There is no question at all that there is also a legitimate interest of our own, a general political interest, in stabilizing countries by promoting reasonable economic development. It is correct that we will support such countries particularly which are undergoing extraordinarily dangerous developments, such as Turkey. This will continue in the future.

[Question] Does the support of liberation movements play any part?

[Answer] Naturally. We have made it clear that we will give special support to all political movements striving for more social justice. Naturally this is also valid wherever liberation movements are fighting regimes pursuing racial injustice. We will continue to support these liberation movements as long as peaceful development is involved, support them as we have supported them in the past.

[Question] With the reservation: As long as these are peaceful developments.

[Answer] Yes, peaceful developments. We Germans act on the basis of special historical experience with regard to political violence and wars. I think it is correct that we limit our support to peaceful developments. One can do quite a lot to support the liberation movements without supplying them with arms.

[Question] Yes, but development aid is not identical with the supply of arms. Do you think, does the Federal Government believe, that the concept you have described will do justice to liberation movements and situations in some states, even if these states believe occasionally that they ought to take up arms?

[Answer] No, I can imagine that there might be historic situations where the application of force will be the last possibility in the fight against an unjust regime. We have experienced such situations ourselves. I would remind you of the resistance against Hitler. One cannot condemn someone who says after a thorough examination and consideration of all moral aspects: Only force can help now. One cannot rule out the existence of such situations. There are certainly regimes where one could tend to say that only force will help if one wants to achieve something.

It is another problem, however, whether of all people we Germans, with our special experience regarding the handling of force in the past decades of our recent history, whether we ought to support violent conflicts. That is the second question; and I say no. We ought to concentrate on preparations for peaceful developments. We have done so in practice with regard to the Rhodesian example. We supported the liberation movement, which is now supporting the government chief, not with arms supplies but through training people who will be able to help build the country as skilled workers and as very urgently needed experts.

PREMIER BARRE LEAVES FOR SUMMIT TALKS IN BONN

LD101428 Paris Domestic Service in French 1400 GMT 10 Jul 80

[Text] Raymond Barre has left for Bonn where he will attend the 36th French-German summit. Valery Giscard d'Estaing arrived in Bonn late this morning at the end of his official visit to West Germany. Valery Giscard d'Estaing will meet with Helmut Schmidt in Bonn.

LE FIGARO SKEPTICAL OF GISCARD, SCHMIDT VIEW OF USSR

LD090741 Paris LE FIGARO in French 3 Jul 80 pp 1 3

[Max Clos editorial: "Brezhnev and the West: Simple Questions"]

[Text] Western statesmen are delighted with Brezhnev. The talks they have with him always bring positive results. Giscard d'Estaing is pleased that after the Warsaw meeting the Soviets announced a withdrawal of troops engaged in Afghanistan. After the Moscow meeting, Helmut Schmidt has "reason to believe that the Western countries and the USSR are getting round to negotiations on Eurostrategic missiles."

Fine, although all this leaves us perplexed and skeptical. In Europe's foreign policy there is a sort of blur, an alienation, almost a divorce between the official announcements and the apparent or real facts which we know. Is this forced optimism or is it based on something solid?

This concern makes us ask three questions.

The president of the republic informed us that France would not help the Afghan "rebellion". The Soviets made it known to Schmidt that the troop withdrawals announced were more than sufficient, that the topic was exhausted and that the time had come to talk of something else.

Moscow's reckoning seems quite clear to us. It is a matter of gaining enough time for the Soviet expeditionary corps to crush what we, for our part, will call the Afghan "resistance", following which they will be able to establish a political regime completely faithful to the Soviet Union in Kabul without opposition.

Question: When a "political solution" for Afghanistan is mentioned, must we infer from now on that Europe has resigned itself to a fait accompli? Are to understand that in particular the Russians are being asked to wind up their mopping-up operations as rapidly as possible so that we hear no more about a show of force or about resistance?

In Europe the SS-20 missiles constitute an indisputable menace directed against it and they confer on the USSR an overwhelming military superiority. But Moscow will not suffer Europe to ensure its own defense. The deployment within the next 2 years of U.S. Pershing-2 missiles is regarded as a typical act of aggression.

Question: Is the correlation of forces already so formidably in Moscow's favor that Europe has not other choice than to bend before the diktat, or do the Western heads of state in fact consider that no serious danger exists?

The USSR is for detente and is fighting for peace. We are convinced that it does not in fact want war. But it has by no means abandoned its permanent aims which are to gradually take control of Europe by peaceful means, that is on the cheap, without the risks and sufferings implied by an armed conflict.

Question: Has Europe--tired, divided, irrational and garrulous--become so weak that it is ready in order to save detente to give in to all Soviet blackmail, content to merely call it "unacceptable"?

These are three simple questions.

It would be nice to receive convincing replies to them.

LE MONDE ON SOVIET MISSILE OFFER, U.S. REACTION

[Editorial: "Toward A Dialogue on the Euromissiles"]

[Text] The details given in Moscow and in Bonn on the Schmidt-Brezhnev talks confirm that the Soviets made concessions to the chancellor on the Euromissiles which, in keeping with their guest's wishes, will make it possible to open negotiations on this subject. Giving some satisfaction, even if only symbolic, seemed necessary to them to promote the dialogue they want with Western Europe.

However, just as the withdrawal of one division and some 100 tanks from Afghanistan was a restructuring of the Soviet contingent rather than a real disengagement, the opening of negotiations on the Euromissiles in no way implies a halt in the deployment of the SS-20 missiles targeted on West Europe which is proceeding at the rate of one missile every 5 days. Just because the USSR shifts the helm by a few centimeters does not mean it is changing course.

The limits of the approach made to Mr Schmidt are clearly set out by PRAVDA's editorial on 8 July. The USSR has not withdrawn its previous proposals and has not officially abandoned the demands it made at the beginning of the year: suspension by NATO of its decision to deploy U.S. medium-range missiles in Europe. It has simply stopped posing them as a precondition for opening preliminary talks.

The interlocutor to whom this concession was made was well chosen: The reason Mr Schmidt laid more emphasis than anybody on the dual nature of the allies' December decision--deployment of the missiles but a request for negotiations with the East at the same time--is because he thought that the United States was, at present, only interested in the first point. The USSR is returning the proposal and, although the chancellor wants merely to act as "mailman" between Moscow and Washington, he is being forced whether he likes it or not to defend the Soviet positions to Mr Carter.

In addition to this the Kremlin has given its interlocutor another mission: that of opposing Spain's entry into NATO. The Soviet leaders were known to be very anxious to prevent an expansion of the Atlantic alliance but this is the first time that a major member of the Western defense system has been singled out to receive a "warning" on this subject.

So far U.S. reactions to the proposals on the Euromissiles have been cautious. Mr Carter and Mr Muskie have said they are prepared to "use them in a constructive spirit," but they have not given any verdict on the lines the negotiation might take. The Soviet demand to include all U.S. "forward systems" is not surprising: Moscow has long been demanding negotiations on all armaments deployed in Europe and capable of reaching the USSR.

Mr Gromyko's desire to leave aside the French, British and Chinese nuclear forces is newer. Is this another concession to France which has always stated that it is not interested in such a dialogue unless the superpowers make a significant reduction in their nuclear potential? However, the Kremlin is not burying its former demands on this point either; it is waiting to formulate them again in the framework of a future--and still hypothetical--SALT III negotiation.

SOVIETS PROPOSE ENERGY 'COLLABORATION' AT SYMPOSIUM

LD101539 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 28 Jun 80 p 18

[Unattributed report: "USSR Proposal to Italy for General Agreement on Energy"]

[Text] Rome--The Soviets are proposing to Italy an intergovernmental agreement on general collaboration in the sphere of energy sources. This is the main point made in the 14-point memorandum approved by the participants in the Italian-Soviet symposium on energy sources which ended yesterday at the National Research Council. The meeting was organized by the USSR State Committee for Science and Technology and, on the Italian side, by the Italy-USSR society, in collaboration with the major state bodies (the National Electric Power Agency [ENEL], the National Hydrocarbons Agency [ENI], the Industrial Reconstruction Institute and the National Nuclear Energy Commission) and the General Confederation of Italian Industry.

At the very start of the meeting, which opened on Monday, Soviet keynote speaker Prof Zhimerin indicated that collaboration, which is feasible across the entire range of energy sources, could be particularly prominent in spheres such as the interlinking of power grids, which would enable electricity to be exported to Italy just like coal, and the utilization of Siberian gas in West Europe. Gaining access to these sources requires scientific and industrial efforts but above all huge investments. Anyone who wants energy must take part in efforts to produce it.

The ENEL announced its willingness to study the construction of the USSR-Italy power link. The mechanical engineering finance corporation, Ansaldo and the Nuclear Energy Commission are proposing to take part in the USSR's planned program of 60 nuclear power stations. The ENI, with other West European bodies, is taking part in talks about gas. But in the working groups, which met separately in Pisa, where the ENEL is experimenting with power transmission at 1 million volts, at Ansaldo headquarters in Genoa, at Fiat in Turin and at ENI headquarters in Milan, a much broader and clearer view emerged of the opportunities for collaboration. Exchange is already possible in substantial amounts on the basis of existing industrial capacity and resources, but that is not the entire story. Despite its enormous hydrocarbons and coal reserves, the USSR itself is aiming toward a very wide diversification of energy sources (solar, wind, geothermal, nuclear fusion and so forth) and hence toward a relative broadening of the scientific and technical base.

The approved memorandum lists spheres of collaboration under 14 headings. Industry, research centers and economic and technical "circles" are invited to participate in a collaboration project of vast dimensions. The intergovernmental agreement on energy which is being sought by the Soviets clearly aims to collate these developments within a definite framework of political relations between the two countries.

Industry Minister Antonio Bisaglia made a concluding speech at the symposium. He referred to the Venice "summit," which raised the problem of reducing dependence on oil and demanded that "differences of stance be overcome so that both Western and socialist countries can confront a crisis which has a long way to go yet." As to bilateral relations, Bisaglia confined himself to the generalized wish for "further advantageous developments."

PSOE LEADER INTERVIEWED ON FOREIGN POLICY ISSUES

LD101457 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 29 Jun 80 pp 18-19

[Pablo Sebastian interview with Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE] Secretary General Felipe Gonzalez: "Spain Must Be Permanent Observer Within Nonaligned Countries Group"--date and place not given]

[Text] Question: With its announcement of the timetable for Spain's entry into NATO, the government has sparked off a broad debate on foreign policy. What are the main outlines of this policy from the PSOE's viewpoint?

Answer: Leaving aside bookish schemes, which not infrequently lead to Manichaean attitudes, I can state that the PSOE's foreign policy has a clear-cut active neutralist inspiration, without this implying that we contradict what everyone considers the major vectors of Spain's foreign policy as a nation, which include our European and Western dimensions. Countries such as Austria and Sweden practice neutral formulas and nobody regards them as third-world oriented. Furthermore, both those countries are in fact under the Western defense umbrella.

In our opinion Spain is intimately linked to the processes of European integration and must participate in all of them, both within the EEC and within the Council of Europe and other bodies. We also believe that relations with Latin America and the Arab world are also priority considerations in our foreign policy.

Finally, we recognize our integration in the Western world and its defense. Of course Spain is included in Western defense, but this does not mean that the degree and nature of our commitments to it are the same as, or similar to, those of other countries in real terms, much less so in terms of our historical situation. And it is precisely on the basis of this historical situation that we socialists defend Spain's present kind or degree of commitment with respect to the blocs, passing our aspiration to active neutralism through the sieve of this moment in history. And therefore we radically oppose any change in the present state of affairs, I have outlined, such as the government intends to carry out on the road to NATO.

In other words Spain's entry into NATO constitutes the central point of divergence between the foreign policy of the Union of the Democratic Center [UCD] and the PSOE, which have many other points in common, such as Europe, Latin America and the Arab world, though here admittedly there are also major differences concerning the opportuneness of and mode of execution of the various forms of action affecting these areas. We deeply regret this pro-NATO departure by the government because it will seriously affect the unity of foreign action, which the Spanish political forces must preserve so as to strengthen our presence in the world with a clear state awareness.

Question: The first vector is integration into Europe. At present France and the FRG are talking about reforming various EEC policies before any new memberships. What is your position on the present EEC process?

Answer: As far as the EEC situation is concerned, it is worth considering whether the EEC is merely experiencing a temporary crisis or, worse, a structural crisis due to the emergence within it of the rebirth of European nationalisms nurtured by the world economic crisis. This presents the EEC with two possible alternatives: one, conservative, that advocates the idea of first setting its own house in order and later admitting new tenants; and the other, progressive, which would consist of a global reassessment of the issue of European building and of the present difficulties that it entails. [paragraph continues]

I fear that the conservative attitude has been chosen instead of the progressive one (to which Spain, as an interested party, could be associated) and this implies many dangers. One of them will be the EEC's loss of credibility in the North-South dialogue, due to its inability to pursue such a policy even within Europe itself, and another danger, which would be disappointing and unacceptable to Spain, would be the feeling created by the knowledge that European politicians concluded their electioneering speeches in Franco's time by saying that Spain would join the EEC when democracy arrived and that now election campaigns are conducted in some countries with exactly the opposite assertion.

"No to EEC Hand-in-Hand With NATO"

Question: What is your attitude to the lull in negotiations and the government's EEC policy?

Answer: As far as the Spanish Government's attitude is concerned, I must say that it does not seem to have understood the European issue. It lacks sensitivity to these issues, just as it lacks sensitivity to the progressive loss of freedoms in our country. The government took advantage of the link established between the words "Europe" and "democracy" and merely tried to wrest the European flag from the anti-Francoist opposition to gain democratic credibility at home, and it is satisfied with that.

Application for EEC membership took place rather hurriedly, without the government's having assessed the costs and advantages of membership and without the slightest analysis or planning. A similar attitude was adopted to the negotiations, in which the ministers directly and actively affected (much less the socioeconomic sectors also affected) are not participating, but which are being conducted by a new department, which implies a basically political rather than technical or economic initiative, these latter being the kind that could provide the real answer to the problems of EEC membership.

The government has hitherto adopted a political and somewhat electioneering attitude, and one good example of this is its insistence on completing negotiations in early 1983 (neither before nor after), on the eve of the Spanish general elections. This being the case, it is difficult to level a charge of electioneering at Giscard d'Estaing, whose remarks were open to use for domestic consumption.

As for what attitude to adopt now to the real pause imparted to the negotiations and which the government is unwilling to acknowledge to the public, but is willing to use against the Ministry of Relations With the EEC, the PSOE proposes a steadfast stance in favor of integration as Spain's right and not with embarrassed mendicancy (as has been the case.)

The fact that this matter has been linked with the NATO issue indicates another over-complicated and weak attitude on the government's part with respect to Europe, a form of conduct which, as long as it continues, will prevent us from supporting this procedure of approaching the EEC hand-in-hand with NATO. We regard the EEC as a necessity, and in view of the present situation and difficulties, without ceasing to insist on EEC membership, we propose that the other two priority areas of our foreign action be strengthened, namely, relations with the Latin American countries and the countries of the Arab world. This should have been done from the outset, when an EEC ministry was formed, without questioning the importance of both areas of foreign action.

Question: There are two topical issues relevant to Europe: the Basque homeland and freedom in France and Gibraltar. What is your party's stance on these issues?

Answer: In the antiterrorist struggle there has hitherto been no international solidarity with Spain through the intelligence services and special security bodies. Measures have only been taken in this direction when they were aimed at defending the individual interests of the countries taking them, that is, there has been no progress in solidarity since Franco, because the same happened under Franco.

Underlying this issue there is a problem of image, basically the cost of reform instead of a clear break. This is the image that could be given, for instance, by an ambassador of the former era who still holds the same post and who has not been consulted by a democratic government for years and who must be consulted now. This example (with due respect to the good work done by diplomats), which is also applicable to the European issue, somewhat oversimplifies the basic problem with regard to receiving foreign solidarity. What we cannot analyze here is what answer should be given to a country which not only does not want to cooperate but which is sometimes indulgent. I feel it is right for Minister Oreja to speak clearly about France now; this should have been done before, and it is not enough. What the majority of countries do in such circumstances is issue a serious reply. I believe that in this case France should have been made to see that it, too, has specific problems which could be compared with those facing Spain.

Be that as it may, the background to this problem reflects a lack of authority on the government's part in gaining respect abroad, similar to the lack of authority we are experiencing within the state.

As for the Gibraltar issue, I still believe it is a serious mistake to link it to the NATO issue, as the government has done. We will not back this policy, though we will continue to act in favor of reestablishing Gibraltar's sovereignty. In our talks with British Labor Party leaders we have discussed these topics many times. But sovereignty over our own territory cannot be exchanged for NATO membership

"We Will Leave NATO By a Straight Majority"

Question: Let us discuss the NATO issue. The government already has a timetable and the decision to take Spain into NATO by a straight majority in parliament. There has been talk of likewarm PSOE opposition on the Atlantic issue. What truth is there in this and what is your position on this crucial aspect of foreign policy?

Answer: First, I would like to say that theoretically the government would find it easy to achieve NATO membership in the way you mentioned. We have seen the Atlantic countries' favorable reaction to the government's statement. These reactions are understandable because the NATO issue with regard to Spain is not so much a question of defense as a question of the confrontation between blocs in the political field, so that the present mobility of the Spanish state would favor one or other of the two blocs. Now we must reply to the government's plans by saying that if we do join NATO by a straight parliamentary majority we will leave NATO by a straight parliamentary majority and decision. And if anyone is willing to think about it he should, because this could be a very serious matter. A straight majority would work both for joining and for leaving NATO and this must prompt the government and the NATO countries to reflect, because the parliamentary majority will not always be the same as it is now.

Furthermore, I regard the government's timing in raising the issue as disastrous. It coincides with the consolidation of the democratic process, has been linked with other issues such as the EEC and has been turned into a distraction from the grave domestic problems that we are experiencing as well as a field of personal battles within the government. There is a danger of splitting the Spanish people over the NATO issue, and from a dangerous and false perspective, because there is an attempt to align those in favor on the right and those against on the left. Whereas in fact the problem is how to find out which citizens believe that Spain's security and defense and its role in the world depend on NATO and which do not. Or to put it more bluntly, how to discover which citizens agree with deploying a nuclear missile 100 km from Madrid in the knowledge that an SS-20 can be deployed at the same distance from Moscow, but targeted on Spain. This must be borne very much in mind when discussing the citizens' security and well-being, which is the basic issue. I am not against NATO; what I am against is Spain's joining NATO, which is quite different. I might be against NATO in the same way as I am against the Warsaw pact, because what I want is the elimination of military blocs. [paragraph continues]

In other words, "no" to Spain's entry into NATO and "no" to the simplistic argument of being for or against NATO. Therefore I would like to say that we do not intend to participate in the so-called anti-NATO committees financed by strange organizations. We will, however, carry out a campaign of explanation with respect to the public.

I fear, however, that this debate will not be approached responsibly in defense of the Spanish citizens' real interests and security. Furthermore, I believe that this debate of supranational scope--though its decisionmaking context is national--will be affected by many international political and economic interests with the intention of influencing the Spanish people's decision. All this while we are at present suffering a major economic and social crisis and carrying out a transformation from an authoritarian and centralist state to a democratic state of autonomies.

In this connection, if the government persists with its irrational haste a broad parliamentary debate must be started and addressed to the public, such as the one that took place on domestic policy issues. It seems to me that the announcement of the government's NATO timetable in an interview a few days after this debate, in which the UCD refused to discuss foreign policy, is a demonstration of contempt for the Spanish democratic institutions. The debate must culminate in a popular consultation.

It must also be emphasized that this debate must also embrace many political and technical subjects of great importance, such as the fact that the greatest dangers facing Spain in its defense come from its southern flank, which is not covered at all by NATO. Another important point to be borne in mind when discussing NATO and identifying it with the West and democracy, is that Portugal was in NATO while dominated by the Salazar dictatorship, as were the Greek colonels who overthrew King Constantine's monarchy.

"Socialists Will Not Defend Foreign Bases in Spain"

Question: The government and many observers find it difficult to understand how the pace can support the presence of U.S. bases in Spain and at the same time oppose NATO membership.

Question: Well, in my opinion this is one of the major errors or manipulations of the government. It should never have connected the issue of bilateral relations with the United States with the NATO issue. There are many things that need clarifying here. We are accused of wanting to maintain bilateral relations with Washington within the present foreign policy framework that we defend and we are told that mutilateral Atlantic relations are much more advantageous. It seems clear at present that the government wants to maintain both kinds of relations, mutilateral and bilateral, and if this is not the case, then it must make this clear. There is no choice of multilateral relations in exchange for bilateral relations, just the obligation to accept both.

Furthermore, there has been an interesting evolution in bilateral relations in recent years, including the withdrawal of nuclear weapons from our territory, which could in itself form a basis for improving the contents of future agreements. And I wonder: Will Spain's denuclearization be accepted by the other NATO allied countries if Spain joins? This, too, must be clarified to the public, because just a few months ago Prime Minister Suarez was welcoming in Brussels the Atlantic countries' decision to deploy Pershing missiles on their territory. This reflects a clear intention on Mr Suarez' part, if he is consistent with is assertions.

As far as we are concerned, the important thing is for Spain to be as independent and neutral as possible and to become increasingly so. The agreement with the United States has improved somewhat in recent years and can be much further improved in our country's favor in future negotiations.

Now if this agreement is linked with the NATO issue as the government has done, it encourages a popular attitude whose first deduction is that the two issues are linked and must remain so. This could lead to an attitude of questioning the bilateral treaty, and of course if that happens the socialists will not be the ones to defend foreign bases in Spain. This is clear. Our position is to maintain the present situation--I repeat--and not now to create a polemic in this connection which could have broad repercussions among the people and create unforseen tensions, because as we have said many times and are willing to repeat, there is an awareness in this country that the United States made it possible for Francoism to survive for 30 years. In other words, let the government not complicate things more through its own clumsiness, and if it does not want to abandon the NATO plan, at least let it wait until the comparison of stances can tak place within a more consolidated democracy.

Spain Must Defend Ceuta and Melilla

Question: We have discussed the weakness of the southern flank. Herein lies the problem of the Sahara and of Spain's relations with the Maghreb countries. What is your position on this subject?

Answer: Our position is well known as being in favor of the Saharan people's self-determination. In this conflict I believe it is important that Spain maintain good-neighborly relations with Morocco and Algeria, without this implying that we must turn our backs on a historical responsibility like the Sahara. And I am not thereby proposing an impossible and unnecessary turnabout. How can you say that we have nothing to do with the Sahara? Of course we do--and very much so--and particularly because this problem is part of our history. Let us not forget that Spain created only the administration, not the sovereignty, of the Saharan territory. You cannot make sudden changes of course, especially in foreign policy.

Question: But in this matter the fact is that all the sides concerned in the conflict are using Spain as the object of their blackmail. It is enough to consider the issues of fishing and the export of Moroccan oranges to Spain--both issues are linked in a document which we have managed to see--and the future of Ceuta and Melilla. What can we do now: Withdraw from the fishing grounds to avoid problems?

Answer: There is little I can say about the interrelation between the problems of fishing and land transport. It seems incredible that journalists have access to government documents which we parliamentarians have asked, but been unable, to see, because the government refuses to hand them over. These are the so-called interim agreements which replace the February 1978 fishing agreement which the government undertook to have approved by the Spanish parliament, despite our opposition, and which then proved pointless because the Moroccan assembly refused to ratify it.

I do not see sufficient reason for us to stop fishing, partly because Morocco was not instructed to administer the entire Sahara. There is the Tiris el Garbia area, which Mauritania used to administer and then abandoned. And this must be borne firmly in mind in the negotiations. Let us not forget that Russian and Japanese ships also fish in these waters without any problem. Why? It must be understood that in international negotiations of this kind many aspects and dimensions must be skillfully embraced without losing sight of, or hiding, Spain's responsibility with regard to the Sahara. Unless this happens the most that can be achieved is to shelve a problem which exists and must emerge again.

As for Ceuta and Melilla, we believe that the fact that Ceuta and Melilla belong to Spain must be defended responsibly and realistically. It must not be forgotten that hitherto this topic has never been seriously approached in international forums such as the United Nations and that there are a multitude of international instances such as this.

Question: Other areas of special interest to Spain and also to the Arab world are the Iranian and Mideast conflicts, to which you have devoted special attention in recent months, as Suarez has. Furthermore, the PSOE has used--as it seems to be doing increasingly--the channel of the Socialist International to approach these areas. How do you view these topics and how is your foreign action in connection with them to be viewed?

Answer: I repeat that we are in favor of foreign policy consisting of state action having the broadest possible basis of support. But we also have an obligation and responsibility to maintain our presence abroad on topics of general interest and topics of interest to the party, particularly now that the government has caused a serious split in this policy over the NATO issue. We also believe that the political parties must--as is the case with many European parties of the Socialist International that govern in their respective countries--adopt more progressive stances and maintain a political projection that the states cannot achieve because of understandable domestic or foreign pressures. This is how the state's action is balanced.

It is true that our presence in the Socialist International has been stepped up recently. This is due to the fact that our real influence within the organization has grown over the past 2 years and that the International has undergone a reawakening in recent years, especially since Willy Brandt became chairman in 1976. It has emerged from its Euro-centrism and projected itself into other areas of the world, such as the Arab countries and Latin America, where we Spaniards have a great deal to say.

As for the Middle East, I must say first, that we defend and support the Palestinian people's cause, their self-determination and their right to their own state. Of course there is also the matter of Israel's recognition, which was accepted under historical conditions different from the present ones by the majority of Western and Eastern countries. Now apart from the original problem there is the problem of the territories occupied during the past two wars. This makes it difficult for the Spanish democracy to find an immediate solution for this issue and therefore the aspects of the present situation and the greatest possible unity in our foreign activity play an important role here. In other words on this issue we coincide with the government's policy on strengthening the Palestinian people's positions. Nevertheless, we wish to emphasize that despite this special and temporary situation, our party is in favor of Spain maintaining diplomatic relations with all states as far as possible.

With regard to Iran, the important thing at present is to understand the Iranian revolutionary process and the Western, particularly the European, countries must make a great effort in this connection. We are in favor of the release of the U.S. hostages but first there must be an examination of what the shah did in that country during his dictatorship with U.S. backing. We have gone into this topic partly because through very varied channels we have received important information through our Panamanian friends and within the framework of the Socialist International, within which Kreisky, Palme and myself agree on the idea of taking the initiative of contacting the Iranian Government.

In both issues Spain can play a role, as Carter himself acknowledged in his speech and as he also told me in private. It would not be exactly a mediating role, but action with specific demarches.

Question: Latin America is another of the key points in our foreign policy. How do you view this aspect? What can you say about Nicaragua and South America--opposite poles of revolution and dictatorship?

Answer: Spain's foreign policy in this part of the world remains to be developed, deserves greater attention and must be approached from bilateral and global angles. On the bilateral plane, for instance, Spain should extend its relations with Mexico and Venezuela, to name two qualitatively and qualitatively important cases. [paragraph continues]

As for Central America, and more specifically Nicaragua, the pressing need is for unconditional solidarity. This was another subject of my conversation with Carter, and we have also told the Spanish Government that in my opinion it has not done all it could to help that country. I believe that the Nicaraguan revolution has been an exemplary process, partly because there has been no revanchist bloodshed, though there are obvious risks to the entire revolutionary process, which people are trying to isolate.

The situation in South America is very different. There dictatorships rule with a certain regional solidarity, despite the fact that they are very different from each other. In Chile there is a democratic tradition crushed by the dictatorship, while in Argentina there is not the same tradition, but a process of systematic physical and political elimination, despite the trade union mass movements with traditions in that country. Spain must try to facilitate a democratic way out of those systems, without going as far as to force a break in diplomatic relations. What it must do prevent the sale of weapons which could be used by the dictators for repression.

"Spain As a Permanent Observer Among Nonaligned"

Question: The Near East and Latin America are two areas where the nonaligned countries have great influence. What is the PSOE's position on Spain's possible participation in this forum?

Answer: I believe that Spain must participate in the nonaligned organization as a permanent observer. It could not to do as a full member because of a legal impediment in the organization's regulations, though it does embrace countries much more committed than Spain to alignment with the superpowers. I believe that our presence here benefits us and that we are the only European country that could gain this advantage without losing its European and Western profile. Be that as it may, Spain's association with the nonaligned countries' proceedings as a permament observer, which might later enable us to propose a change in the regulations, conflicts with NATO membership.

Question: Finally, how do you view political and administrative unity in foreign policy. Are you in favor of political ambassadors?

Answer: In the past 3 years Spain has lost part of the advantage it gained through its democratic change in its action abroad. We have a good reputation and a good image in the world, which was very important, and this is being squandered by the government. To cap it all, remarks such as those made a fortnight ago by Minister Oreja can only have served to cause a regression on the short and timid progress that has been made, by shattering the central points of agreement between government and opposition on unity of foreign action.

But there is also a fundamental structural problem. Here, too, we have regressed instead of progressed. The Foreign Ministry's areas of responsibility have been fragmented and this ministry now seems to be less able than it was 3 years ago. Even topics such as Equatorial Guinea--which has been transferred to another department--have been split up. Nor has any initiative been taken to modernize the foreign service by introducing major measures, as France has done and other countries are doing. Nor has there been any modernization or adaptation to democratic Spain's needs for a modern diplomacy, nor are there any prospects of this happening.

There remain some incredible problems, such as the ones affecting contract personnel, who still receive no welfare benefits even after many years' service, and so forth. In other words, the foreign service must be revised on the basis of greater efficiency, more staff and greater responsibility.

As for the political ambassador, in the broad sense, I believe they should exist because they are necessary and even essential in many countries, because they would give a different image of us, of great efficiency and understanding, which Spain very much needs. In Spain there are some very well trained people capable of representing Spain very well and of defending our interests, which in many cases require the presence of experts, even if they are not diplomats.

DENMARK

FOREIGN MINISTER OLESEN EXPLAINS DEFENSE POLICY

LD101547 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 6 Jul 80 pt 1 p 8

[Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen article: "We Must Not Dissemble To Avoid Criticism"]

[Text] According to BERLINGSKE TIDENDE, "Denmarkization" is a new concept that the Germans are supposed to have coined to apply to countries that want the protection of the United States without wishing to share the risks themselves or pay the bill. The definition is supposed to derive from THE SUNDAY TIMES of 29 June. In FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE of 13 June, however, the provenance of the term is ascribed to former Belgian Foreign Minister Henri Simonet. And this at a time when Belgium is planning considerable savings in defense.

The Danish Government's draft of a new defense bill intends to reintroduce the savings of 100 million Danish kroner, made in 1979, and then to continue with an unchanged budget, but with full regulation for wage and price rises, something that is not the case with all NATO members. If we compare ourselves with other countries in respect of defense spending as a percentage of the national product and as the amount spent per inhabitant, we are neither the first nor the last. We lie in 11th and 7th places respectively of the 14 member nations, for Iceland, as is well known, has no defense force. For this reason, I think that "Denmarkization" has to do with something else. It is true that Denmark has often been active in the debate within NATO. We are one of the countries that finds the debate very necessary and on various occasions we have asked questions and expressed our views when others have chosen to remain silent.

This can be a cause of irritation for some, even some people in Denmark, as was recently made plain in an editorial in BERLINGSKE TIDENTE. I also see that Niels Joergen Haagerup writes in a commentary that what is important is not what we think ourselves but what the view is that others have of us. I do not agree. To be conformist and avoid criticism can often seem extremely tempting, but it neither helps NATO as such nor those nations that we are not always in agreement with.

I am glad that Niels Joergen Haagerup describes "Denmarkization" as a gross oversimplification. I agree with him that we must not be insulted because of this, but neither must we bow our heads and try to satisfy others by dissembling. Danish defense policy will continue to be firmly anchored in NATO; there must be no doubt about this. We will make our contribution and shoulder our share of the responsibility in the military alliance.

Denmark expressed its reservations when the resolution on a 3 percent increase in the defense budget was adopted. We are bound to see in the future that there are countries which will not be able to live up to this goal, or, as we are already seeing, will have to make direct cuts. The latter will certainly not be done by Denmark, and I think that this, in the longer term, will give rise to greater respect for us, because there is sufficient agreement between what we say and what we do.

If the term "Denmarkization" is to be used correctly as a description of the policy of the Danish Government, as firmly based on our membership of NATO, then it must be used to mean the view that the West must not think only along the lines of power politics and strategy and that we will only achieve a more peaceful world through coming to understand interrelationships and the importance of nuances in the analyses, that the Western world uses as a basis for its policies.

NORWAY

PAPER URGES HALT TO NATO MISSILE DEPLOYMENT

LD110927 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 7 Jul 80 p 4

[Editorial: "How Many Missiles?"]

[Text] The foreign minister has a secret hope that the worst of the cold is beginning to recede as he goes off on his summer vacation. His optimism is based particularly on the West German federal chancellor's visit to Moscow.

Even though a man like Franz Josef Strauss thinks that Helmut Schmidt is not big enough for either the hat or the boots he had put on, neither he nor other opponents of the Social Democratic federal chancellor can deny that the talks between Brezhnev and Schmidt have at least made the small breach in the wall which is necessary for the initiation of negotiations on nuclear arms limitation in Europe. The ball is now in the Americans' court, for it is they who will lead negotiations for the West.

Moscow's concession is that it is prepared to enter into negotiations on a reciprocal reduction even though SALT II has not been ratified, but even though negotiations can begin now, they will have to be completed as part of SALT II. But as Knut Frydenlund emphasized at his summer press conference, if the European situation is dealt with as a top priority, the time factor itself is of lesser importance. The NATO decision of last December, which provides both for negotiations and the deployment of 572 medium-range missiles, means that there will be no deployment before 1983. This is time enough, according to the foreign minister.

What summer reflections will Knut Frydenlund be making? He will have both the contingency stockpiling of American military equipment to think about and his Moscow visit, probably in September, must be planned. [sentenced as published] A natural subject for contemplation will be the Norwegian approach to the missile question.

The Norwegian Government decision to support the controversial NATO plans gave rise to deep divisions on defense and security policies. The opposition to nuclear plans, especially in the Labor Party, came as a surprise both to the foreign minister and the government. It turned out that the opposition could not be dismissed as traditional anti-NATO hostility. Supporters of Norwegian membership in the Alliance stood up in one local party branch after another to say that the madness had to stop. We agree to NATO, but not the lunatic race for the greatest number of nuclear arms.

The government and the party had to swiftly look around for a way of solving the problem. On behalf of the government, Prime Minister Odvar Nordli went off to see President Jimmy Carter and the Labor Party sent its chairman, Reiulf Steen, to Moscow. There was much drama in the air.

There is good reason to remember the party chairman's message after his return from the Kremlin. He told a skeptical Norwegian public more or less the same as Helmut Schmidt now has told the West German Bundestag. Steen was also able to report a positive desire to negotiate on the part of the Soviet leaders. They were interested in measures that could lead to detente, with a particular emphasis on the reduction of nuclear missiles in Europe. The Russians had little desire to continue competing in the arms race.

The Soviet intervention in Afghanistan pulled the carpet out from under the feet of those who were working on definite plans for detente. For the Soviet Union, Afghanistan has become a costly affair. Throughout the last 6 months, however, many people have maintained that the channels for contact must not be closed. The Norwegian foreign minister among others took upon himself the role of spokesman for such a view. And it looks as if the bases for contacts have now been rebuilt.

So what can the Norwegian contribution be when negotiations on nuclear arms limitation, in Europe above all, begin?

First, the Norwegian Government ought to be able to urge the American President to raise again the question of U.S. ratification of SALT II as a visible proof of U.S. willingness to talk in the new situation--despite the presidential election.

The second contribution should be a Norwegian demand that no new missiles be deployed. Even a reduced number of new medium-range missiles amounts to arms escalation. No new missiles is not disarmament either, but does at least represent a halt. The Norwegian debate last year gives good support for a Norwegian zero-growth approach.

We see that NATO's secretary general has had to kick the shins of the countries which did not agree with NATO's December resolution. They are now sitting back in confusion, says Luns. At the same time he made an unambiguous appeal to Belgium and the Netherlands to allow the deployment of missiles there.

Perhaps the secretary general could also be informed that Norway, could easily adopt a no-missile stance even if we do not allow them to be deployed on our territory either. [sentence as published]

JOSHUA NKOMO ARRIVES ON 'MYSTERY' VISIT

LD101634 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1411 GMT 10 Jul 80

[By Tom McMullan, PA diplomatic correspondent]

[Excerpt] Mr Joshua Nkomo, Zimbabwe's home affairs minister, was the center of a mystery in London today. Mr Nkomo, who arrived today, was said to be on "a private visit." He is expected to stay for about two days.

Foreign Office officials contacted Mr Nkomo at his hotel shortly after his arrival. But afterwards a British spokesman said: "No meetings with ministers are planned."

Mr Nkomo, to reporters, tended to dismiss reports of dissension between himself and the ruling majority of the Prime Minister Mr Robert Mugabe in the Zimbabwe Government.

IAN GILMOUR INTERVIEWED ON RELATIONS WITH ARAB COUNTRIES

LD101001 London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 4 Jul 80 pp 30-32

[Interview given to Muhammad Sa'id al-Junaydi by British Deputy Foreign Secretary Ian Gilmour--date and place not given]

[Excerpts] AL-HAWADITH: In your book "Inside the Right," you say that the right bases its concepts on human nature and facts. Let us see how the Conservative Party has applied these ideas to a particular part of the world; I mean the Middle East. Your relations with the Arab states, particularly the Saudi Kingdom, Libya and Iraq are on the whole bad. Is that a policy based on facts and human nature?

Ian Gilmour: Well, I do not think that this is completely true. I agree with you that we have problems with the Saudi Arabian Kingdom. This has nothing to do with the theories of the Conservative Party because what happened was the result of Saudi reaction to the television film "Death of a Princess." As for Libya, I am not sure how bad our relations with it have become. People have been killed in London streets. No government is prepared to tolerate this. I summoned Musa Kusa less than a week ago, after he had announced that there were two persons to be liquidated and that he approves of the murder operation--a matter which we could not tolerate at all. I told him that he must leave Britain. But this has no connection with our relations in general with the Libyan Jamahiriyah. We would like these relations to remain good and hope they will. As for Iraq, there is a certain level of commercial relations naturally; however, the imprisonment of two British businessmen has rendered our relations more "difficult" than before.

AL-HAWADITH: But the Arabs view their external relations in a different way. It is believed that Arab-British relations began to deteriorate when you started supporting American policy in the Middle East?

Ian Gilmour: No. I do not think this is true. I rather believe that our relations with the Arabs are basically good. They think our policy is conducive to reaching an acceptable agreement.

AL-HAWADITH: But your support for the American policy in the Middle East is no secret?

Ian Gilmour: Yes. This is true. I repeat however that it has nothing to do with the difficulties we are facing in our relations with the Arab world or with supporting the American view. [paragraph continues]

Anyway, when Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington returned from his trip to the Arab world after the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, he said that we must exert efforts to achieve a settlement to the "Palestinian problem," because a large number of the area's states equate the Israeli occupation of Palestine with the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan. This is our view in all clarity and it continues to be so. This has been corroborated by the statement which was issued by the summit conference in Venice and which was violently attacked by Israel.

AL-HAWADITH: Did the "Zionist lobby" and Israel try to exert pressure on the government?

Ian Gilmour: I do not know. There is no doubt that they have demonstrated their stand by rejecting the statement. But, as I have told you, this is the situation. They rejected the statement and Menahem Begin used violent language in criticizing it.

AL-HAWADITH: What is your real position regarding the amendment of Resolution 242?

Ian Gilmour: We support the resolution. It was first drafted by the British Labor government which pushed it until it was finally approved.

AL-HAWADITH: Will you continue to support the rest of the Common Market states in having the resolution amended to coincide with the Arab view?

Ian Gilmour: The Market states are not insisting on "amendment" for the time being, at least. But, as I have said, the importance of the resolution should not be exaggerated.

AL-HAWADITH: There are undoubtedly differences among the Market states with regard to the peace talks. But let us suppose that France recognizes the "PLO," will Britain follow suit?

Ian Gilmour: In any case, we recognize states, not governments. And even if we recognized governments the "PLO" is not a government. For this reason we will not be able to recognize it. And I do not believe that France will do so.

AL-HAWADITH: Let me ask you your opinion on the status of the city of Jerusalem. In 1975 you and your colleague MP Dennis Walters published an article in the London TIMES in which you emphasized the need for Arab Jerusalem and the West Bank to be returned to the Arabs. Are you still of the same opinion?

Ian Gilmour: Yes. I hate to see the city divided just as I hope that Jerusalem will be Arab, under Arab control at least. However, I agree with the view that the holy city should not be divided again because Jerusalem must be a city of peace and open to all states. This, I believe, was the fundamental thing in the UN resolution.

AL-HAWADITH: Do you support King Husayn's view on this point--that Israel must give up Arab Jerusalem which it occupied in the June 1967 war?

Ian Gilmour: I believe that Jerusalem is an enormous problem, and it was so under the former government. It will be the most serious obstacle to peace.

AL-HAWADITH: Let us go back to the question of your relations with Iraq. Iraqi official circles say that when Lord Carrington visited Baghdad, he promised the Iraqi officials that the British Government would retreat from its position which, at the time, was in support of the Camp David agreements and would support the establishment of "a Palestinian state." You have, however, retreated from this promise?

Ian Gilmour: I believe that what Lord Carrington said at the time is exaggerated. However, the recent European statement is in favor of freedom of self-determination for the Palestinians.

AL-HAWADITH: Why did Iraqi Foreign Minister Sa'dun Hammadi postpone his visit to Britain?

Ian Gilmour: I believe he might come to London in the fall. I do not know exactly.

AL-HAWADITH: Is the postponement of the visit not connected with the promises Lord Carrington made when in Baghdad?

Ian Gilmour: No.

AL-HAWADITH: It appears that the same thing applies to your relations with the Saudi Arabian Kingdom, when Lord Carrington promised that his government would do everything in its power to halt the campaigns against Saudi Arabia in the information media. The Saudi officials say that these campaigns have not stopped. Proof of this is that the film "Death of a Princess" is now being videotaped in Britain and exported to the Middle East.

Ian Gilmour: Well, a large number of Arabs are making such (videotape) films. We cannot stop them. This is a free country, as you know. I have criticized the film vehemently. I am afraid there are many copies of the film in the Middle East now, many of which have been made in Beirut and Cairo. The film is very bad but the noise made about it has given it value. I believe that the Saudis were right to complain.

AL-HAWADITH: Do you believe that such cases will not recur in the future?

Ian Gilmour: Our information media are free. We cannot control our press or television but I do not believe that such a thing will happen again.

AL-HAWADITH: It appears that there are similar cases which the press and television can take up and develop into campaigns. For example, the case of the English girl found dead in Jidda. It was said at the time that she had fallen from a window. Her father, who is an ex-policeman, went to Jidda and investigated the matter personally. He then claimed that the British Foreign Office confiscated the file he had prepared on the death of his daughter who was said to have been at a private party at the house of a British doctor who is now being held pending investigations. Now, we see that the information media have begun to escalate the case to the level of campaigns and slander.

Ian Gilmour: The Foreign Office has not confiscated such a file. This is not true. I cannot discuss this subject now.

MP CALLS FOR RADIO BROADCASTS TO SOVIET TROOPS IN AFGHANISTAN

LD102252 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1506 GMT 10 Jul 80

[By Andy Webb, PA staff reporter in Strasbourg]

[Text] The BBC and the British Government should provide radio facilities for broadcasts calling on Russian soldiers in Afghanistan to desert, Lord Bethell, a Conservative Euro MP said today.

He said he was putting pressure on the government to broadcast in both Persian and Russian to Afghanistan from the relay station in Oman. This was now being considered by the authorities and he had a question down in the House of Lords on the issue, he added.

"I would like to see the BBC make these broadcasts, to give the voice of Britain, and if possible make radio facilities available to the Afghan rebels to appeal to Russian soldiers there to encourage them not to fight a war which they are finding more and more unpopular and unjust."

Russians who did desert should then be allowed to broadcast their views back to the Soviet Union, he said.

Lord Bethell today chaired a press conference at the Parliament for Mr Said Ahmad Gailani, chairman of the Afghanistan Islamic National Council.

A radio station for use by the rebels was one of the ways the West could help the Afghan resistance movement, Mr Gailani said. Mr Gailani, who has had talks with government leaders in London, Paris and Bonn, also appealed for arms from the West. He said the rebels needed anti-tank guns and guns to use against helicopters.

"The Afghan people at present are fighting against the greatest military power in the world almost barehanded and on empty stomachs," he said.

"But despite this we have had great victories."

DUBLIN AMBASSADOR TO U.S. TO MAINTAIN POST

LD101035 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 10 Jul 80

[Kenneth Clarke report: "Eire's U.S. Envoy To Keep Job"]

[Excerpt] Mr Charles Haughey, the Irish prime minister, yesterday yielded to pressure and reversed his earlier decision to move Dublin's ambassador in Washington, Mr Sean Donlon, who has taken a firm stand against Irish-American groups providing funds for the Provisional IRA.

The proposal to transfer Mr Donlon to the United Nations was abandoned in an effort to halt criticism from opposition politicians in Dublin and avert the threat of a split between the Government of Eire and leading Irish-American politicians, including Senator Edward Kennedy.

A statement issued in Dublin after a Cabinet meeting yesterday said: "Press speculation over recent days that the Irish ambassador to the United States is to be moved because of a change in government policy over Northern Ireland is entirely without foundation. The government has complete confidence in Mr Donlon."

The statement was issued on the instructions of Mr Haughey who is anxious to maintain international pressure on Britain--especially from the United States--to involve Dublin in any solution to the Ulster crisis.

PORTUGUESE PREMIER COMMENTS ON ACCOMPLISHMENTS AT END OF VISIT

Cultural Agreement Signing

At 1000 the Greek and Portuguese Foreign Ministers, Mitsotakis and Do Amaral, signed a Greek-Portuguese cultural agreement at the Foreign Ministry during a special ceremony. Attending the ceremony were Greek Minister for Culture and Science Andhrianopoulos; Greek ambassador to Lisbon Mouzas and Portuguese Ambassador to Athens Cunha.

After the signing of the agreement Do Amaral expressed his satisfaction over the cultural agreement, which he described as being of particular importance to Portugal. He also referred to the common cultural roots of the two peoples.

Mitsotakis described the agreement as the foundation stone of the effort to tighten ties between the peoples of Greece and Portugal. He added the agreement reaffirms the determination of the two governments to proceed to a further development of Greek-Portuguese relations.

The ministers of the two countries responsible for European Community affairs, Kondoyioryis and Mendes, today continued their talks on the accession of Portugal to the Community.

Press Conference

AT101855 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1820 GMT 10 Jul 80

[Text] Ending his official visit to Greece and prior to his departure for the island of Ydra where he will spend the night, Portuguese Prime Minister Sa Carneiro held a press conference at 1700 at the Grande Bretagne hotel during which he also replied to many questions.

In his introductory statement the Portugese prime minister stated: [Begin recording; in French with superimposed Greek translation]

Ladies and gentlemen, I thank you very much both on my behalf as well as on the behalf of the entire Portuguese delegation for your presence here. I want to tell you how happy we are as a result of this visit. I do not speak to you only as the prime minister of Portugal but also as a representative of Portugal, more generally, who addresses his candidacy to the 10th member of the Common Market.

I must state that Greece has been the forerunner for EEC expansion and the discussions we have had will facilitate the entry of Portugal and they have allowed us to establish that we enjoy the full support of Greece for the candidacy submitted by Portugal to become a member of the Common Market, allowing us at the same time to take advantage of the experience of Greece both in the negotiations as well as in the general operations of the Common Market.

We were able to exchange views both with Karamanlis as well as with Rallis and the other members of the Greek Government on the international situation. We referred to the economic crisis and to the more general international political situation and we discussed the future of the Common Market and the Western world.

We also discussed the question of NATO and on how the Western world needs the return of Greek Armed Forces to NATO. These, in a few words, were the issues which we discussed and over which we are extremely satisfied. We believe that we were allowed to tighten relations between Portugal and Greece.

The deputy prime minister of the Portuguese Government and the Greek foreign minister also signed an agreement on cultural cooperation. We plan to improve both our cultural and our economic relations and to also strengthen our political cooperation because we have agreed that two countries such as ours, which are small countries, have much more to offer both to the world as well as the Common Market because perhaps the views which they present do not represent as large scale interests as the great powers and they can contribute to the future of the Western World and to allow us to solve the existing crisis which, in our opinion is a development crisis of the Common Market.

It is a challenge which allows us to build, apart from a political Europe as well as an economic Europe, and to find a new way toward a development which will depend less upon oil. At the Venice conference we had agreed that there ought to be less relationship between economic development and consumption of oil.

This was the general framework within which we held our discussions. When one speaks of politics one must be short, and therefore, I would like to tell you once again that I am very pleased that we were able to improve and tighten our relations between the Greek and Portuguese Governments. I believe these relations are extremely friendly. I am now at your disposal for questions.

The Portuguese prime minister then replied to questions and said, among other things, that the presence of Greek Armed Forces within NATO is very important to the alliance and that Portugal will offer every possible support for Greek views through diplomatic channels. He said he has established that the basic obstacle to Greece's return to NATO is the situation created in Cyprus after the Turkish intervention and that the Portuguese Government will contribute every possible effort to eradicating this obstacle. He said that during his recent visit to Paris, he established that France agrees with the accession of Portugal to the EEC as well as with the continuation of negotiations in this direction and that he hopes that Portugal will be ready for accession to the Community in 1983.

He said that there must be a speedy and just solution to the problem of Cyprus and that he believes that direct talks between the Greek and Turkish Governments will play a decisive role in this direction.

He said that his visits to the capitals of EEC countries have been extremely useful since his government gives first priority to Portuguese accession to the Communtiy. In conclusion he said he believes that the two greatest dangers in the world at this moment are the expansionist trend of the Soviet Union and the economic recess on which now exists.

PRIME MINISTER RALLIS VISITS QUAKE AREA

AT100920 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 0900 GMT 10 Jul 80

PAPANDREOU REPORTEDLY DISILLUSIONED WITH CURRENT SOCIALISM

AT051255 Athens NEA PORIA in Greek 5 Jul 80 p 1

[Text] None of the "socialist models" which exist in today's world satisfy A. Papandreou. None of them fit his measurements. Now he even rejects the "socialist models" of the Third World.

This also applies to "existential socialism." He said so clearly while addressing the international seminar on "Transition to Socialism" on 30 June at the Pantios Technical Academy.

"We who believe in socialism must admit that we are not satisfied with existential socialism, with the examples which exist to date. Basically there are two areas which one could connect to socialism. One is the area covered by the Soviet Union and the Eastern bloc. The other...has to do with the numerous countries of the Third World...."

Since "existential socialism" does not fit him then which socialism does? Obviously only non-existent socialism fits him.

Basis for Statement

AT051300 Athens NEA PORIA in Greek 5 Jul 80 p 3

[From the "Past Week" column: "The People Fear PASOK"]

[Text] This week's developments also include the speech by Papandreou at the seminar organized by the Center for Mediterranean Studies on the subject: "Transition to Socialism." PASOK's chairman was very revealing in his speech on the prospects of applying socialism in Greece since he admitted that: Socialism is a question of decades and consequently it cannot happen overnight or in one day. He further admitted that the changes propagated by his party cannot be carried out without the peoples' consent.

In practice this means that PASOK "is cutting down the rate" with which at one time it said it would implement institutional changes. Perhaps this new Papandreou position is the result of his party's evaluation that the Greek people are frightened by the idea that one day they could be governed by PASOK.

CUMHURIYET DISCUSSES DEMIREL STATEMENT ON U-2 FLIGHTS

NC110849 Istanbul CUMHURIYET in Turkish 10 Jul 80 p 3

["The World Today" column by Ali Sirmen: "The U-2's and Sovereignty"]

[Excerpts] The question of the U-2's, which seemed to have been forgotten during the past year, has again come into the limelight following the statement which Suleyman Demirel made to the U.S. senators.

Demirel told the U.S. senators that he would not seek the Soviet Union's permission on this matter. It would, however, be unreasonable to interpret this as meaning that the U-2 flights would immediately be permitted without consulting the Soviet Union. But neither did the prime minister say he would adopt a negative attitude toward this issue. What is more, during the past year there have been developments indicating a shift from detente to tension in international politics. Under the circumstances, Demirel was expected to state unequivocally that these flights would be objectionable from Turkey's standpoint. The prime minister has failed to do this. Instead, he again chose to resort to his common demogogic method by arguing that consulting the Soviet Union on the subject of the U-2 flights would damage Turkey's sovereign rights.

There is a certain amount of truth to Demirel's statement. But unfortunately, when these words are uttered by Demirel they lose their value. Isn't Demirel the one who has entrusted the fascists with our internal policy and our security? Isn't Demirel the one who has entrusted IMF with a host of economic issues? Isn't Demirel the one who complied with the U.S. call not to participate in the Moscow Olympic games?

Demirel is on record as having said: "Do you want the Americans to go so that the Russians may come?" No one is in doubt as to what Demirel's notion of sovereignty is. How is it possible for anyone not to see the worrisome indications behind Demirel's words: "We can make decisions without consulting the Soviet Union."

Don't all these facts show that Demirel has to be very cautious when he talks?

It is easy to criticize Ecevit. The leader of the RPP has occasionally been criticized by this paper and in this column for certain stands he has adopted both as a leader of his party and as prime minister of Turkey. But it is inconceivable and unreasonable that Demirel, who was once nicknamed Morrison Suleyman, should attempt to lecture Ecevit on independence and sovereignty, knowing as we all do that it was Ecevit who permitted the cultivation of the opium poppy despite opposition from the United States and who also exercised our treaty rights over Cyprus.

FOREIGN MINISTRY OFFICIAL LEAVES FOR ISLAMIC MEETING IN AMMAN

[Text] The foreign ministers of Islamic countries will meet for an extraordinary session in Amman tomorrow to discuss the recent Israeli measures in Jerusalem and the West Bank. A delegation headed by Foreign Ministry Secretary General Ambassador Ozdemir Yigit will represent Turkey at the meeting, which will last 2 days. The delegation headed by Yigit left for Amman today.

It was reported that Turkish Federated State of Cyprus President Rauf Denktas will also attend the meeting.

ACTING PRESIDENT CONTINUES CONTACTS WITH PARTY LEADERS

TA101205 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 10 Jul 80

In a statement after the meeting at the Cankaya presidential mansion, which lasted about 1 hour, Erbakan said that he briefed Caglayangil on his party's views regarding presidential elections. Recalling that the country was already experiencing a grave crisis in the sphere of public law and order as well as in the economic sphere, Erbakan said that his party was opposed to adding to these the issue of the presidential election as well. Reiterating that the NSP wanted the early election of a new president, the formation of a new government and the early enactment of social bills, Erbakan said that if these problems were not settled until 15 August then the solution would be to hold early elections. Erbakan called on the parliament to solve all of these problems. Pointing out that the NSP wanted and supported an early election more than any other party, Erbakan said that the issue of security during the elections was the main issue which caused concern.

The acting president received NAP leader Turkes at 1100. The meeting lasted 35 minutes. Turkes refused to comment on his talks after the meeting. The Senate National Unity Group leader Ozdilek visited Caglayangil at 1200. In a statement following the 40-minute meeting, Ozdilek said that a meeting of all those who visited the acting president was scheduled for tomorrow. He added that reaching a solution on the issue of the presidential election would be discussed at the meeting. Caglayangil will continue his contacts on the subject in the afternoon.

PARTIES EXCHANGE CHARGES OVER CORUM INCIDENTS

Demirel Accusation Against RPP

TA101654 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 10 Jul 80

[Excerpt] In a statement to journalists at the end of a council of ministers meeting today, Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel referred to the Corum incidents and said: The citizens in Corum are being instigated to fight each other. This instigation is being supported and protected by the RPP. This instigation was supported and protected in other parts of Turkey as well. If this instigation is not supported by the RPP, the state can extinguish it in a very short time. Demirel said that the current RPP administration is actually making the task of the state forces more difficult and provoking more incidents.

RPP Charges Against Government

[Text] The statement issued by the RPP joint parliamentary group on the Corum incidents said: Our group will start the necessary procedures both from the political and punitive viewpoints against the Demirel government, which is responsible for these incidents. The statement noted that the Corum incidents proved the extent to which the Demirel government transformed the state into a divisive and ineffective state. Pointing out that these incidents constitute a very worrysome stage in the process Turkey is currently going through, the statement said that another aim of the perpetrators of the incidents was to intimidate the citizens affiliated with the RPP.

The statement continued: It is evident that the inciderts were started by the rightist militants, on whom Demirel and the Justice Party government base their strength and support. The fact that the prime minister is presenting the matter as a secterian clash despite this reality is merely an attempt to conceal the political calculations and the aim of exploitation. By distorting the realities, the prime minister has personally assumed the role of provoking secterian clashes.

Expressing the view that during the incidents certain policemen discriminated between citizens in accordance with their political affiliations, the statement called irresponsible the fact that martial law was not imposed in Corum following the incidents.

The statement noted that the RPP joint group trusts the people's preference for peace and their awareness of national unity against provocations and schemes directed against the integrity of the country, the national unity, the Ataturk nationalism and secularism. In the statement, the RPP group expressed the belief that the persons responsible for the incidents will, sooner or later, account for their deeds before the judiciary.

The RPP joint parliamentary group continued to discuss the recent political developments during its meeting today.

Unity Party Condemnation

TA101320 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 10 Jul 80

[Text] Turkish Unity Party deputy leader Ali Haydar Veziroglu has said that last Friday's Corum incidents were the result of premeditated imperialist plots to which the government had remained a passive observer. Speaking at a news conference in the parliament, Veziroglu quoted the report prepared by a party delegation in Corum in connection with the incidents there. Pointing out that the incidents were organized by fascist elements, Veziroglu said that the security forces did not act impartially during the incidents. He added that his party's members were also attacked during the incidents and that great tasks befell the RPP in particular in the face of the destructive and divisive movements.

NAP, RPP MEMBERS ATTACKED BY TERRORISTS

TA022115 [Editorial report] Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish at 2000 GMT on 30 June reported that Hasan Aydin, a member of the Nationalist Action Party [NAP] District Administrative Council in Bursa's Inegol District, was killed in an armed attack on the evening of 30 June. According to reports two armed persons fired at the pharmacy owned by RPP provincial leader from Icel Sabahattin Arikan. Arikan threw himself on the floor and was therefore not wounded. Muzaffer Gokulu, a relative of Arikan working at the pharmacy, and Mustafa Sargin, a worker who happened to be in the shop at the time, were killed. The armed assailants fled after the incident.

VIENNA PAPER REPORTS ON SOVIET MBFR PROPOSAL

[Unattributed report: "Reduction by 40,000 Men? New Proposal by the East at Forces Reduction Talks"]

[Text] Yesterday at the 243d plenary session of the Vienna negotiations on a reduction of forces in Central Europe Soviet delegate Nikolay Tarasov, as expected, presented new proposals on behalf of the Eastern side. They are aimed at achieving, in the first phase, a reduction of the Soviet forces by 20,000 men and of the U.S. forces by 13,000 men, while not including in the Vienna negotiations the planned withdrawal from the GDR of 20,000 Soviet soldiers and 1,000 tanks.

An Eastern spokesman, moreover, declared that it has been proposed to permit individual states to increase their troop strengths within the framework of a common troops strength ceiling of the two pact systems, "but some of them are not to be permitted to do so," he said, adding that a concession has thus been made to Western thinking.

In the past, the NATO states have insisted that it must be left to the alliance to determine for itself the troop strength of the individual countries within the framework of a collective ceiling. A NATO spokesman stated the day before yesterday that the new Eastern proposal would be "examined very carefully in all its aspects." He added, however, that the new initiative "applies only to specific questions, and is not comprehensive."

Tarasov further declared that with its new proposal the East, in the wake of the latest talks between Soviet state and party chief Brezhnev and FRG Chancellor Schmidt, is now virtually ready to reduce its troop strength in Central Europe by 40,000 men (20,000 in a first reduction phase, and 20,000 to be withdrawn from the GDR.) The proposals now submitted are a logical continuation of the proposals submitted as early as 1978 and 1979, or supplement these earlier proposals, he said.

Tarasov Statement

[Special DIE PRESSE report: "MBFR: New Eastern Initiative; Further Troop Withdrawals From Europe"]

[Excerpts] Vienna (EKOE)--In reply to the question whether the soldiers being withdrawn from the GDR and those earmarked for the reduction in Central Europe would be transferred Hungary, Soviet delegate Nirolay Tarasov declared that reports to that effect were not true. The soldiers would actually be transferred to the European part of the USSR.

On the Western side it was stressed that the solution of the unresolved figures problem regarding the troop strength of the two pact systems is the prerequisite for a proper assessment of troop strength and for reaching an agreement.

SCHMIDT, GISCARD DISCUSS AFGHANISTAN, MIDEAST POLICY

[Excerpt] During their consultations in which a number of ministers, including Foreign Ministers Genscher and Francois-Poncet, took part, Chancellor Schmidt and President Giscard d'Estaing emphasized once again that the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan was completely unacceptable and that Moscow must withdraw its troops.

Another important subject was the situation in the Middle East. Here the two sides agreed that at the forthcoming special meeting of the United Nations on the Middle East, the European Community should adopt a common position and contribute a "moderating element." The recent Middle East declaration of the EEC summit should serve as a basis for this. The new acting president of the European Community Council, Luxembourg's Foreign Minister Gaston Thorn, should likewise act in this spirit during his proposed Middle East tour.

In the bilateral sphere, the principal subjects were the joint development of a TV satellite and a battle tank, as well as an improved system for the exchange of information concerning nuclear power stations close to the border between the two countries. Giscard called for still better coordination of the economic policies of the two countries. He agreed with Schmidt that German and French knowledge of each other must be further deepened.

Concluding Statements

[Text] Bonn--Federal Chancellor Schmidt and French President Giscard d'Estaing today stressed the importance of a strong West Europe for military parity in the world. In their statements at the conclusion of Giscard's 5-day state visit to the Federal Republic, both politicians emphasized their common security interests even though their countries play different roles in the Western alliance.

Schmidt affirmed that, unlike France, the Federal Republic was not a nuclear power and did not wish to be one, but that it would fulfill its specific tasks within the alliance. The chancellor welcomed Paris' plans to modernize the French nuclear deterrent, saying it was just as significant as NATO's decisions to counterarm in the field of medium-range weapons.

Giscard made it clear that, as an independent nuclear power, France was not affected by NATO's twin decision of last December or by Moscow's latest offer of talks in reaction to this, and France would not therefore take part in negotiations on SALT III covering nuclear medium-range missiles. Nonetheless, France welcomed all efforts designed to achieve a "global strategic equilibrium."

LIBYA RELEASES DETAINED GEOLOGISTS

WA130015 London REUTER in English 2306 GMT 12 Jul 80

Bonn, July 12, REUTER--Libya today released six West German geologists it had held captive for four months, a West German Foreign Ministry spokesman announced. He said they were flying home accompanied by the West German ambassador to Libya and several Bonn officials.

The scientists, who work for a West German research institute, were detained with a Sudanese colleague and two Egyptian drivers March 3 while charting a geological map in an area bordered by Libya, Egypt and the Sudan. They were accused of violating Libyan territory, but were never formally charged.

PHARMACEUTICAL OFFICIAL COMMENTS ON ENTERPRISES IN IRAN

[Excerpt] Frankfurt-Bonn--The German Federation of the Pharmaceutial Industry has described as worthless yesterday's denial by the Iran Embassy in Bonn that German pharmaceutical enterprises in Iran have been expropriated. The Federation itself never spoke of nationalization, nor was the Iranian Foreign Ministry and thus the embassy in Bonn informed of events in Iran. The deputy secretary of the federation, Teichner, told DPA in Frankfurt today.

The federation, however, stands by its statement that the German pharmaceutical firms in Iran have been "deprived of control of their undertakings without any valid reasons having been given." This "measure resembling expropriation" must be regarded as a first step toward the nationalization of German pharmaceutical enterprises. It also is a fact that the firms have been deprived of control over the accounts of manufacturing companies. They still have access to the accounts of trading companies of the German pharmaceutical firms. Complete clarity can be established only within the next few working days since yesterday and today were nonworking days in Iran.

Teichner added that talks between the German Embassy and the (Iranian) Foreign Ministry have been arranged in Tehran for tomorrow. If it were to become clear at this meeting that the Iranian Government fully supports the measures taken and that "an act amounting to expropriation" took place, there could be "tough reactions" from the Federal Government. A binding assurance to this effect has been given by representatives of the Federal Government to the pharmaceutical industry.

Embassy To Seek 'Moderation'

LD121704 Hamburg DPA in German 1508 GMT 12 Jul 80

[Text] Tehran--The FRG Embassy in Tehran intends at the beginning of next week to try to get the Iranian Government either to annul or at least moderate the expropriation of German pharmaceutical firms. It was learned in the Iranian capital that a talk planned for Saturday between members of the embassy and government representatives did not take place "because no time was given." However, they will meet on Monday "at all events" in the prime minister's office.

Last Wednesday the embassy negotiated with Industries Minister Ahmadzadeh and on Thursday "tapped" other channels but so far without concrete results.

In the view of well-informed observers, despite an Iranian denial, the measures which the pharmaceuticals industry described as resembling expropriation amounts to "bold expropriation when one sees the practical effects." The chances of a restoration of the situation, however, are viewed in Tehran somewhat skeptically.

The Iranians have based their measures on a law adopted by the Revolution Council according to which the industries minister can appoint a new board of management in those firms where there has been a drop in production. On the basis of this law three Iranians have now been appointed in pharmaceutical firms as members of the board of management.

It was said in Tehran: "These people are now of course trying to make use of their powers...going as far as blocking bank accounts and sealing the warehouses storing raw materials."

During their talks the German side now wants to set in motion an "internal discussion in Iranian circles aimed at resulting in letters of authorization by the industries minister in cases not covered by the Revolution Council's law." Otherwise, it is feared in Tehran, the present development could also have effects on other branches of FRG industry still operating in Iran.

LAMBSDORFF ON IRAN TIES, TOKYO TALKS

DW111136 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 1100 GMT 10 Jul 80

[Excerpts from reporter Krawitz interview with Federal Minister of Economics Dr Otto Graf Lambsdorff, presumably in Bonn--recorded]

[Text] [Question] You returned from Tokyo this morning and found the reports from Iran about Iranian expropriation [of an FRG firm] on your desk. How will the Federal Ministry of Economics and the Federal Government react to the measures taken in Iran?

[Answer] One must view such extroardinary situations with a cool head. We hope all this is not as rigid as it seems. But if what the papers have written this morning and what initial reports say are true, the Federal Government will have to point out its stance very clearly in Tehran.

[Question] A treaty has existed for 15 years between Iran and the Federal Republic on the protection of investments. What possibilities do you have to press for adherence to this treaty?

[Answer] I cannot say at the moment. One can adhere to treaties only if one is dealing with somebody who is prepared to adhere to the norms of international law. I would like to remind you in this connection that I have pointed out repeatedly to German economic circles that a country that takes hostages will also not adhere to treaties that are valid under international law and trade policy standards. I did not expect, however, that my predictions and fears would materialize so quickly.

[Question] Let me ask you again about your stay in Tokyo. You met the top echelon of the American leadership there. Foreign Minister Genscher had informed Carter immediately after his Moscow visit. A number of indiscretions have taken place in the Federal Republic in the meantime involving the contents of the Moscow talks. The American have probably not missed that?

[Answer] Yes, that is correct. Last night I met for a short talk with the American President, with Secretary of State Muskie and security adviser Brzezinski, and we naturally touched briefly on the results of the Moscow visit. I will repeat once more the reactions of the President and of the secretary of state: This was a successful visit. The concession by the Soviet Union is interesting. Secretary of State Muskie said: The procedural concession must be filled now with substance; we must find out and we want to find out what the Soviets really want. That is in accordance with the attitude of the Federal Government. It was made very clear once more that the American side views the results of the Moscow visit with interest and agreement.

I then asked the security adviser, Mr Brzezinski: What do you think of the indiscretions and the protocols that have been published, have you read them? That was naturally the case.

And it was confirmed to me, as I had expected, that the protocols show particularly how clearly and unambiguously the federal chancellor and the federal foreign minister negotiated in Moscow. Those who arranged these indiscretions to perhaps cast a shadow on German-American relations have achieved exactly the opposite as far as I can tell from the impressions I gained in yesterday's talks.

[Question] Did you gain any further indications that the signals given by the Soviet side after the Moscow talks have been accepted and responded to by the United States?

[Answer] No, and that would probably have been asking too much. The American side at the moment cannot say more than: We consider this suggestion interesting. We believe that the concession consists in not waiting for the ratification of SALT II and the abolition of the decision to close the arms gap prior to engaging in arms control negotiations pertaining to European medium-range missiles. One cannot expect more than what the Americans have said--as we did also--namely, that this is primarily a concession. They must get together now and ask as well as listen to what can be done with regard to the substance of the matter--the medium-range missile problem. The mere concession--and none of us has assumed so either--would not cause the removal of one single SS-20 missile or the mothballing of one Backfire bomber.

[Question] Japan is far away, but its high-quality products can be found in our country, particularly products of the automobile and electronics industries. The European Community Commission wants to press for voluntary export restrictions by the Japanese in these fields; this was decided yesterday in Brussels. Did you notice anything in your talks with Japanese partners to the effect that they will be prepared to make voluntary export restrictions with regard to Europe?

[Answer] That was the main subject of my talks with the responsible Japanese politicians. The Japanese know about the problems we have in Europe. We have discussed the problem of wise self-restriction with regard to exports, particularly in the field of entertainment electronics where the situation is much more difficult than it is with regard to automobiles.

I think the arguments I outlined quite clearly to them on how we do not want protectionism, that the Federal Government does not want to be forced to issue import-restricting measures because we know that in the long run it would backfire on us--were listened to by the Japanese. They are also interested in keeping the world markets open.

They know that pressure can be created in our country by plants, trade unions and public opinion--and not just in the Federal Republic but in all partner countries of the European Community--pressure leading to political reactions not really intended by any side. Such results should not be broughtabout, they should much rather be avoided through reasonable talks and through cooperation.

[Question] In the long run you do not want to bring influence to bear on trade with import restrictions. But if the situation continues as it is, namely, the electronics industry being fully in the hands of the Japanese, would you be prepared to introduce short-term import restrictions?

[Answer] No, we are not prepared to introduce import restrictions. So far we have rejected everything resembling import quotas or self-restriction agreements. Fortunately the European Commission shows the same approach. We do not want to introduce such methods. We--the seven of us and also the European Community--committed ourselves once again in Venice not to take any protectionist measures, and that is how it must remain.

I must add that we--also here in the Federal Republic--must make enormous efforts to face the Japanese competitors in the long run. They are working hard over there, the technical level is high. Pay is not bad at all, wages are not at all lower than in our country, but productivity is higher. We will have to spit in our hands and go to work.

CARSTENS, GENSCHER RECEIVE JOHN ANDERSON

[Excerpt] Bonn--Federal President Karl Carstens received today in Bonn independent American presidential candidate John Anderson for an exchange of political views. The spokesman for the federal president's office stated in conclusion that there was in particular discussion of Europe's role in the East-West relationship and within the NATO alliance. Carstens and Anderson also spoke about the Middle East which the presidential candidate had visited before coming to Berlin and Bonn.

Following his talk with Carstens, Anderson met with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher. The topics for discussion were the visit recently made by Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt with Genscher to Moscow, and also disarmament issues as well as the situations in Afghanistan, Iran and the Middle East. In Berlin on Sunday Anderson spoke in favor of strengthening the dialogue between East and West.

GENSCHER FAVORS EARLY SPANISH, PORTUGUESE EEC MEMBERSHIP

[Text] Bonn--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has underlined the Federal Government's determination to conclude as quickly as possible the entry negotiations between the European Community EEC and Protugal and Spain.

In an interview with the Lisbon-published weekly EXPRESSO Genscher, who will be accompanying Federal President Karl Carstens on his state visit to Protugal on Monday, said the Federal Government saw no reason to depart from the schedule laid down for the entry negotiations. Bonn favors that these negotiations "and the work on adapting the EEC's internal structure should be carried out concurrently."

Genscher thus answered the question whether the Federal Republic shares France's concern about the early entry of Spain and Protugal into the EEC. France would like to solve the existing difficulties in the community of nine before enlarging the community.

In the interview, which was published in Bonn today, Genscher emphasized the "excellent relations" between Bonn and Lison both in the political as well as the economic sector. He considers there is "room for improvement" only as far as German direct investments are concerned which are presently running at about DM461 million.

SCHMIDT ADDRESSES PARTY RALLY ON TIES WITH U.S., EUROPE

[Excerpts] Bamberg--At the Franconia meeting of the SPD in Hallstadt, near Bamberg, Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt today told an audience of almost 7,000 that the Federal Republic needs the continuation of the social-liveral government coalition after the 1980 general election "in order to be able to preserve both external and internal peace."

Schmidt said with regard to his Moscow visit that the Soviet leaders know that they cannot separate the Federal Republic from its friends in Europe and from the United States and Canada and that the Federal Republic will continue to contribute so that the Western counterbalance to the East will not become too small. In the negotiations there were many points on which they did not agree, but on the other hand both sides had agreed to fulfill punctiliously the treaties that had been signed.

COMMENTATOR VIEWS PRO-U.S. RELATIONSHIP

DW111118 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 11 Jul 80 p 4

[Dieter Schroeder editorial: "Carter's Chinese Card"]

[Text] The meeting between President Carter and Chinese party chief Hua Guofeng in Japan was more than a gesture--it was a demonstration with the purpose of frightening the Kremlin leaders. Carter has placed the Chinese card openly on the table: He ruled out a formal alliance between the United States, China and Japan, but he approved close cooperation between these three states to contain Soviet military power. Never before since Kissinger's secret visit to Beijing have the interests of these two powers been so similar; China and the United States stand on the same side in the world crises containing a latent danger of war--the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and the Vietnamese occupation of Kampuchea with Moscow's support.

Since China's recognition by Carter in December 1978 and Deng Xiaoping's visit to Washington a few weeks later, relations between the two states have become closer and closer. The "triangular relationship" aimed for by Kissinger, envisaging about the same length of distance between Washington, Beijing and Moscow, no longer exists. Washington has shifted the weight to the advantage of Beijing. Both sides still shy away from forming a military alliance, but de facto their efforts are recognizably aimed at establishing a relationship just barely below a pact. "Our relations with China are no longer simply a function of our relations with the Soviet Union," said recently, State Department official Holbrooke who is responsible for the Asian division. And the Chinese Defense Minister Geng Biao stated during his visit to Washington: "We agree on almost all world problems."

As a result of this agreement he could take along a slackening of the American refusal to supply arms to China. The refusal no longer applies to "nonlethal" arms, helicopters, heavy trucks and electronic detection, navigation and guiding systems. But that alone strengthens China's military power considerably. It can develop intercontinental missiles itself, as it has shown recently, but it needs electronic guidance systems.

Yet China will not achieve the status of a military superpower for the time being. The Europeans are right in warning Washington against neglecting the treatment of Moscow over its flirtation with Beijing. China can hardly put out big fires that are far away, to use a phrase of the late Zhou Enlai. The West European warners overlooked the fact, however, that China is already a respectable regional big power, which does not only tie down strong Soviet forces but which represents more and more of a counterbalance to Soviet influence in Asia. The more Moscow promotes the expansionist striving of Vietnam, the closer Beijing and Washington work hand in hand and the more the fear decreases that many small Asiatic powers, such as the ASEAN states, have for the Chinese giant.

As an Atlantic and Pacific power the United States must be interested in maintaining a balance of power, not merely within the NATO sphere, but in setting up a corresponding balance of power in Asia as well, particularly since the Middle and Southeast Asian belt from Turkey to Thailand is beginning to become brittle. [paragraph continues]

The United States has hardly any reliable friends there. China, however, could become a reliable ally. It was no coincidence that Holbrooke pointed out that relative stability exists today from North Korea, which depends on China, to Taiwan and the Philippines.

The United States must be all the more interested in cooperation with Beijing, because the other Asiatic big power, India, is putting its weight more and more on the Soviet Union's side of the scale out of fear of China. With her decision to recognize Hanoi's puppet Heng Samrin in Phnom Penh, Indira Gandhi has not only torpedoed the demands of Beijing and Washington that Vietnamese troops be withdrawn from Kampuchea, she has also created a dangerous precedent. If she recognizes a Phnom Penh government that has been set up by a foreign power, the question poses itself as to when she will confirm legitimacy for Babrak Karmal, who was lifted by the Soviets into the Kabul saddle?

Moscow's victory in Delhi, the arrangement of which prior to the Tokyo meeting was probably no accident, have prompted Hua's and Carter's determination to cooperate. But this has brought Washington closer to the danger of becoming involved in a second Vietnam war. How far does its commitment go vis-a-vis Thailand? Will and can it keep Beijing from teaching Vietnam a "new lesson?"

Chinese-American cooperation also alleviates the situation for Europe. But Deng Xiaoping's dream of a great anti-Soviet alliance including the United States, Japan, Western Europe and the Third World, will not materialize, however, for the time being. Due to the Soviet reaction, which is hard to predict, Washington is not interested in this , let alone the Europeans. Above all the Beijing Washington "alliance" is endangered. Should Taiwan-friend Reagan win the presidential elections, the alliance could quickly fall apart.

LE MONDE HAILS FRENCH-FRG SUMMIT, VIEWS REACTIONS

[Editorial: "Two-Member Europe?"]

[Text] Mr Giscard d'Estaing's visit to the FRG which began amid indifference ended by arousing an interest which is particularly remarkable since it is mainly expressed by third parties. It is in France and the FRG that opinion is most blase and skeptical about the future of a "Europe without America" and most critical--a fact which can be partly explained by the pending elections. There was no question of Mr Strauss giving his rival Mr Schmidt any mark of approval through the president of the republic.

However, the Foreign Office spokesman in London, noted that the "strengthening of ties between Paris and Bonn" is an "important factor"; THE TIMES, while deeming it useful to point out that "U.S. protection" is vital to Europe, stresses that the Franco-German rapprochement "is one of those permanent changes in historical relations which only a cataclysm could destroy." THE GUARDIAN advises Mrs Thatcher to profit from this example. "Any resentment on our part is unjustified because neither the French nor the Germans have tried to exclude us from their relations," the newspaper writes, advising Britain to become a third member of the "old triumvirate" and to "join fully" in common policies.

CORRIERE DELLA SERA's reaction is also positive. The Milan daily stresses that Paris and Bonn have only chosen to run a "two-member Europe" because their partners were incapable of running a nine-member Europe.

On the other side of the Atlantic, U.S. journalist Joseph Kraft thinks, with regret, that the United States has handed over to France and Germany "the conduct of the alliance's policies toward Russia, in the Middle East and the Gulf." The Soviet reaction is more unexpected. Who would have believed that Moscow would one day have hailed the emergence of a Franco-German policy and the "pacifying" role which Western Europe can play?

These reactions could probably give rise to misunderstandings. However, there is at least the satisfaction of knowing that, 17 years after the French-German treaty, the partners of the two countries (whose disagreements twice deteriorated into world wars) are discovering that their agreement is beneficial to all. It is not an operation to split Europe but a necessary, albeit insufficient, basis for any process of building Europe. The lesson which the Paris and Bonn leaders can learn from this at a time when Europe is stagnating and being watered down is to continue on this path.

With regard to the superpowers, "Europe's role in the world" for which Mr Giscard d'Estaing and Mr Schmidt are praying could not be that of supplanting the United States or even moving systematically away from it, but choosing the policy they think best in all circumstances according to Europe's particular interests and in view of the U.S. ally's strengths and weaknesses.

Europe's role cannot be that of seeking appeasement at all costs and the USSR would be deluding itself--if it is not already doing so--if it thought that European policy could be one of neutrality. Europe is too exposed to remain outside a world conflict. Playing its role and having its own policy implies that Europe should assume its responsibilities in all spheres and above all that it should have the means to do so. It is anything but resignation.

FRANCOIS-PONCET'S NORWAY VISIT, TALKS REVIEWED

[Catherine Lochstoer report: "Francois-Poncet in Norway: Oslo Wishes To Develop Its Contacts With EEC Countries"]

[Text] Oslo--Two topics dominated the talks which Francois-Poncet, the French foreign minister, and Knut Frydenlund, his Norwegian colleague, had in Oslo from 4 through 6 July: the international tension resulting from the invasion of Afghanistan by Soviet troops and Norway's relations with the EEC. In a mountain hotel, located in the Telemark region, Francois-Poncet conveyed to his host the information which he had just received from Genscher, the West German Foreign Minister, on the Schmidt-Brezhnev meeting in Moscow. Frydenlund will be going to Moscow in the autumn at the invitation of Gromyko, the Soviet foreign minister.

The Norwegian Government emphasized its concern to maintain contacts with the Europe of the Nine, all the more imperative as tighter cooperation in foreign policy develops within the Community. It is in order to take account of this development that Frydenlund has begun a series of consultations on the international situation and the analysis made of it in the most important European capitals. The Norwegian side hopes to pursue these bilateral contacts without institutionalizing them.

In 1972, Norway declared itself against joining the Common Market by a referendum which will not be reappraised within the foreseeable future. For both the French and Norwegian ministers the different stances adopted over recent months by Washington on the one hand and by certain European capitals on the other are the expression of complementary rather than of conflicting interests between West Europe and the United States. Norway does not consider, the official line says, that its dependence on the United States for security reasons detaches it from the European viewpoints.

During his talks with Francois-Poncet Frydenlund reviewed the plan for stockpiling in Norway "heavy combat equipment intended for the Allied Forces which will help the Norwegian Army if it is threatened." Norway took this decision because it reckons that in the event of an attack with conventional arms the Allies would have neither the time nor the material capacity to transport such equipment. This plan, which has been known for 2 years, is fueling a debate in the country at present and provoking hostile comments from the Soviet media. Francois-Poncet was also informed of the situation in the regions to the north of Norway, that is, the Arctic Ocean; the demarcation of the continental shelf in the Barents Sea has for many years been the topic of negotiations with the Soviet Union which are considered of great economic and strategic importance by Norway and other Western countries. Francois-Poncet's visit, the Norwegian side hopes, will be an important element in the network of diplomatic contacts which Norway is trying to establish with West Europe, especially as contacts between the two countries have been rather poor until now.

EGYPTIAN FOREIGN MINISTRY OFFICIAL HOLDS TALKS WITH STIRN

NC101610 Cairo MENA in English 1540 GMT 10 Jul 80

[Text] Paris, July 10 (MENA)--Egyptian Foreign Undersecretary Samir Ahmad held today a number of meetings here with officials at the French Foreign Ministry as he met with French State Minister for Foreign Affairs Olivier Stirn, the director of the Middle East and North Africa Department and the director of the Department of Africa. Samir Ahmad told the MENA correspondent here that, during these meetings, they exchanged view points on the various problems concerning the Middle East and the Continent of Africa and reviewed all joint fields in which Egypt and France can cooperate for the interest of both countries and the free world.

They also exchanged view points on the French and Egyptian policies as regards the Continent of Africa and means of boosting [word indistinct] relations in this field. The Egyptian foreign undersecretary pointed out that both sides found many fields for cooperation as regards issues and many places in the world, adding that he discussed with the director of the Middle East and North Africa Department in their meeting yesterday and today the developments of the Middle East issue and means [words indistinct] the process forward.

Samir Ahmad arrived here yesterday for a (?short) visit at the invitation of the French Foreign Ministry and he will proceed to London today before his return to Cairo.

GENERAL STAFF PUBLISHES NAVAL EQUIPMENT PLANS

LD140907 Paris LE MONDE in French 3 Jul 80 p 12

[Unattributed report: "By the Year 2000 the National Navy Will Include 136 Battleships and Support Ships"]

[Text] Two years after its approval by a Defense Council presided over by the head of state, the long-term national navy equipment plan has been published by the General Staff in the latest issue of the NOUVELLE REVUE MARITIME. This plan envisages that by the year 2000 France will have 136 battleships and support ships at its disposal, not including the nuclear missile submarines and a fleet of lighter vessels for civilian missions.

It is the first time that the General Staff of the national navy has given any precise indications on its equipment plan, which was adopted by the Defense Council in June 1978. Since then the government, despite repeated demands by numerous parliamentarians, refused to publish the main outlines. The stubborn insistence of certain rapporteurs of the National Assembly's Defense Commission were needed before Bourges on 5 November (LE MONDE 7 November 1979) agreed to give some indications of the naval equipment plan to a restricted circle of deputies.

Today, in the June NOUVELLE REVUE MARITIME, the General Staff makes public "the extent of the ongoing naval equipment level defined in June 1978 by the president of the republic" and designed to prepare the navy for the year 2000.

The so-called "general use" combat force, will include three aircraft carriers (two airplane carriers and one helicopter carrier), 18 antisubmarine corvettes, 9 anti-air defense corvettes, 18 cutters and 10 patrol boats. The two present airplane carriers, the Foch and the Clemenceau, are due to be replaced after 1991 and for 3 years now, the General Staff indicates, funds have been allocated to studies on nuclear propulsion of future airplane carriers.

This naval air force will be supplemented by 56 light helicopters, 18 heavy helicopters and about 80 carrier-based aircraft. The naval patrol force is to include 40-50 airplanes.

The antimine force will have 40 vessels at its disposal by the year 2000: minehunters and minesweepers. A submarine strike force is also envisaged, with 10 nuclear and 4 diesel submarines.

As far as the so-called support force is concerned, the national navy will have three troop landing craft, six light transport vessels, six logistical support ships, two multipurpose repair vessels, three ocean-going tugs and four supply tankers. Finally, a public service surface force is envisaged for civilian missions of antipollution protection and combat with 11 ships whose construction is expected to cost about FR836 million between 1981 and 1985.

PAJETTA INTERVIEWED ON MOSCOW VISIT, COMMUNIQUE

LD111650 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 0600 GMT 11 Jul 80

[Text] The visit to Moscow by the Communist Party delegation led by Gian Carlo Pajetta has ended. The tone of the final communique is moderate. The disagreements are still there but an effort was made to avoid a worsening of relations. At the end of the talks Ias Gawronski was granted an interview by Pajetta:

[Begin recording] [Gawronski] The talks ended with a final communique between the delegations of the Italian Communist Party [PCI] and the Soviet party. We ask Deputy Pajetta: [words indistinct] the Communist Party has condemned the invasion? The Soviets seem to be rather harsh as regards their position. Have you observed any change?

[Pajetta] The Soviet comrades evaluate the current situation in a positive way. As far as we are concerned, we have confirmed our attitude and we do not think of having to change it today.

[Gawronski] Have the Soviets changed anything?

[Pajetta] They say that the withdrawal of some troops underlines the normalization of the situation. We have found an element of convergence, I would say of joint satisfaction, in the fact that the Soviet (?initiatives) and the talks in Moscow with Schmidt and in Warsaw with Giscard d'Estaing have opened a path, let us say a path to the hope of a prompt resumption of negotiations. The Soviets regard the results as positive, even if, naturally, we are at the beginning of a new phase, we hope, however, at the beginning.

[Gawronski] Your article looked like an excommunication, an anethema; a few weeks ago you were harshly attacked by the Soviet review NOVOYE VREMYA. Was there any clarification concerning that article?

[Pajetta] I do not think that NOVOYE VREMYA is a professional chair from which one can anathematize. The answers I had to give I gave in Italy, and I recalled that here. Your question makes me think that you have not yet sufficiently understood that the Italian Communists speak in Beijing as in Rome, and in Rome as in Moscow, and in Moscow, therefore, as in Rome.

PCI, PCF GROUPS DISCUSS ECONOMIC QUESTIONS IN PARIS

LD140821 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 6 Jul 80 p 16

[Unattributed report: "Meeting Between PCI and PCF DELEGATIONS"]

[Text] Paris--Comrades Gian Carlo Pajetta and Paolo Bufalini of the PCI Directorate and Guido Fanti of the Central Committee met at PCF headquarters on Friday, 4 July with Comrades Maxime Gremetz of the PCF Secretariat and Politburo, Claude Poperen of the Politburo, and Roger Trugnand. There was an exchange of opinions and a broad exchange of information, particularly on the economic and social situations and the struggles in progress in the two countries. Reciprocal reports were given on the recent meetings of the two parties' central committees. The problems of joint cooperation between French and Italian Communists and of its development were examined. The meeting was held in a frank and comradely atmosphere.

Also in Paris, a study meeting of the group of Communist deputies and others associated with the European Parliament in Strasbourg was held on Thursday and Friday to discuss the problems of the international crisis and the underlying causes of hunger and underdevelopment in the world. Comrade Bruno Ferrero, who delivered an introductory report, offered the group some suggestions and topics for discussion and opened a debate which went on to consider the workers movement's proposals for a new North-South relationship and struggle initiatives for combating the multinationals' efforts to preserve conditions of neocolonial exploitation in underdeveloped countries. The meeting also examine various initiatives by international organizations, as well as the proposals contained in the Brandt report and the EEC role in this sphere. A working group was set up to follow developments on these questions, notable in connection with the planned September session of the European Parliament to examine the problem of world hunger, at which Comrade Bruno Ferrero is to deliver the general report.

PCI MEMBER ON IDEOLOGICAL, POLITICAL DISORIENTATION

[Unattributed report on PCI Central Committee member Antonio Roasio 25 June speech during Central Committee debate in Rome]

[Text] It is not enough, Comrade Roasio said, to limit ourselves to a verdict on the positive and negative election results. Instead we must carry out a thorough investigation into the causes of a degree of ideological disorientation that has occurred in the party with regard to the complexity of the domestic situation and the major tensions and contradictions in the world. I believe that one weak point that can be pointed to is the meager and, in any case, insufficient debate in the local sections, whose incomprehensions and confusions in political orientation are immediately reflected in the broad masses of workers and young people.

We must therefore return to Togliatti's teaching: The objective of the struggle for an advanced democracy must not obscure the ideological objective of socialism. The greatest danger is of making concessions to anticommunism and anti-Sovietism. To this end, and in view of the grave crisis threatening world peace, we must work to facilitate as much as we can the unity of communists and all leftwing forces against the threat of disaster. And yet never before have such phenomena of division and conflict failed to be surmounted despite the common dangers. This is why, though I approved of the report on our delegation's visit to China, I am not naive enough to believe that one visit is enough to surmount conflicts that remain profound. But for these same reasons I disagree with the directorate's decision not to attend the Paris conference: That decision certainly did not help the quest for unity.

With regard to the Afghan issue, I believe it would be a mistake to portray the situation in that country by isolating it from the broader world context: It is right to feel concerned and to condemn the bloc policy, but let us not forget what the policy of each of the blocs is and to which side the forces working for peace against those working for war belong.

Why do we not launch a major mass mobilization and develop our international solidarity in a strong peace movement which is opposed to the threats now besetting world peace, to the rearmament policy and to the missile bases in our country? This is one direction in which the broad masses of workers and young people can be given new and strong ideological motivations for waging the political struggle.

SA CARNEIRO RETURNS FROM ITALY, GREECE TOUR

[Text] Prime Minister Sa Carneiro today returned to Lisbon from a visit to Rome and Athens connected with Portugal's bid for EEC membership. During his visit to Athens, a cultural and scientific cooperation agreement was signed between the two countries by Portuguese Foreign Minister Diogo Freitas do Amaral and his Greek counterpart, Konstantin Mitsotakis. Speaking to journalists upon his arrival at Lisbon airport, Sa Carneiro said:

[Begin recording] As you know, when we took office last January it was my intention not to spend much time abroad. The circumstances, however, made it absolutely necessary for us to undertake this tour of EEC member countries as well as of the future 10th EEC member, Greece. All contacts confirmed the useful, I would even say indispensable, nature of this trip. And although we have been away from our country, we have been working on an important issue, Portugal's membership in the EEC.

Substantial progress has been made in these contacts, not only by acquainting ourselves in greater detail with the internal problems of the Common Market but also by seeking to secure quicker membership and to create the conditions to enable Portugal to join the EEC on the best possible terms. That was the case in Rome and Athens, and we should be gratified over this. We acquainted ourselves with what is being said and thought about our country, and noted a great openness everywhere toward Portugal's membership, despite all the difficulties the EEC itself is currently experiencing.

There is nothing particularly relevant to be added to what the press has already reported. What happened in Rome and Athens enabled us to confirm the timetable of negotiations, the favorable stand of the Italian Government vis-a-vis our accession to the Common Market, as well as the importance to Portugal of Greece's process of membership, since it marks the first step of EEC expansion to southern Europe and the beginning of a stage which will enable the EEC to become the Europe of the 12. There is only Dublin to be visited now, and this we will do as soon as possible, thus concluding our tour of EEC capitals [words indistinct]. [end recording]

PS LEADER SOARES TO VISIT PRC

NC112300 Paris AFP in English 2255 GMT 11 Jul 80

[Text] Lisbon, July 11 (AFP)--Mario Soares, secretary general of the Portuguese Socialist Party, leaves there tomorrow (Saturday) for a seven-day visit to China. He will be accompanied by Baleimbra Martins, the former Portuguese ambassador to Paris who negotiated the reestablishment of diplomatic relations between Lisbon and Beijing in February, 1979, during the first government headed by Mr Soares.

Mr Soares, who is also vice president of the Socialist International, told AFP he would brief Chinese leaders on his recent talks in Bucharest with Romanian President Nicolae Ceasusescu.

The former Portuguese prime minister's visit will include several provincial cities. After leaving China he will spend two days in the Portuguese territory of Macao and will also stop in Hong Kong before returning to Lisbon July 24 or 25.

LORD CARRINGTON SCORES ISRAELI POLICY ON PLO, JERUSALEM

TA122044 Jerusalem Domestic Television Service in Hebrew 1830 GMT 12 Jul 80

[British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington interview with Israeli television London correspondent Tzvi Goren in London--videotaped in English; date not given]

[Text] [Carrington] Now, one of the other factors which you have to take into account is that the PLO do represent a very large proportion of the... a very large number of Palestinians, and whether you approve of the PLO or you disapprove of the PLO, you can't ignore them. They're there, they won't go away, and so, if you're going to get a solution in which you're going to talk about things with people--and you have to talk about it before you get a solution--you must, one of the things you must do is to speak to the PLO. After all, we would never have got any kind of solution in Rhodesia if the British Government had refused to talk to Mr Mugabe or Mr Nkomo or Bishop Muzorewa, and what matters is what you get out of the talks, not who you talk to.

[Question] One of the issues is the question of the self-determination for the Palestinians. Do you support a statehood for the Palestinian people?

[Answer] You can't exlude it because this is one of the solutions which, I suppose, could happen. But none of this could happen without the agreement of the parties concerned. Nobody can impose a settlement upon Israel. Nobody can impose a settlement upon the Palestinians. There's going to have to be a negotiation to which everybody agrees. What you've got to do, what you have to do is to find--to begin with--what is the highest common factor, and then build on that factor. Otherwise you're never going to get a solution.

[Question] Does Her Majesty's Government object to the restoration of Jewish quarter in the old city [of Jerusalem] or to the renovation of roads around the whole city or, for that matter, for the restoration of the freedom of access to all holy places?

[Answer] What we say is that it's a mistake unilaterally to decide the future of Jerusalem on your own, having regard to the very controversial nature of the subject. In exactly the same way we think it's a very great mistake to have Israeli settlements on the West Bank, because it makes the negotiations and the settlement of the whole problem that much more difficult. To try and preempt these decisions makes a settlement of the whole Arab-Israel conflict that much more difficult, and I think it's right and honorable and honest to say so in front of the television camera.

[Question] Going back to Jerusalem, do you think Israel should have refrained from doing anything in Jerusalem?

[Answer] I think you ought to have had regard for what I have just said.

[Question] Prime Minister Begin is intending to move his office to a new building in east Jerusalem. Will you instruct your ambassador to refrain from going there?

[Answer] I think it will be, if I may say so, a great mistake if your prime minister moves there. I think it will make things very much more difficult for your friends and very much easier for your enemies.

LIBYAN FOREIGN SECRETARY MEETS WITH KIPRIANOU DURING VISIT

At-Turayki Arrival Statement

[Text] Libyan Foreign Affairs Secretary At-Turayki arrived in Cyprus this afternoon for contacts with the Cypriot Government. He was received at Larnaca Airport by Foreign Minister Rolandhis and Libyan Charge d'Affaires in Nicosia Az-Zabi. In a statement on his arrival, the Libyan foreign secretary said that his country was very much interested in establishing peace in Cyprus and that it would do whatever it could to help the Cypriot people find a compromise and settle their problem. He added: We are certain of the determination of both parties to find a peaceful and just solution to the problem within the framework of the island's unity and neutrality.

Kiprianou Conference

NC141136 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 14 Jul 80

[Text] President Kiprianou today received Libyan Foreign Affairs Secretary At-Turayki, who has come to Cyprus to engage in contacts with the Cyprus Government. Their meeting lasted for one and a half hours and was also attended by Foreign Minister Rolandhis, Greek Cypriot representative at the inter-Cypriot talks Ioannidhis and Libyan Charge d'Affaires in Nicosia Az-Zabi.

Speaking after the meeting, President Kiprianou described it as very useful and added that during the meeting views were exchanged on the situation in Cyprus and the initiative undertaken by President Al-Qadhdhafi which resulted in At-Turayki's arrival in Cyprus. President Kiprianou added: I have had the opportunity to fully outline to Mr At-Turayki our positions on the Cyprus issue and we will continue our talks tomorrow.

In his statement on the same occasion, Mr At-Turayki said he had the honor to be received by President Kiprianou and continue with him the talks which began in Havana and New York. He added: I can say the talks were very positive and I am sure that a good and fruitful result will come out from such friendly talks. Asked what might be expected from Libya's efforts, Mr At-Turayki said: I have established President Kiprianou's determination for a Cyprus solution in the interest of the Cypriot people--both communities of the island--and in the interest of our friendly Mediterranean countries. After his meeting with the president of the republic, Mr At-Turayki left for the Turkish sector of Nicosia to meet with Turkish Cypriot leader Denktas.

DENKTAS RETURNS FROM AMMAN CONFERENCE, COMMENTS ON AT-TURAYKI

[Text] Turkish Federated State of Cyprus President Rauf Denktas returned home today after attending the extraordinary Islamic countries foreign ministers meeting held in Amman. In a statement to the TRT in Lefkosa [Nicosia], Denktas said that it was his impression at the conference that all who are very interested in the Cyprus problem have completely grasped the significance of the struggle being waged by the Muslim Turkish Cypriot community in the island. Denktas added that the Turkish side should find more occasions to make its cause heard in international forums. Denktas said that in Amman he met with Libyan Foreign Affairs Secretary 'Ali 'Abd al-Salam at-Turayki during the conference and discussed the Cyprus problem with him. Denktas added that he hoped that his talks with the Libyan foreign minister in Lefkosa would generally be very profitable. At-Turayki arrived in southern Cyprus yesterday after attending the Amman conference in order to conduct talks with Turkish and Greek Cypriot leaders in a bid to find a peaceful solution to the Cyprus issue.

KIPRIANOU RECEIVES CREDENTIALS OF PLO ENVOY

[Excerpts] President Kiprianou has reiterated that we are ready for a peaceful solution of the Cyprus issue through dialogue and that we have proved this many times. However, he added, this has not been possible because of complete intransigence by the Turkish side. At the presidential palace today, President Kiprianou received the credentials by which Muhammad Qirawiyah is accredited as PLO representative to Cyprus. President Kiprianou stressed that we will continue our efforts toward a substantive dialogue, but at the same time we will also continue our international efforts to secure the strongest possible international support for our cause.

President Kiprianou noted that there are many similarities between the Palestinian and Cypriot people's struggles. He stressed that we need the solidarity and support of all our friends so that the countries which can really influence Turkey may themselves feel the pressure of world opinion and will act to exert pressure on Turkey to abandon its expansionist designs against Cyprus. On the Palestinian issue, President Kiprianou reiterated Cyprus' support for self-determination for the Palestinian people and their right to establish their own independent state. He went on: We have repeatedly declared that the Middle East problem cannot be solved through specific agreements and that a lasting solution can be achieved through the full implementation of the resolutions.

Presenting his credentials to President Kiprianou, Mr Qirawiyah expressed deep gratitude and appreciation for Cyprus' support for the Palestinian people's struggle. He also reiterated the PLO's firm support for the government and people of Cyprus--this friendly country which, he said, is struggling to restore its unity, independence and sovereignty. Mr Qirawiyah concluded: This can be attained only through the implementation of UN resolutions on Cyprus, the end of foreign intervention, the withdrawal of foreign troops from Cyprus and the protection of the nonalignment of Cyprus, whose late great leader Archbishop Makarios played a significant role in the establishment of the nonaligned movement.

JUSTICE MINISTER ACCEPTS INVITATION TO MOSCOW OLYMPICS

[Text] According to an official statement released today, Foreign Minister Rolandhis handed to UK High Commissioner Rhodes an aide-memoire referring to the exact claims of the republic of Cyprus for economic aid from the United Kingdom under the treaty of establishment. This economic aid is envisaged by the pertinent treaty on the operation of the British bases.

PAPANDREOU ASSERTS CHAMBER'S JURISDICTION OVER NATO ACCORD, BASES

AT121611 Athens EXORMISI in Greek 12 Jul 80 p 5

[Text of statement by PASOK Chairman A. Papandreou on the return to NATO and U.S. bases in Greece]

[Text] PASOK firmly opposes our country's return to the NATO military wing. It is equally firm in its decision on the removal of foreign bases from this country's soil.

It also believes that the current parliament does not correspond to the correlation of forces within the electoral body and for this reason it has repeatedly asked for the immediate dissolution of the chamber of deputies and the holding of elections.

Consequently, it does not acknowledge the right of the New Democracy government to negotiate and decide on issues that concern our national independence and integrity, all the more so because such issues should be discussed by the chamber in accordance with the provisions of the constitution. Only the chamber that will emerge from the next elections will be able to make choices which concern our own national existence.

Indispensable Briefing

The current government should directly brief the national representatives on the discussions which it is holding on these issues and it should not enter into any action which will be binding on our national independence and integrity until the sovereign people have decided the current government's fate.

The binding authority of the chamber to decide on these issues emerges from the following facts: As is well known, our country's withdrawal from the NATO military wing after the Turkish invasion of Cyprus in 1974, occurred when the Greek Government partially abrogated Greece's protocol on accession to the North Atlantic Alliance, dated 22 October 1951 and ratified by law 1989 of 19 February 1952. Consequently, the abrogation legally invalidated the treaty which linked us with the NATO military wing. This means that Greek forces ended their dependency on the NATO military command and returned to an exclusive national command; at the same time, our defense policy was significantly disengaged. (The fact that a complete follow-up was not done on the legal consequences of withdrawal from the NATO military wing which entails the government's political responsibility should in no way be considered as a de facto continuation of our country's commitments to the Atlantic alliance).

Greece's return to the NATO military wing, either under the old terms or new, is legally possible only through a new agreement which, according to the constitution and international law, cannot become valid without a formal law. Like most modern democratic constitutions, our's has removed jurisdiction for the conclusion of significant international agreements from the executive power and entrusted it to its representative body. Thus, such treaties are nonexistent and invalid either inside Greece or vis-a-vis the contracting states or international organizations unless ratified by the chamber of deputies. Our constitution, however, does not limit itself to this area. With regard to certain treaties that are especially dangerous to national independence because they limit national sovereignty, their conclusion requires the approval of a wide majority of national representatives. These instances are specified by article 27, paragraph 2 and article 28 paragraphs 2 and 3 of the constitution which refer to:

The Constitution Specifics

A) The establishment, sojourn or mere passage of a foreign military force through Greek territory, B) the recognition of the constitutional jurisdiction of organs of international organizations and C) general restrictions on national sovereignty. For cases "A" and "C" the constitution requires the absolute majority of all deputies while for case "B" it requires a 3/5 majority of all deputies. We had noted the dangers of such international agreements during the discussions on the drafting of the constitution (minutes of the chamber's plenary session, page 94).

Specifically, with regard to the agreement for the country's return to the military wing of NATO which the government is negotiating, we note the following:

Possibilities

This agreement will, in any case, make possible the establishment, sojourn and passage through Greek territory of foreign military forces as well as other restrictions on our national sovereignty that indisputably fall within the provisions of article 27, paragraph 2 and article 28, paragraph 3 of the constitution. However, in addition to this, as is well known, NATO is an international organization. The agreement for a return to NATO recognizes the NATO organ's jurisdiction over the armed forces command and our defense policy that the constitution entrusts, principally through article 45, paragraph 1 and article 82, paragraph 1, to the Greek Government. Consequently, since the agreement for the return to the NATO military wing recognizes that the organs of this international organization have "constitutional" jurisdiction it falls within article 28, paragraph 2, that is, in order to be valid and bind our country internationally, it must be ratified by a 3/5 majority of all deputies in the chamber.

Parliamentary Approval

Regarding our country's bilateral agreement with the United States on the U.S. military bases, it is clear that this falls within article 27, paragraph 2 of the constitution since it concerns the establishment, sojourn and passage of a foreign force on Greek territory. Therefore, regardless of what this agreement is called: An extention, renewal, revision or anything else, in order to be ratified by the chamber the approval of an absolute majority of all deputies is required. However, we must note that this agreement cannot at the same time include restrictions on national sovereignty because such an agreement can be possible only under conditions set forth by the constitution in article 28, paragraph 3. Consequently, the bases should not constitute a restriction on national sovereignty. According to this constitutional provision, restrictions on national sovereignty are possible only "under conditions of reciprocity." This was adequately discussed during preliminary work on the constitution and, regarding the adoption of this condition, the relevant discussion is contained in the chamber minutes. However, reciprocity in the case of the U.S. bases is not possible. Consequently, restrictions on our national sovereignty through this agreement are not possible.

According to the constitution, as we have stated, the authority for concluding all international treaties and agreements, which are valid only through law (article 27, paragraphs 2 and 3; article 36, paragraph 2 of the constitution), belongs to the legislative organ. It belongs to neither the president of the republic, according to article 36, paragraph 1, whose authority to conclude international treaties in parliamentary democracies is, after all, entirely formal, nor to the government which simply conducts the preliminary discussions.

The Authoritative Organ

The fact that the chamber is basically the authoritative organ for the conclusion of such treaties is accepted by jurists of international law (see for instance Evstathiadhis, "International Law," 1977, page 1323). After all, the basic NATO treaty itself follows the practice of international law and, concerning the validity of its position, refers to the constitutions of its member states. From the purpose and spirit of the constitutional principles which transferred this very significant authority to the popular representatives and from the parliamentary principle which governs our regime it can be concluded that the government which is conducting the negotiations should unfailingly brief the chamber on every stage of its discussions and submit its every action to parliamentary control. It has this obligation both in order to help the chamber formulate its opinion in depth and in good time and in order to assess the will of the representative body, that is, of the organ which will have the last word, something that all sides in the negotiations will find useful. Secret negotiation of agreements on which the parliament must decide not only is inconceivable but also violates the constitution and shows contempt for the popular representatives.

KKE PLENUM PROPOSES STEPS FOR TAKING POWER FROM RIGHTWING

AT131355 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 13 Jul 80 p 3

[From the "Political Issues" page: "Resolution of the Plenum of the Central Committee of the KKE (Exterior) on Immediate Elections and on Taking Government Authority Away From the rightwing"; date not given]

[Text] The plenum of the Central Committee of the KKE considers that taking authority away from the rightwing today is not only a vital necessity for the people and the country but it is also a very realistic duty which could be fulfilled indirectly. The possibilities for bringing about a true change, which will open the way for radical anti-imperialist, anti-monopoly and democratic reforms, are being specifically cultivated in this direction.

The plenum stresses that in order to bring about this democratic change in the country's life it is essential to intensify the struggle for expanding and developing the organized mass movement of the people for immediate parliamentary elections; for a decisive strengthening of the KKE within the chamber of deputies and among the people and for coordinated action by the anti-imperialist democratic forces.

These basic goals of the struggle for a democratic change are derived from an analysis of the latest political and economic developments in our country in conjunction with developments in the international situation.

1. The international situation has deteriorated very recently and peace is faced with a serious threat. U.S.-NATO imperialism is responsible for this deterioration because: Through an intensification of armaments and, generally, through its policy for a return to the cold war it attempts to stop the peoples movement toward social progress; it attempts to change the world balance of power in its favor; it attempts to gain military supremacy; and to gain positions and to overcome its economic crisis. The leaders of China are on the side of imperialism and with it they proceed toward establishing an anti-Soviet alliance which also has a military character.

The firm policy of detente and peace of the Soviet Union and the other socialist countries; the development of the peoples' struggle for the preservation and expansion of detente; and the coordination of action by all peace-loving forces in the world, all these are in a position to put a stop to the imperialist offensive and to protect humanity against the serious dangers which threaten it. Under such conditions the duty to mobilize all peace-loving forces in our country gains a primary importance so that our country may also contribute, through practical action, toward the defense of world peace.

2. The passage of Karamanlis to the presidency of the republic established a considerable center of power for the ruling class which, by utilizing to the utmost the superpowers provided to the president by the constitution, will proceed to a further strengthening of its own authoritarian, Atlantic, post junta regime, either by maintaining "New Democracy" in authority or through promonopoly coalition governments or through the enforcement of antidemocratic checks in the policy of a democratic government, thus confining it within the framework of simple government change. The KKE stresses that in no way will this mean that the ruling class will be able to block the road toward the change which the country needs so much.

The election of Rallis to the leadership of "New Democracy" and to the prime ministership expresses a specific option in tactics aimed to protect the sovereignty of the monopolistic oligarchy and to oppose the peoples movement. The two factions within "New Democracy" generally follow the same promonopolistic and Atlantic policy but they try to support and pursue it in different ways. It is quite possible that this difference between the two factions may take on a more open character or that it could even be utilized in order to concentrate around "New Democracy" centrist forces on the one hand and, on the other hand to attract conservative masses and extremist reactionary forces. Irrespective of the dimensions which the confrontation of these two factions may take, the ruling class, by taking into consideration the decrease of "New Democracy's" influence, also seeks other reserve solutions and prepares different schemes in order to protect its sovereignty.

3. The Rallis Government continues the policy of previous "New Democracy" governments, a policy which has complicated and made the problems of the people and of the country even more difficult.

Despite its declarations in support of peace and its extremely few practical acts, such as the recent routine participation of the Greek team in the Olympic games, the government generally acts in the opposite direction. It supports installation of "Pershing 2" and "cruise" missiles in West Europe; it does not try to prevent our country's involvement in U.S.-NATO aggressive adventures; and it keeps foreign military bases on its territory. It not only fails to undertake but it even refuses to share in positive initiatives for the improvement of the international climate. An intensification of efforts toward Greece's return to NATO in conjunction with the ratification of the agreement on U.S. bases on our territory, within the framework of the dogma of the "balance of power" between Greece and Turkey, lead to further curbs on national independence and to the total dependence of our national defense upon the U.S.-NATO imperialists and increases the dangers of a nuclear destruction for our people.

During the spring meeting of NATO foreign ministers in Ankara, the Greek Government, giving in to U.S.-NATO imperialist pressure, accepted a new cycle of bargaining with them for the speediest possible reenclavement within NATO's military wing and the simultaneous ratification of the agreement on bases. Negotiations on Greek-Turkish differences and the Cyprus issue were connected to these issues under U.S.-NATO imperialist supervision. This government line creates new dangers of solutions to these issues which would serve only the aggressive policies of the United States and NATO and which would be turned against the country's national independence and sovereignty.

At the same time the country's economic situation deteriorates and the worker's living standard continually becomes worse. This deterioration is further augmented by adjustment measures for our accession to the EEC.

Inflation, which last year reached 25 percent and created an absolute drop in workers' incomes, is reaching ever higher levels this year. National revenue for 1980 is at a standstill. Stagnation in investments, particularly in industry, continues with the result that the country is at a development impasse. There is a decrease in material productivity and the unemployment problem becomes serious. There is a phenomenon of crisis on the market because of a drop in consumer sales due to a cut in workers' incomes and the increasing difficulties and bankruptcies of small and medium commercial and handicraft businesses.

The increase in economic crisis symptoms is the problem of the domestic situation. According to all indications these symptoms will further increase by the close of the year.

Faced with this situation the Rallis government reacts with enforcement of the Atlantic promonopolistic policy of previous "New Democracy" governments with an ever increasing determination. It promotes the so-called liberalization of the economy, in other words the more unchecked operation of monopolies, the freer the implementation of "incentives" and privileges for these monopolies, the abolition of price controls and stricter enforcement of austerity for the workers. This trend in the government's economic policy will further increase the phenomena of economic crisis and will intensify the deterioration of the workers' position.

In an effort to enforce this policy the government describes workers' strikes as "unjustified" in a stereotypical manner and deals with them accordingly. The government encourages employer's counter-strikes; it encourages establishment of strike-breaking apparatus. It instigates the trail of trade unionist administrative bodies; it intensifies the dismissal of conscientious trade unionists from factories and other businesses, and it increases the enforcement of measures to curb the freedom of the people.

Fully appreciating the situation, the plenum of the Central Committee of the KKE concludes that we are faced with a further climaxing of the attack by the monopolistic oligarchy and imperialism against the living standard and the rights of the working people and it stresses the need for better organization and the development of the struggles of the working class and all the people in order to counter this attack.

4. The policy of the "New Democracy" government is considered to be a failure by the broad social strata and even by a considerable number of voters who supported "New Democracy." The problem of taking away government authority from the rightwing becomes a subject of daily discussion.

The Central Committee of the KKE does believe that it is possible to improve and elevate the mass peoples struggle, to overcome the obstacle of the current, or other similar, election law; to defeat the rightwing in an election so that the forces of the democratic opposition may become a parliamentary majority; to take away the government from the rightwing, and to jointly form, with the support of the people and the chamber, a democratic government on the basis of a program which will support a different policy, a policy of national independence and democratization which curbs the high-handedness of monopolies, a policy of economic breathing space for the working people, a policy for overcoming the symptoms of an economic crisis and a policy of economic developmemt for the benefit of the people and the country.

The Central Committee of the KKE considers that any further stay of "New Democracy" in the government will lead to further deterioration of the situation. The "New Democracy" government, a minority government, should not be permitted to continue to handle the fate of the country. It has absolutely no right to bind the country's progress with new agreements with the imperialists such as agreements for its return to NATO's military wing, agreements on bases and for dealing with Greek-Turkish differences and the Cyprus issue under U.S.-NATO supervision.

It is, consequently, a national and democratic necessity to have immediate election proclaimed under the simple proportional representation system and with guarantees for the free conduct of such an election.

5. The KKE stresses that in order to take away the government authority from the rightwing and in order to achieve a democratic turn in the progress of the country it is essential to wholeheartedly support the organized mass movement and to have a more determined development of peoples struggle. No worker should express a spirit of calm and of a passive waiting for the election for the purpose of solving vital issues affecting the people. Workers and employees must struggle from within their organizations for basic pay and wage increases, for their adjustment to the cost of living index, against high prices, against dismissals and for the defense of their trade union liberties.

6. The determined strengthening of the KKE, both in votes and in deputies, is a particularly important aspect of the struggle for democratic change. The class character of the KKE, its ideology, its organization, its cohesion, its heroic traditions, its ties with the masses and its unifying policy, make it an irreplaceable force and guarantee for true change.

More and more democrats feel that there can be no democratic change without the KKE and much less against it.

All workers and all democrats must now accept the truth that if they want to take the parliamentary majority away from the rightwing, if true steps are to be taken in the direction of democratization in all sectors of social life and if there is to be an elimination of the danger of deceiving the people they must give their mass vote to the KKE so that it may overcome the obstacle of discrimination and of having its votes as well as parliamentary seats stolen from it, as is the case under the current election system, so that it may be able to take part in the second distribution of seats.

Overcoming the obstacle of such an election law and the KKE's participation in the second distribution of seats does limit the number of deputies to be won by the rightwing from the second distribution and it is for this reason that it is an imperative prerequisite for the anti-imperialist democratic forces to get the parliamentary majority. Life has proven that only a KKE which is strong among the people and within the chamber can guarantee a firm anti-imperialist, antimonopolistic course for the benefit of the working people.

7. The KKE supports a full cooperation between the anti-imperialist, democratic forces on the basis of a joint cooperation program which will extend to the mass movement and will have its roots among the people. At the same time it does not ignore the contradictions, reservations, hesitations or even the objections of other forces to such a program, nor does it accept the logic of "all or nothing" in such alliances. It considers a firm cooperation between the anti-imperialist democratic forces within the mass movement as urgently necessary and realistic under the current reality, together with a parallel or if possible joint action in political affairs which could go as far as their joint support of a democratic government both within and out of the new chamber of deputies.

The KKE stresses that taking away the government authority from the rightwing will be the result of hard struggle. This will apply more when it involves taking real authority away from the rightwing.

The formation of a democratic government will not automatically mean taking true authority away from the rightwing and the creation of the conditions for a real democratic change. Such a government, however, can guarantee an increasingly more favorable tie with forces for its own benefit and it can deflect the reaction of the rightwing, of oligarchy and of imperialism against expansion of its authority within the state apparatus and against promotion of its own program if it is supported by the developing and organized peoples movement, on the democratic forces and most of all upon a KKE strong among the people and within the chamber of deputies.

8. The Central Committee of the KKE addresses itself to the party's members, followers and the communist youth movement and it calls upon them to go among the people, among the broad masses which seek change and to discuss with them the prerequisites for such a change and the role of the KKE in such a change, to neutralize every attempt to steal votes and to work with all their strength to guarantee it the necessary number of votes which will enable it to participate in the second distribution of seats. They must isolate the disruptive groups which harm the cause of the peoples movement in order to strengthen the party which fights with firmness for the unification of the leftwing and all the forces which support change.

The Central Committee of the KKE addresses itself to all the fighters of the left and of progress, those who belong to parties or who are independent and who fight for a democratic change and asks them to take up the establishment of unity within the leftwing and the forces of change at the base. It calls on them to unite in equality and promote their constructive dialogue within the "initiative committees" at the local level and which are developing at the base. A further development and expansion of "initiative committees" which will enable them to include the fighters who support change will be a basic contribution to the effort for a further unification of anti-imperialist democratic forces and a support from below of a democratic administration which will open the way to radical change.

The Central Committee of the KKE addresses itself to cadres, members and followers of the party and the communist youth and calls upon them to contribute with ever increasing sense of responsibility and fighting spirit toward overcoming the party's weaknesses, toward strengthening its lines and influence, toward an ever increasing opening toward the working masses so that it can respond to the requirements of the struggle for change and the expectations of the working class, the working people, of all democrats and all patriots, it calls upon the workers, the farmers, scientists, men of letters, the professionals, the youth, the women and the conscripted sons of the people to strengthen the KKE with their struggle and their vote because it is the irreplaceable force for the defense of their interests and for change. July 80.

CAGLAYANGIL MAKES STATEMENT ON CONCILIATION ATTEMPT

[Excerpts] Acting President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil made a statement after concluding his attempts to achieve a rapprochement among political parties and groups on the presidential election issue. Caglayangil's statement is as follows:

[Begin recording] Dear citizens, as you all know, the election of a president has remained unresolved for the last 3 and 1/2 months. Therefore, the assemblies are unable to properly perform their legislative and supervisory duties. The Turkish Grand National Assembly is busy with presidential voting or with attempts to gain a majority. This situation once more confirms that there are infinite reasons to quickly conclude the presidential election. The methods tried so far show that elections will drag on if an agreement is not reached among the parties and groups within parliament, especially among the two big parties.

We reviewed this situation, which no one wants to see continue, with Assembly President Karakas, who called on me last week. We decided to contribute to facilitating the election of a president by meeting with the leaders of the governing and opposition parties. RPP leader Bulent Ecevit expressed the wish to meet me on 7 July. We met on the same day. Mr Ecevit referred to my meeting with Karakas and said that he shared my view regarding attempts to seek a conciliation among the parties. He offered his help. I told him that I had decided to make such an attempt. I met with Mr Demirel and told him that I was seeking a rapprochement among parties and groups and asked him whether he would participate in such an effort.

Following the positive result I achieved, I began my activities. I first met jointly with the leaders of the JP and the RPP. Later I met with the leaders of all parties represented in the Assembly and the leaders and representatives of the National Unity Group and the presidentially appointed senators. I explained to them my view that unless a rapprochement is achieved among the parties and the groups, the issue of electing a president will remain deadlocked. I asked for their help. Parties with a limited number of seats said that the greatest burden falls on the JP and the RPP and that they are willing to help facilitate the election. They also proposed practical means for achieving results.

Mr Ecevit believes as follows: It is imperative to conclude this election, since the other mechanisms of the state do not function as long as a president is not elected. Although it is true that the system stipulated by the constitution and the present balance of powers in the parliament makes the election more difficult, we do not consider a constitutional amendment to be suitable. These difficulties should be overcome through conciliation. Since our constitution stipulates that there be a conciliation regarding the person to be elected president prior to the election, the system is built accordingly. In spite of this, no results have yet been achieved from attempts to achieve a conciliation among parties. A joint candidate has not been proposed.

Given the situation, we should determine the preferences of the Turkish Grand National Assembly through the will of the legislators. This method has not been tried yet. Parties and leaders should prepare to determine the preferences of the legislators. Thus the parties, at least the two parties with the largest number of seats, should determine candidates suitable for the presidency through the preference of their groups by reaching an agreement among their leaders or authorized representatives. They should then submit the candidates to the Grand National Assembly in accordance with a program to be prepared. They should accept as a joint candidate the person who is likely to receive the majority of votes. If this method does not yield any results then the parties, or at least the two biggest parties, should meet and decide on a joint candidate. This is what Mr Ecevit proposes.

JP leader Demirel proposes the following: Given the function and importance of the presidency, it is suitable to elect as president a parliamentarian who is a member of one of the parties represented in the Grand National Assembly. A president cannot be elected with a mentality that calls for electing anyone as long as we overcome this crisis. The election should be concluded as soon as possible. However, this necessity does not eliminate another necessity, namely the election of a qualified and worthy person. The impartiality of a president, as stipulated by the constitution, refers to the period following his election. In other words, the constitution does not stipulate that the president be elected from independents but rather that he be impartial after he has been elected. Therefore, it is natural for parties with close to a majority of seats in parliament to try to elect their own candidates. The situation is the same for both the RPP and the JP.

The only way out is to make the nation elect a president through a legal amendment without changing the status or authority of the president. We will thus resort to the source. Only the voters will be changed. There is no need for concern. The election of a candidate who has not obtained a simple majority through the proposed system cannot be compared with the election of a candidate who has not obtained the simple majority within the parliament. The election of a person who has obtained most of the votes cast by millions of voters throughout the nation cannot be compared with the election of a candidate who is preferred by the parties and groups within the parliament. Therefore, certain articles of the constitution and the election law should be amended as soon as possible to enable the president to be elected by the people. These are the views of Demirel.

Dear listeners, my major goal in trying to achieve a rapprochement among the parties and groups was to achieve a conciliation especially between the JP and the RPP. Because of parliamentary arithmetic, I believed it was almost impossible to achieve results from the election over the opposition of one of these parties.

During the meeting I held with all the leaders, I told them that we have not reached a solution that will enable us to immediately solve the presidential election issue but that we have achieved various beneficial results from these meetings. I asked them to meet among themselves and discuss various practical measures and the proposal of the smaller parties to find a joint candidate--partisan or independent--who might receive the votes necessary to become president.

It would not be accurate to say that no results were achieved from these meetings and that efforts were spent in vain just because an immediate conciliation between the JP and the RPP could not be reached. In these meetings aimed at facilitating the presidential election, I made a request of all the party leaders and the leaders of the groups. Recalling that the world and our country are going through a sensitive period and that there are secessionist activities in Turkey, I pointed out the negative image which is being created by the politicians who are engaging in verbal duels while terrorists are mercilessly continuing their attacks. I requested that efforts be exerted--if possible--to conclude an armistice among political parties because of the current conditions. I requested that the government place emphasis on consultations and that the opposition try patience and tolerance. I tried to explain that no one can prove his innocence by slandering others and that the society is being greatly damaged by mutual slanders.

The result that made me most happy was the sincere wish of the government and the opposition for a political armistice. The details of this issue have not yet been discussed. However, my proposal was received most positively and was extensively supported. I hope that meetings in two's or three's or meetings that I might organize will continue in the coming days. New opportunities for presidential elections will be created by these activities.

Dear citizens, I believe that I have clearly explained the aim of my activities directed at a conciliation among parties and groups and the results which were achieved. The result I hoped to achieve was the establishment of an atmosphere of mutual trust and sincerity among our political parties. Nothing makes our lofty nation happier than to see that those with opposing political views have come together to jointly solve national problems. I greet you all with profound love and respect. Appointment of Five Senators

Caglayangil made a statement to the Senate on the appointment of the senators. According to the information from the press and public relations secretariat of the presidency, Caglayangil's statement is as follows: The public and the press have expressed various views at various times about the appointment of senators from the Presidential Quota Group. In accordance with the relevant article of the constitution, it is the duty of the president to appoint the senators within a month following a vacancy.

I believe it is impossible to discuss the issue of whether this presidential authority is also granted to an acting president. Our constitution stipulates that the state constitutes a continuity. Therefore, acting authorities in public services have the same authority as the actual authorities. Believing otherwise will create delays and shortcoming in providing state services. It is out of the question for an acting president to exercise only part of the authority granted to a president.

It is obvious that it is unreasonable to claim that an acting president, who endorses laws, appoints governors and commanders, signs directives, appoints members to the constitutional court and, when necessary, the prime minister and the ministers chosen by him, in turn, chairs the Council of Ministers and the National Security Council and who is opposed by no one in fulfilling these tasks, cannot appoint senators from the Presidential Quota Group. Therefore, no acting president is authorized to act in a way that will create suspicion regarding the duties of an acting president.

It is necessary to fulfill this power granted to presidents within the one month period stipulated by the constitution. However, I found it appropriate to delay the appointment of the senators until I concluded my attempts to find grounds for rapprochement among political parties and groups. Had we reached a definite result that would have enabled us to reach an immediate solution, I would have waited longer. However, it is clear that the results of our interparty contacts do not create such a possibility for the time being. Therefore, I appointed the five senators today. I hope that they will be successful in their work for our nation.

FOREIGN MINISTER MAKES STATEMENT ON RETURN FROM BULGARIA

[Text] Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen returned to Turkey by air at midnight last night after completing an official 3-day visit to Bulgaria. In a statement to the TRT at Istanbul Yesilkoy Airport, Erkmen said that all aspects of his visit were favorable and that important decisions were taken that will benefit both countries.

The foreign minister pointed out that determined and speedy steps were taken, especially to further develop cooperation in all fields. He said that during his bilateral talks with Bulgarian Foreign Minister Mladenov they agreed on the development of their economic relations with a dynamic balance and on the establishment of joint intallations in certain fields.

Erkmen also noted that they agreed to organize a maritime line between the Bulgarian port of Burgas and Trabzon.

MINISTERS, NEWSPAPER COMMENT ON SECURITY OPERATIONS

Defense Minister Birincioglu

[Text] National Defense Minister Ahmet Ihsan Birincioglu said that an operation was necessary in Fatsa [where 390 people have been detained] and that operations of this type will continue. Birincioglu, who was inspecting military units in the Marmara region, replied to reporters' questions on anarchic incidents in Bandirma. Noting that anarchy was mounting in Turkey, Birincioglu said that the nests of anarchy have been identified and that the struggle against anarchy is continuing within the framework of the constitution and the laws.

Noting that the government does not wish to go beyond legal bounds and that the struggle is continuing within the law, Birincioglu said: We wish to continue this struggle within this framework in order to ensure democracy. If those creating the anarchic incidents wish to take advantage of the stand and behavior of the security forces by adopting a more grave stand, then, of course, there is a limit to tolerance. We hope that they will not confront us with such a difficulty. Fatsa is an example.

Interior Minister Gulcugil

[Text] Interior Minister Mustafa Gulcugil has said that security forces are courageously combating anarchy and that the sources of anarchy are being eliminated. Speaking to reporters in Antalya, Gulcugil said that the deficiencies of the security forces have been overcome in the last 8 months, that divisions and differences of views within the forces have been eliminated and that the forces have since been strengthened. Noting that the security forces that were on the defensive 8 months ago are now on the offensive, Gulcugil added that the roots of anarchy will soon be eradicated.

Pointing out that the sources and perpetrators of anarchy have been identified, Gulcugil added: When we assumed power these sources had not yet been identified. The state was combating an unknown enemy: anarchy. Only those apprehended were identified. The intelligence organization was not functioning. The state forces were not well coordinated. Today all state forces are functioning in coordination. The National Intelligence Organization, the gendarmerie and the security forces are combating anarchy and terror in concert.

In reply to a question, Gulcugil said the Corum incidents were a plot designed by the left which was aimed at destroying the state. He added that a rightist group, thinking it was supporting the state, confronted the leftists. Gulcugil continued: In reality it is the leftist group that has political goals and targets. This group has tried to divide the Turkish people and the nation and to instigate them to act against the state by exploiting sectarian differences in the region. Today the state is powerful and is in control of the situation. Noting that the incidents in Fatsa, Camas and Aydin were similar to the Corum incidents, Gulcugil said that the security forces have restored peace and that the culprits have been apprehended. He added that the strength and power of the state has been demonstrated.

CUMHURIYET Editorial

NC101139 Istanbul CUMHURIYET in Turkish 9 Jul 80 pp 1,9

[Unattributed commentary from "The Truth Behind the Events" column]

[Text] Whenever a bloody incident occurs officials lose no time in making this classic statement: "Peace and tranquillity have returned to the town. Military units have reestablished authority in the area. The security forces are in control of the situation."

The aim of such statements is obvious. They intend to pacify and boost the morale of their fellow countrymen waiting near their radios and televisions. They have to say something in order to gain time. It is obvious, however, that such statements will not change anything and that no one will come back to life after condolences are sent.

Recent events in Corum have drawn attention to a striking truth. The chasms that are growing wider and wider in our country are forcing the nation and the people into various hostile camps. As things stand, events are expected to grow in intensity and the minority government will be unable to cope with the situation.

The Turkish Armed Forces, which are the greatest guarantor of the state of the Turkish Republic, are gradually being compelled to shoulder more internal than external responsibilities. This is thought provoking. Can any army, which, in view of the present crises in the Middle East, Cyprus and the Aegean has to be in a constant state of "vigilance," undertake increasing responsibility for internal affairs? If the army is involved in defending the country from foreign forces, how can it simultaneously perform both its internal and external security duties?

Was the nationalist front movement--so unnecessarily organized at home in 1975 soon after the 1974 Cyprus landing--intended to bring about a polarization and to undermine our foreign defense strength?

Following every militant action of conflict the prime minister of the minority government has developed the habit of putting the "communists" into the dock and of levelling accusations against the RPP. Who plotted the incidents in Kahramanmaras or Corum? All these incidents should be thoroughly investigated and the truth should be uncovered. The identity of those who seek to push Turkey into the abyss of blood and fire must be detected because the increasing number of incidents in our country can only satisfy those who wish to turn our armed forces into an instrument for safeguarding internal security only. The present state of affairs is the harbinger of serious events. Those who are under the illusion that they can get somewhere by obstructing the parliament and preventing the election of a president, as well as by involving the armed forces in internal politics and the increasing tension associated with it, are doing the worst damage to the state of the republic in its history.

TERRORISTS KILL JUDGE, JP PARTY OFFICIAL

Zile District Judge

DELEGATE YIGIT ADDRESSES ISLAMIC CONFERENCE ON MIDDLE EAST

TA131050 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 13 Jul 80

[Text] The extraordinary conference of the Islamic countries' foreign ministers, which lasted 2 days, ended in Amman today. Ambassador Ozdemir Yigit, Turkish Foreign Ministry secretary general, who represented Turkey at the conference, addressed the meeting yesterday. In his speech, Yigit said that a just, lasting and comprehensive solution to the Middle East problem can only be reached through the direct participation of the pertinent sides, including the PLO, in the peace process. Pointing out that the Palestinian people should be accorded their legitimate national rights and goals, including the right to establish their own state, in a bid to settle the Middle East problem, Yigit noted that the Jerusalem issue constitutes the vital and moral factor of this conflict.

The delegations that attended the conference on Palestine and Jerusalem have begun to leave Amman. The decisions made during the conference will be announced by Islamic Conference Secretary General Habib Chatti in a news conference today.

DELEGATION LEAVES FOR ECONOMIC TALKS IN HUNGARY

TA130753 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 0600 GMT 13 Jul 80

[Text] A delegation headed by State Minister Ekrem Ceyhun left for Budapest today to attend the third round of the joint Turkish-Hungarian economic cooperation committee. The further development of economic relations between the two countries within the framework of the economic cooperation agreement between Turkey and Hungary will be discussed during the meetings, which will begin today. The talks will seek possibilities for joint production in the fields of medicine, light bulbs, railways and water purification and will deal with the possibilities for cooperation in highway transportation.

IRAN RAILWAY SERVICES RESUME UNDER MILITARY PROTECTION

MOCK REELECTED EUROPEAN DEMOCRATIC UNION CHAIRMAN

[Summary] In his capacity as chairman of the European Democratic Union [EDU] Alois Mock, chairman of the Austrian People's Party, opened the third EDU party leaders conference at Klesheim Palace near Salzburg on the morning of Friday, 11 July. Prominent participants in the EDU meeting include CSU Chairman Franz Josef Strauss, CDU Chairman Kohl, South Tirolean People's Party Chairman Magnago and Lord Soames, chairman of the British Conservative Party.

Mock was unanimously reelected EDU chairman for a period of 2 years. In his accountability report on the EDU's work, Mock stressed that the EDU is more than merely a group of parties linked by their common opposition to socialism, namely, a community striving for a certain social system in the European states. "The policy of detente advocated by the EDU must be marked by realism and skepticism," he said.

LE MONDE: USSR MAKES 'UNDENIABLE CONCESSION' ON MBFR

[Bernard Guetta dispatch: "Moscow Has Made Two Concessions to the West"]

[Text] Vienna--There was a revival of interest in the Vienna MBFR negotiations on Thursday, 10 July. On behalf of the socialist countries which are "direct participants" (note), (the countries taking part in the MBFR talks are divided into two categories: the first comprises the states directly concerned by the negotiations, namely, the United States, Canada, Britain, the FRG, Belgium, Luxembourg and the Netherlands for NATO; the USSR, the GDR, Czechoslovakia and Poland for the Warsaw Pact. The second comprises so-called peripheral states: Turkey, Greece, Italy, Denmark and Norway for NATO; Hungary, Romania and Bulgaria for the Warsaw Pact). The Soviet delegation put forward two new proposals described as "great concessions" and presented as the direct fruit of the recent talks in Moscow between Mr Brezhnev and Mr Schmidt.

The first proposal apparently consists of a simultaneous withdrawal of 20,000 Soviet troops and 13,000 American troops in an initial phase which would only concern U.S. and Soviet troops. The second proposal relates to the thorny question of the modifications which could be made to the national division of forces within each of the two alliances once agreement on an all-embracing ceiling common to the Warsaw Pact and NATO has been achieved in the second phase.

Hitherto the Eastern bloc countries had been demanding that this division should not be modifiable. This viewpoint was opposed by the Western countries anxious to maintain full freedom in organizing their forces. The "compromise" submitted by Soviet Ambassador Tarasov to his interlocutors "on the one hand, satisfies," to quote his statements, "the Warsaw countries' desire to prevent unrestricted development of each country's forces and, on the other hand, does not impose any individual restriction on specific countries...."

This rather obscure statement was not really explained by Mr Tarasov, who above all stressed the second part of the sentence--the part which would satisfy the West's wishes. It seems, however, that the Soviet "compromise" is inspired by an idea put forward a long time ago in high places in Bonn. The idea is apparently to adopt the principle that no country could contribute more than 50 percent of the total ground forces in the alliance to which it belongs in the zone concerned. The two states for which this plan is intended are the FRG and the Soviet Union, which respectively have more than half the NATO and Warsaw Pact forces in Central Europe. In this connection it should be noted that the FRG's military power is one of the East's main concerns in the MBFR negotiations.

Different Estimates

This information,obtained from a realiable source, still has to be confirmed. If it were to be confirmed, however, the initiative which the USSR has just taken would no longer simply stem from a desire to stress once more--after the more flexible stance taken on the Euromissiles question--the usefulness of Mr Schmidt's visit in particular and of direct dialogue between West Europe and the USSR in general. Its aim would be to consecrate Moscow and Bonn as privileged interlocutors not simply in East-West trade but also in the military sphere.

Regarding the first of the Soviet proposals made on Thursday, Mr Tarasov specified that his country is no longer asking the West to take account of the unilateral withdrawal of 20,000 Soviet soldiers announced by Mr Brezhnev in Berlin on 6 October. Mr Tarasov did of course point out that the Soviet proposals nonetheless amount to a total withdrawal of 40,000 men, but the concession made to the West is undeniable. Indeed NATO was refusing to take account of the decision announced in Berlin in the Vienna negotiations since, being unilateral, its permanence is by no means guaranteed.

Although this point of disagreement has been removed, differences between the two alliances on the Warsaw Pact's current strength--955,000 men according to the West, 805,000 according to the East--remain, according to a NATO spokesman, despite a new exchange of figures. For the Western countries which will make a detailed examination of the Soviet proposals, this difference in estimates continues to prevent real progress in negotiations.

Whatever the consequences of this new development in Vienna, Moscow has just demonstrated once again its readiness to engage in dialogue with Europe and to consolidate detente on the continent, which should, according to the Kremlin, in no way suffer by the occupation of Afghanistan. The press in the people's democracies, more directly even than the Soviet press, continually repeat that this is clearly in West Europe's interests and that its leaders are showing this by refusing to align with Washington's policy.

AUSTRIAN FOREIGN MINISTER REJECTS NATO AID

[Special DIE PRESSE report: "NATO: In the Event of Austria's Being Attacked--Marching In"]

[Text] Vienna--NATO armed forces would march into Austria should the country be attacked by the Warsaw Pact states. This was stated on Friday by NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns at a meeting of the "Swiss Civic Society" in Muerren (Switzerland). Before the same forum on Thursday, Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr had outlined Austria's policy of neutrality.

Asked whether the airspace of the neutral states Austria and Switzerland did not drive a wedge into the defense potential of the West European countries, Luns declared that this is one way of looking at things, but added: "If the Soviets were to attack Austria and Austria could put up resistance for 3 or 4 days, then NATO would have time enough to prepare itself. In such a case, Austria would have to side with those states that have marched in with their troops." [as published]

The NATO secretary general described Switzerland as a country with a very good defense, which constituted a "hard nut" to crack for the Warsaw Pact armies.

Austrian Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr told DIE PRESSE on Friday night that he had neither heard Secretary General Luns' lecture nor read its text, so he could not comment in detail. He added that there is one thing, however, that he could say: "We are taking care of our security ourselves, we do not need anyone else for that."

"Austria has no intention of siding with anyone," the minister said. But, "if we are attacked we will seek support and aid wherever we can find it."

DER SPIEGEL: BELGIUM THREATENS TO BECOME WEAK LINK IN NATO

DW150747 Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German 7 Jul 80 p 104

[Article entitled: "Chained"]

[Text] NATO partner Belgium has notified the alliance of the departure of its armed forces.

NATO Supreme Commander William Rogers, four-star general from the United States with headquarters at Casteau near Brussels, received mail from the Belgian capital. The ground and air forces of the Kingdom of Belgium, the American learned, are no longer ready for combat.

Rogers was concerned. A German NATO officer said: "We have never seen anything like this here before."

In any event the small kingdom of King Baudouin thereby has become a dangerous weak spot of the Atlantic alliance, and the Belgians now have been permanently branded within NATO as politically unpredictable and militarily unreliable. Since last December they have kept the NATO partners waiting for a decision on whether Belgium will ultimately be prepared to station some of the projected new medium-range weapons of NATO.

The coalition government of Christian Democrat Wilfried Martens, however, has been playing for time from the outset. To begin with it requested a respite of 6 months; when this expired they said that they wanted to wait for the results of the Schmidt visit to the Kremlin first.

The behind-the-scenes irritation in the alliance over the Belgians turned into outright ire when Prime Minister Martens last month put the axe to the Belgian defense budget.

For the sake of limiting the budget deficit to DM4.5 billion this year a budget cut of 2.2 percent was imposed on all ministries, including the Defense Ministry. But just like all other NATO partners the latter had just undertaken to increase its defense expenditures by 3 percent.

Outraged NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns personally called on the Belgian head of government and appealed to the latter's alliance solidarity. Defense Minister Charles Poswick even threatened to resign: "I refuse to play the role of a bankruptcy administrator of the army."

But Martens remained firm: The armed forces must do this year with about DM100 million less. In February the states demanded an additional DM50 million to offset increased fuel costs. Now gasoline must be saved, and the army alone must save 40 percent.

The unilateral disarmament measure of the Belgian Government is a blow to all branches of the armed forces. Minister Poswick said bitterly: "One can say that our army's preparedness for combat has been called into question."

The Belgian military fear that due to the savings budget, necessary troop transports, artillery movements and tank exercises will no longer be financed, and the Belgian 62,000-man army, of which 25,000 soldiers are stationed in the Federal Republic, will not be mobile.

The blow will be equally hard for the air force which is equipped with American "Starfighters" and French "Mirages." The savings order will force some wings to discontinue permament standby for an alert.

The flight hours of Belgian pilots will be cut radically. NATO prescribes to all pilots a minimum of 180 flight hours a year, but the Belgian comrades will hardly be able to achieve 120 hours.

Belgium's fliers already cannot take part in the firing exercises in Solenzare, Corsica--a part of training with arms that has been considered indispensable so far.

The navy has been also chained. It cannot even take part in inte national maneuvers, and it must drastically cut its own training programs.

Despite all the necessary savings methods the Belgians have not lost their sense for the significant. There is still enough fuel for those minesweepers who are supposed to protect the fishing grounds of the local fishermen against the Dutch competition.

Belgian Defense Minister

WA141500 Brussels LE SOIR in French 5 Jul 80 p 2

[Excerpts] Minister of National Defense Charles Poswick has asked for a 15 percent increase in the defense budget so that the Belgian forces could fulfill their obligations. He confirmed that the Belgians, because of lack of money, will not participate in NATO naval maneuvers. He clarified the point by saying: "It is not only a question of naval maneuvers, but also of ground and air exercises. I brought this to the prime minister's attention."

SCHMIDT, GISCARD DISCUSS RESULTS OF BONN TALKS

[Unattributed report: "Mr Schmidt: Providing a Counterbalance to Soviet Power"]

[Text] At the end of the 36th French-German summit on Friday, 11 July, Chancellor Schmidt stated in particular: "I would like to stress my particular approval of the French president's statements on French-German cooperation which is aimed at strengthen-European awareness and cohesion and at making a more effective contribution to maintaining a military balance in Europe and the world and to peace.... France and the FRG agree that an appropriate counterbalance to the Soviet Union's extraordinary power should be created in Western Europe."

The chancellor "expressly welcomed" the "modernization" of the French "deterrent force." He recalled that France and the FRG seek "common goals" in the defense sphere with means which are not identical. The FRG, he said, is not a nuclear power and does not intend to become a nuclear power but is continuing to make a "major and greatly appreciated contribution" to the Atlantic alliance's conventional forces.

Mr Giscard d'Estaing: Europe Does Not Aim To Become a Superpower

For his part, Mr Giscard d'Estaing said: "I do not think that Europe aims to become what is called a superpower. Moreover the definition of a superpower is taken from the post-war military vocabulary....If by that you mean that Europe's voice should and can be clearly heard in major world debates and in major world affairs I think that is true."

In reply to questions the president of the republic added in particular: "The visit to Moscow by the FRG chancellor and Genscher was not only useful but necessary. Just imagine the situation of tension which would now prevail in the world and the extent to which Europe would be absent from the debate if the two main current issues had not been discussed in the two successive sets of talks which I had with Mr Brezhnev in Warsaw and which the chancellor and Mr Genscher had in Moscow."

With regard to French-German relations he stated: "The task which must be accomplished is that of realizing our common destiny, in other words our awareness of the common nature of events which could affect our peoples' lives. This should lead us to two types of action: On the one hand taking concerted action in a systematic and regular way in the face of all events taking place in the world and, on the other hand, working together to make Europe's voice heard in proposing solutions and suggesting action related to these events."

Questioned on the possibility of negotiations with the USSR on the deployment of the Euromissiles, Mr Giscard d'Estaing recalled that France is not directly involved and said: "With regard to the new wording given by Mr Brezhnev to the conditions governing the opening of negotiations I note that the absence of preconditions means that there are, in fact, two factors in this situation: pursuing the programs for the production and development of Soviet medium-range weapons, the (Soviet) SS-20 missiles and the implementation of the NATO decision on modernizing theater nuclear weapons. What then is the object of the negotiations? It would be to fix a ceiling for this type of weapon."

Schmidt on Ties With Giscard

[Unattributed report: "FRG Chancellor Mentions the Existence of a 'Common Foreign Policy' in Europe"]

[Text] It was a reserved man who does not burden himself with eloquence or clever remarks and who clearly does not have to use deduction to consolidate the popularity he enjoys in the FRG who appeared on the French television Channel Three program "Les Grands Temoins" devoted to Mr Helmut Schmidt on Friday, 11 July.

The interview, which dealt mainly with international affairs, concentrated above all on European defense and French-German relations. "I see no danger at all of Europe being neutralized," Mr Helmut Schmidt stated in particular. "Neither France nor Germany would accept any such thing, nor would Britain. It is impossible and inconceivable."

While recognizing Europe's shortcomings ("the entry of Britain, Denmark and Ireland into this community has not yet been fully assimilated"), the chancellor stressed the new existence of a "common foreign policy" among the member countries. "This cooperation," he specified, "will certainly be extended to common strategic analyses in the future, but I am not in favor of drawing conclusions on the military plane at this stage....In actual fact the fundamental idea of a common European defense system exists quite clearly: France, like Germany, is a member of the North Atlantic pact."

With regard to his relations with President Giscard d'Estaing, Mr Schmidt mentioned the work they did together in the early seventies, when they were both economy ministers--work which enabled them "to avoid many blunders which could have been made in monetary policy at the world level." "There is no romance between President Giscard and I," he added, "but simply friendship between two men who have very different national tasks but who know that France's and Germany's well-being depends, among other things, on good relations between these two states."

GENSCHER COMMENTS ON MOSCOW TRIP, CHRISTOPHER VISIT

[Text] Bonn--The recent visit by Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt to Moscow and the Soviet reaction to NATO's two-part decision of last December were the central topics of the talk at a meeting here Monday between Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and American Deputy Secretary of State Warren Christopher. Christopher was accompanied by prominent U.S. experts on Europe and disarmament.

Genscher stressed in a Deutschlandfunk interview that the clear and firm attitude taken by the member states of the Western alliance had led to the federal chancellor and he hearing in Moscow a Soviet reaction which is now being examined seriously and constructively in the alliance. All those who believed that negotiations would not be reached if the West struck to the decision to counterarm and the offer of negotiations have been proved wrong. Only close cooperation between Europeans and Americans offers the preconditions for being able to achieve in Europe a balance at as low an arms level as possible.

The federal foreign minister confirmed his view that Moscow's reaction has to be examined thoroughly and constructively. Genscher said: "The visit by the American deputy secretary of state to Bonn is within the framework of this process of consultation and examination." "This shows, moreover, that like us the United States is interested in arriving by means of consultations at common views and consequently also at joint actions by the alliance."

On Soviet Disarmament Proposals

[Excerpts] Bonn--In the German and American view the West's position with regard to Moscow's latest disarmament proposals should be fixed in September if possible. This was the unanimous opinion expressed in Bonn today, stated sources attending the exchange of views between Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Warren Christopher. Genscher announced the Federal Government's interest in the possibility of the close consultations with Washington being continued in order to examine "constructively and seriously" Moscow's reaction to the NATO two-part decision on counterarming and the negotiations proposal.

With this reference to the need for careful examination Genscher was replying to pressure from the Soviet side for a reply to their latest proposal on disarmament. In a Deutschlandfunk interview, the federal foreign minister drew attention to the fact that the Soviet Union had, nevertheless, not reacted to the proposal of negotiations made by the Western alliance last December until the chancellor's visit to Moscow on 30 June and 1 July.

In his talk with Christopher, Genscher stressed the importance of a clear Western attitude which has to be characterized by firmness and the will to negotiate. He said that these positions are all the more credible the more the attitude of the European and U.S. alliance partners concur. The foreign minister gave the assurance that the Federal Government is resolved to continue strengthening by means of its policy the European-U.S. and German-U.S. basis of the Atlantic alliance. This was indispensable for balance and security in Europe and for all efforts for detente, arms control and disarmament.

After Genscher's departure, who was accompaning Federal President Karl Carstens on the state visit to Portugal, Secretary of State Gunther van Well took over the leadership of the German delegation in the afternoon. An exchange of views between Christopher and Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt was not planned.

On Madrid CSCE

DW150717 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0523 GMT 14 Jul 80

[Heribert Schwan interview with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher in Bonn--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Austrian Chancellor Kreisky said in a Deutschlandfunk interview the other day that after the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan and in view of the difficulties in East-West relations it is hard to imagine that the Madrid CSCE followup conference in November this year will be held at all. What do you think?

[Answer] The process of negotiations between East and West and other states initiated by the Helsinki Final Act, the CSCE process in which we will have a followup conference in Madrid in the fall, is not a fine weather affair but a long process conceived on a long-term basis in which all problems must be discussed: The questions concerning humanitarian alleviations, the questions of economic cooperation, the observance of the principles of the Final Act--and in that respect Afghanistan surely will be a highly important problem that needs to be discussed--and finally questions concerning arms control and disarmament.

What we plan to do is set up in Madrid a European disarmament conference with the objective of coming to terms on confidence-building measures for all of Europe. This means including the entire European part of the Soviet Union up to the Ural Mountains, so as to thereby offer security against surprise attacks. All this needs to be discussed also in difficult times, hence we agreed with our allies in Ankara on the following: We advocate the holding of this conference. Its thorough preparation between Europeans and Americans is an essential prerequisite for its successful course, which definitely will not be an easy one.

[Question] Will this matter be among the subjects for the talks to be held in Bonn today? After all, U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Christopher will be coming to Bonn today.

[Answer] Surely it will be one of the topics to be discussed today. The other questions involve East-West relations at large and, of course, also the Soviet Union's reaction to the proposals for negotiations advanced by the Western alliance in December last year, proposals for negotiations on the reduction of medium-range weapons, in which field we are facing a considerable Soviet armament lead, and Western proposals on troop reductions inCentral Europe.

It turned out that the clear and firm stance of the Western alliance's member states has led to a point where a reaction came from Moscow which is now being seriously and constructively examined generally in the alliance. This tends to refute the view of all those who believed that negotiations will not materialize if we stick to the December decision on the closure of the arms gap and to the offer of negotiations. These critics of our stance have been proved wrong in the meantime. What now matters is to not only map out but also advocate a common position on these important issues in very close cooperation between the European and American alliance partners. I think that it is quite obvious that close cooperation between Europeans and Americans alone, and not just European positions between the two world powers, offers the precondition for ensuring the balance in Europe and for achieving detente through balance; for achieving this balance--to go by the Western concept--on as low an arms level as possible.

[Question] Yesterday the USSR asked the United States about it, about an answer to your suggestion. The Kremlin expects action now. Moscow stresses that it is now up to the United States to make the next step. Will you try today to clarify open questions with Deputy Secretary of State Christopher? Will the Federal Republic coordinate its action with the United States?

[Answer] First of all I would like basically to stress that the Western suggestion to negotiate was made in December. The Soviet Union reacted to it for the first time on the occasion of our Moscow visit on 30 June and 1 July. I think it would be appropriate if the Western side--the United States and the other partners of the alliance--did wha what President Carter and I stated immediately after my visit to Washington, namely that one ought to examine this offer thoroughly and constructively. The visit of the U.S. deputy secretary of state to Bonn takes place within the framework of this consultation and examination process. It demonstrates, by the way, that the United States is as interested as we are in consultations in order to achieve common assessments and as a result also common actions by the alliance.

[Question] Do the new Soviet suggestions, the MBFR suggestions, result from your and the chancellor's visit to Moscow.

[Answer] I believe that the reactions of the Soviet Union with regard to negotiations on troop reductions in Central Europe, that is MBFR suggestions, are also the result of a very clear, unambiguous and convincing stance of the West in these negotiations. Some of the Soviet reactions which have been mentioned in Vienna now, have been explained to us in Moscow.

I believe that the will we have shown in coordination with our partners to continue talks has certainly contributed to the fact that the suggestions have been presented at this time. As such they are a reaction to the common Western position in the negotiations.

It is unavoidable to realize over and over again that no progress can be achieved in matters of detente and cooperation if one keeps mutually quiet; progress can be achieved only through talking. In these reactions on negotiations on troop reductions in Central Europe it will be important to thoroughly analyze these Eastern reactions.

One thing can be said already: As regards the Western demand that agreement must be achieved on the data problem--a balanced settlement can be achieved only if agreement is reached on the number of Western troops in the Central European reduction area--we will stick with this demand. Only on the basis of reliable figures can we achieve reliable results which will serve the security of Europe. Naturally this includes adherance to the principle of collectivity. In other words: No special regulations can be created for individual countries such as to the disadvantage of the Federal Republic. We must stick with the party principle, namely that at the end of these negotiations a numerical balance of troops in the West and the East must be achieved and not a superiority on one side. It is an insurmountable and correct insight that the preponderance of one side will not create more security but instability--and thus insecurity.

STRAUSS VIEWS FRENCH STAND ON USSR, OTHER ISSUES

[Text] Bonn--According to CDU/CSU chancellor candidate Franz-Josef Strauss, French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing wants "to continue a realistic form of detente policy if the Soviet Union does not pursue a scorched earth policy in Afghanistan, if it stops the eradication of the resisting tribes and refrains from further actions."

In an analysis of his talks with Giscard, Strauss writes in the Union PRESS SERVICE today that it will have to be seen to what extent the French stand has a moderating effect on the Soviet Union's power policy. Strauss says that it will mainly depend on the United States containing this power policy and insisting that the Soviets release Afghanistan from their "stranglehold." For this, the United States needs the support of the Europeans, including the French and the Germans. An individual European country cannot achieve this even if it was supported by other medium European powers.

Strauss says that the French president considers it necessary for the Europeans to acquire more weight in world politics again. But this is not meant as a challenge to the policy of the United States, Strauss says, but as a desire for the Europeans to support France's initiatives in world politics and to share responsibility for France's foreign policy actions. It is intended to lead to the Europeans being a counterbalance to the Soviets in Europe and the Americans stepping somewhat more into the background. Of course, natural limits are set to this policy by the forces present in Europe, he says. How far this policy can be realized in a partner-like way with the SPD under Helmut Schmidt "is one of the secrets of world politics, although one is not precluded from imagining that miracles might happen."

Criticizes Schmidt Moscow Trip

[Excerpts] Bonn--The Union's chancellor candidate, Franz-Josef Strauss, and CDU Chairman Helmut Kohl today in Bonn again harshly criticized Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt's trip to Moscow. Strauss stressed to the press that all assessments of the outcome of Schmidt's trip, that Moscow intended to talk unconditionally about disarmament in the medium-range sphere, were absolutely wrong, nor were they backed up by the federal chancellor's government statement to the Bundestag. It was also significant that U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Warren Christopher had come to Bonn to clarify matters. Strauss said: "He is suffering from the same uncertainty as us."

The Union's candidate for the chancellorship accused Moscow of wanting to split the Western alliance, of separating Europe from the United States and putting U.S. President Jimmy Carter under pressure. Strauss was particularly strong in his criticism of the Soviet Union's proposal to include the so-called FBS [forward based system] weapons, like the Starfighter, Phantom, and Pershing-1 in negotiations. The majority of these weapons are not at all capable of reaching the territory of the Soviet Union. However, Moscow was not prepared to negotiate on the Soviet medium-range missiles, the SS-20 and the Backfire nuclear bomber on the one hand, and the U.S. Pershing-2 missiles and cruise missiles, on the other. The Soviets' ultimate aim here was to bring down the NATO decision on counterarming made in December.

Kohl feels that the visit to Moscow has made the question of the Federal Republic's position in the Western alliance a topic among Western politicians. He had been asked at the recent meeting of European Christian Democrats whether it was conceivable that Bonn was involved in an "erosion" of NATO to which the Federal Republic had for decades belonged as a loyal partner. This was a "dangerous development" and the "devastating effect" of the chancellor's trip. Like Strauss, he warned against the danger to the Federal Republic of getting between the blocs. Moscow had forced Schmidt into the role of a spokesman and mediator.

Scores Soviet Afghanistan Invasion

[Andreas Underberger report on statements made by CSU Chairman Franz Josef Strauss at the Salzburg Klesheim Palace European Democratic Union [EDU] meeting on 11 July, and in an interview with DIE PRESSE--presumably same place and date]

[Excerpts] Franz Josef Strauss, CDU/CSU candidate for FRG chancellor, used his presence in Klesheim to warn very emphatically against going back to a business-as-usual attitude in the face of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. Commenting on the latest Soviet disarmament proposals at the Vienna MBFR conference he said "with this bait, Moscow cannot catch any fish." And regarding the new Soviet ideas about disarmament in the missile sector that were passed on to Helmut Schmidt, Strauss expressly declared that there are no new Soviet proposals. Schmidt created this wrong impression but his own words has shown that the Soviet Union has by no means given up its preliminary condition for such negotiations, namely, the renunciation of the NATO complementary armament.

Swapping the Soviet SS-20 missiles for the NATO "forward based systems" would create a situation resembling a duel over a distance of 100 yards between one duelist armed with a sword while the other one is armed with a sniper's rifle, Strauss said. In a talk with DIE PRESSE the chancellor candidate declared in this context among other things, literally:

PRESSE: How can a reduction of the Soviet presence in Afghanistan be achieved?

Strauss: What matters is not a reduction of the Soviet presence but the release of Afghanistan. Once the resistance there is broken through the use of modern means of mass destruction, once the mountain tribes hve been exterminated, the Soviet Union can reduce its military presence without simultaneously releasing Afghanistan. Thus the crux of the matter is that the Soviet Union renounces the continuation of the struggle, that it at long last stops the daily genocide which is a crime under the stipulations of the Nuremberg War Crimes Act as well as under UN law, and that it releases this country as quickly as possible.

PRESSE: Do you see other means of achieving the withdrawal?

Strauss: The policy of detente is indivisible, and therefore it must also be interruptible. He who believes that the policy of detente is indivisible is making the mistake of regarding it as not interruptible. The Soviet Union must know that it has to pay a high price, over a long period of time, and that the successes it has expected to derive from the policy of detente cannot be maintained.

PRESSE: The CSCE is an essential part of the policy of detente for Europe. How would the position outlined by you affect the Madrid CSCE conference?

Strauss: Our security depends not on the Madrid conference but on the strength of NATO.

PRESSE: Is it advisable to go to Madrid in view of the fact that Afghanistan is affecting detente?

Strauss: This is not for me to decide. But neither the Madrid conference nor the various proposals for a European disarmament conference must be allowed to draw the world's attention to the conference and to divert it from the events in Afghanistan.

PRESSE: That is not a "no" to Madrid in principle?

Strauss: Since the Helsinki Final Act has been signed and the Madrid meeting has been decided on, we, too, observe the agreements--agreements must be kept.

SPD DISARMAMENT EXPERT WELCOMES MBFR PROPOSAL

DW141030 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0449 GMT 11 Jul 80

[Excerpts from reporter Lenz interview with Alfons Pawelczyk, SPD disarmament expert and member of the Bundestag, presumably in Bonn; date not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] The Soviet Union made a new suggestion yesterday in Vienna at the so-called MBFR negotiations. It wants to withdraw 20,000 Soviet soldiers if the United States, as a concession in return, will withdraw 13,000 men from Central Europe. Would that be a step in the right direction for you?

[Answer] Yes, that would be a step in the right direction because the Soviet Union wants to reduce their contingent by a higher number than the United States. That would serve as a systematic beginning.

We know with certainty that the Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact have stationed more armed forces in the reduction area than we have. Their reduction quotas must therefore be higher. Second, I think that one ought to consider the offer to withdraw 20,000 men plus tanks in exchange for the withdrawal of 13,000 U.S. soldiers as being a step in the right direction, because we believe that the Soviet Union must implement troop reductions together with their main arms, that is tanks, while the United States should just withdraw its soldiers because of the great geographic handicap.

We want the United States to have its main arms, such as tanks, ready here so that in case of a crisis only troops would have to be flown in. According to our figuring, the time element involved would be equal for both sides--namely flying soldiers in, on the one hand, and returning Soviet soldiers with their tanks, on the other. So both things are involved in the starting point negotiations.

I would point out that the Soviet Union, in Brezhnev's speech in October last year, not only announced the withdrawal of 20,000 soldiers and 1,000 tanks, but it is about to implement that now. That would be a second matter, so a total of 40,000 would be withdrawn. There are some doubts about how one will figure two times 20,000 in the negotiations. But it is too early to discuss that. Personally I would prefer that there be no unilateral reductions in one alliance or the other. Unilateral measures are not reflected in contractual agreements. He who embarks unilaterally on reductions can naturally bring the troops back in unilaterally again because he is not bound by a treaty.

Agreement has largely been reached already among the states involved in the East and West to come to terms on a conference on disarmament in Europe at the Madrid CSCE follow-up conference in November. This would mean that we would be negotiating on confidence-building measures in the military sector for the first time among all the European states plus the United States and Canada. I think this is required because most Europeans are not involved, either directly or indirectly, at the MBFR talks in Vienna or in the SALT negotiations. These states distrust would intensify since they naturally are worried that agreement might be reached at their expense.

[Question] But on the whole we can see a new flexibility on the part of the Soviet Union in negotiations, be it the negotiations on medium-range missiles or the Vienna troop reduction talks. Does this flexibility come as a surprise to you?

[Answer] No, it does not surprise me. Actually I have never harbored any doubts that both sides are equally interested in slowing down the arms race and in reaching a lower level on the basis of parity. Unfortunately international developments have smothered this common interest. Generally speaking, I think it is a very serious problem in foreign policy that people are very much inclined to push the dividing factors far into the foreground in public argument, in so doing automatically ignoring the fact, however, that important common interests exist, for example, in the field I just mentioned. To me it would be very gratifying if the common interests of both sides were shifted more to the foreground again.

COMMENTATOR VIEWS FRENCH NEUTRON WEAPON ACQUISITION

[Adelbert Weinstein article: "When Giscard Has the Neutron Weapon"]

[Text] Soviet reaction to the French neutron weapon is mild. Moscow is not staging verbal agitation nor is the chief of state being blamed. [paragraph continues]

The reprinting of a L'HUMANITE article in the Russian state papers can be considered a slight reminder, but that criticism maneuver does not hurt anybody.

It is possible, however, that an agitational counteroffensive will take place later on. For the time being the Kremlin considers restraint wiser than a frontal attack. First, the production of the neutron weapon has not been ordered yet. Its introduction into the French arms arsenal will not be possible prior to the mid-eighties. Second, the election campaign has already begun in France. Experience has demonstrated that the Soviets give preference to conservative governments a la Giscard d'Estaing rather than to other political groupings in Paris. In addition, it is quite possible that the Russians are not at all unhappy about the change in French military policy.

Fictitious Mission

The Gaullist Principle "everything or nothing" will be at least somewhat softened by the possible equipping of French troops with the neutron weapon. De Gaulle made the force de frappe the center of his military policy. The strategic nuclear forces were supposed to be the weapon for a nonwar situation. The flying, submerged and bunkered arms systems were meant to hinder France's becoming involved in a war. The French deterrent power was aimed at the destruction of Russian cities, large settlements and densely populated industrial areas. Since this form of deterrence derives from the element of unpredictability--the question of when and where the retaliation strike will take place--this strategy had a psychologically unpleasant side for the Soviets.

Even when De Gaulle extended nuclearization to the ground forces, equipping tank groups with tactical nuclear arms, the strategy of "everything or nothing" remained valid. The mission for their nuclear-equipped army remained fictitious: The Pluto missiles were meant to test whether the enemy would reconsider attacking France directly. But the deployment, housing, material and personnel strength of the French troops did not give this doctrine a chance in practice. The force de frappe would have to be used anyway.

According to Giscard's thesis, the force de frappe is still the center of French security. But if one has an army equipped with the neutron weapon, one no longer depends solely on the big nuclear clubs. French military policy is becoming more flexible. But France will have to pay for this advantage: The psychological pressure on the possible adversary exerted by the "everything or nothing" strategy will be reduced. France's acceptance of a battle in Central Europe indicates that the great nuclear strike is supposed to be delayed. It would be a gain for the Soviets if the French contingent did not contribute considerably to the general conventional defense of Europe.

Giscard d'Estaing's strategic intellectual toying with the neutron weapon presupposes that the French Army will be heavily equipped with many neutron weapons which can be used flexibly. The troops must also be technically intelligent. All this means that France renounces general compulsory military service. Giscard d'Estaing has therefore not shortened the military service time, and he has not touched the present system of drafting recruits. The other problem, the problem of complete armament with neutron arms, needs money and engineering skill to be implemented. It also calls for intense coordination with NATO's military doctrine.

The French president has come closer to the Atlantic alliance's strategy of gradual deterrence. He does not believe that France can look on until the invading troops have reached its borders if the strategy of avoiding war should fail and if a possible enemy should attack Western Europe with thousands of tanks. The threat of using the biggest nuclear club of the force de frappe might have become unconvincing in the meantime. So Giscard d'Estaing wants France to become engaged in an early stage. The question as to where the French troops would find their place has been answered by the president: In front, together with the other allies.

Coordination With NATO

But can France simply adopt the valid NATO doctrine? If Giscard d'Estaing is thinking logically he cannot but reject certain concepts of the so-called forward defense. Corrections in Atlantic defense planning are necessary. France is even entitled to demand changes from NATO if it contributes its neutron weapons to the pact. The first demand would have to be that a real Atlantic concept for the use of tactical nuclear weapons be mapped out. The numerous tactical nuclear weapons so far have been considered as mere auxiliary arms of the conventional forces. They are supposed to be used when conventional defense is no longer sufficient. Under the alliance concept, too, the West would have to be the first to use the atom: as an superdimensional warning shot. It is intended to indicate to the enemy that escalation begins at that point. Granted, the enemy would know that he is being given a period to think things over, but he is supposed to suffer serious losses at the same time.

This operational mode of combat is too schematic. It will not convince anyone, least of all the potential adversary. An enemy like the Red Army will not tolerate being told when nuclear war begins. The structure, deployment and armament of the Warsaw Pact's divisions show that a central position has been reserved for nuclear war in Soviet planning. The Soviets are capable of starting out with a nuclear surprise strike as well as of attacking with a conventional concentration. They want to be able to determine when the battle will be hurled into the next dimension. The Soviet Army has been educated to win victory at any cost. An army that thinks that way and is armed accordingly will not leave the timing for the military use of the atom to the adversary.

Hence, France's closer cooperation in forward defense requires first of all a clarification of the nuclear concepts of all allied armies in the potential theater. The role of the neutron weapon, too, would have to be defined. On the one hand, it may be considered a theater weapon that is particularly effective against armor. Viewed this way the neutron weapon as a system must be deemed part of classical armament. On the other hand, the neutron weapon enriches the nuclear war arsenal. It is necessary to establish whether it will trigger the escalation spiral or not.

Finally, its introduction also requires coordination on the use of Western tactical air forces. The French will probably want to drop their neutron weapons from their future Mirage 2000 planes, among others, directly over the war theater. The U.S. and German air forces, in contrast, are more prepared for attacking rear positions, railroad lines and bottlenecks in rear areas. Thus the neutron weapon demands the synchronization of tactical concepts. What would yet have to be clarified is when the other NATO forces likewise should introduce the neutron weapon. There must be no operational decline in military strength along the central front.

FUTURE OF PHARMACEUTICAL FIRMS IN IRAN 'OBSCURE'

[Excerpts] Tehran--The future of the German pharmaceutical companies in Iran, whose German management was replaced a few days ago by Iranians in the course of an "administrative takeover," remains obscure. After representatives of the German Embassy in Tehran and employees of the firms concerned had little success on Saturday and yesterday in their attempts to clarify the confused situation, a further talk was arranged for this afternoon.

In addition to the general uncertainty there is increasing confusion about what has actually happened. While the pharmaceutical companies speak of "expropriation-like measures," the Iranian Embassy in Bonn has strongly denied that this is the case. The embassy has also strongly rejected an official Iranian statement released by the Par's news agency yesterday, according to which the German pharmaceutical companies have been "nationalized but not confiscated." Embassy Spokesman (Hassan Sarw) told DPA today that "reports of nationalization or expropriation are totally false."

ECONOMICS MINISTER DEPARTS ON AFRICAN TOUR

[Text] Bonn--Federal Minister of Economic Cooperation Rainer Offergeld left this evening for a 1-week visit to Africa which will take him first to Salisbury (Zimbabwe) and then to Maputo (Mozambique). The trip was scheduled to start on Saturday but shortly before take off a security official damaged the minister's special plane through an accidental shot from his service pistol. Offergeld's originally planned visit to the west African state of Niger was therefore struck from the program.

The minister is to have meetings in Zimbabwe with Prime Minister Robert Mugabe and in Mozambique with President Samora Machel. A government agreement is scheduled to be signed in Salisbury on German credits of more than DM50 million intended to be used mainly to reconstruct the infrastructure in the tribal areas of the young, independent state destroyed during the years of civil war. The talks in Mozambique, where Offergeld will be the first member of the Federal Government to pay a visit, are to deal with the search for principles on future cooperation in development policy.

FRG'S CARSTENS, GENSCHER ARRIVE ON STATE VISIT

Carstens, Eanes Meeting

LD141926 Hamburg DPA in German 1836 GMT 14 Jul 80

[Excerpt] Lisbon--Federal President Karl Carstens, who arrived for a 3-day state visit to Portugal this afternoon, met his host, Gen Antonio Ramalho Eanes, shortly after his arrival for an initial political discussion.

According to Portuguese sources, the main topics of the discussion in addition to the international political situation were Lisbon's desire to join the EEC, and a number of bilateral issues. It was learned that Carstens drew attention to Bonn's firm promises to support, despite French reservations, adherence to the "timetable" for entry--the start of negotiations in 1981 and Portugal's full membership in the EEC in 1983. Details of the discussion were not disclosed.

Shortly after his arrival at Portela Airport, where Carstens was welcomed by President Eanes, Prime Minister Francisco Sa Carneiro, Foreign Minister Diogo Freitas do Amaral and others, the German head of state laid flowers at the tombs of Portuguese national poet Luis Camoes and explorer Vasco da Gama.

Eanes gave a festive dinner this evening in honor of the German state guests, who also include Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, in the former royal palace, Ajuda Palace.

LD151045 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2300 GMT 14 Jul 80

[Excerpts] A banquet was given at Ajuda Palace this evening in honor of President Carstens of the Federal Republic of Germany. Jorge Cubanco reports:

During a toast General Eanes spoke of the friendly relations between the two peoples and of their common social, economic and cultural traits. He mentioned the mutual understanding and efforts of the two countries for world peace and described solidarity based on shared attitudes and principles as the main determining factor in the close relationship between Portugal and the Federal Republic of Germany:

[Begin recording] Mr President, although aware of our standing as a small country, we have no doubt that we must participate in the construction of Europe to make it a force for peace and prosperity at a time when economic recession and hegemonic ambitions are growing threateningly. We see the constant and active support rendered by the FRG to Portugal's EEC membership bid, and to its economic and social development, not only as a token of the friendship between our two peoples but also as the result of a correct assessment of the importance of European unity and of the need to even cut the economic and social imbalances that exist in this continent.

We, for our part, seek to respond to this support by pursuing a policy of economic recovery at home and in foreign affairs by promoting to the utmost Portugal's role in inter-European relations and as a link with Africa. We are certain that in so doing we are serving the causes of European progress and security, of human rights, of freedom for all people of the world and of world peace.

Mr President, this is a high point in relations between our two countries. I raise my glass to the further strengthening and widening of the ties which unite us, both bilaterally and within the Atlantic alliance, with the wish that [words indistinct] the place that is ours by right as partners in the Community, so that our cooperation--already a reality in the shape of common European stances--may be intensified even further. [end recording]

President Carstens spoke of the historic greatness of our country, referred in broad outlines to the close and already centuries-old friendship between Portugal and Germany, expressed a great interest in the process of democratization that has taken place in Portugal and declared his commitment to the continuation of the West German contribution to the process of economic assistance to our country.

With regard to international affairs, Karl Carstens spoke of the problem of peace and of the restoration of the unity of the German people:

[Begin Carstens recording in German fading into Portuguese translation] As you know, we also nurture an aspiration. Our country is divided and it remains a goal of our policies to work for a situation of peace in Europe in which the German people may regain their unity in free self-determination. Your country has consistently supported this viewpoint and reiterated its support at the NATO ministers' meeting last June. For this we are very grateful. We are also very gratified at the fact that there is a Berlin Boulevard in Lisbon.

Mr President, our talks this afternoon have confirmed the identity of views between our two countries in the assessment of basic stances on the main contemporary issues. Our two countries are united in the view that the military occupation of Afghanistan is incompatible with the Afghan people's wish for independence, and incompatible with the UN Charter and with the efforts for real detente. Both of our countries condemn the taking of hostages in Tehran and all violations of international law. We are agreed on a stand toward the problems of the Middle East and share the resolve to spare no efforts to alleviate poverty in the Third World. Both Germany and Portugal are members of the United Nations and the Council of Europe, and cooperate within [name indistinct]. We are allies in the framework of the Atlantic alliance that has ensured peace for the last 30 years. We wish to contribute toward the continuation of this peace.

In 1977 your country decided to join the EEC. The process of negotiations has already begun. We wish it to continue and shall do our utmost to secure that the proposals the Commission is due to put forward by the summer of 1981 will rapidly lead to resolutions by the Council of Ministers. EEC membership will be beneficial not only for your country but also for the other member countries. The Portuguese have rendered an important contribution to Europe's past achievements and to what it stands for in the present. [end recording]

The West German president's visit to Portugal at this particular time acquires even greater significance in the light of President Giscard d'Estaing's statements to the effect that the EEC should accept no new members until it has resolved its internal problems.

President Carstens will be visiting the Aguieira hydroelectric power station, the largest undertaking built in our country with the help of West German capital.

SOVIETS DISCUSS PREPARATIONS FOR CSCE CONFERENCE WITH GOVERNMENT

LD141749 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1700 GMT 14 Jul 80

[Text] This afternoon the diplomatic delegations of the USSR and Spain began consultations concerning preparations for the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe which will begin next fall in Madrid. These Spanish-Soviet contacts will fall within the framework of the working trips which Spanish diplomats have lately been undertaking with a view to finalizing the details of the Madrid Conference and, in particular, of the preparatory sessions which will be held in Madrid on 9 September.

Ruperez on NATO, Afghanistan

LD142222 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2000 GMT 14 Jul 80

[Text] Here is a report on the Spanish-Soviet meeting on the forthcoming Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe:

At the end of his meetings with Anatoliy Adamishin, chief of the First European Department of the USSR Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Javier Ruperez said that these meetings had been frank and positive, and that the only stumbling block had been on the decision of the Spanish Government to enter NATO.

Mr Ruperez, who spoke in his capacity as head of the Spanish delegation to the CSCE to be held in Madrid next fall, said that the Soviet Union is not in favor of the enlargement of the two blocs. Nevertheless, the Spanish Government's position, he added, is contrary to the Soviet proposal and in favor, of course, of entry into NATO.

According to Mr Ruperez, Spain's possible entry into the Atlantic alliance is not going to interfere in the CSCE. What could interfere is the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, above all in the early stages of the conference which will be a review of the fulfillment of the Helsinki act. In this respect, Mr Ruperez said that the Soviet delegation is concerned about the criticism which this issue may generate against them. According to Mr Ruperez, a mandate for a subsequent conference on disarmament could come out of the Madrid Conference. [word indistinct] Mr Ruperez, the Soviet good disposition on the subject of human rights, (?a subject included in the conference) [words indistinct] is manifest.

MEMBERS OF CONSTITUTIONAL COURT TO BE SWORN IN

[Summary] The members of the Constitutional Court will be sworn in today. "The establishment of the Constitutional Court, which assumes its responsibilities on 15 July, represents the most important development of the constitution of 1978 and is the most important result of the political consensus between the Democratic Centrists [UCD] and the Socialists after the constitution itself. The negotiations conducted by Jose Pedro Perez Llorca for the UCD and Gregorio Peces Barba for the Socialists culminated at the beginning of the year with the nomination of the nine men and one woman who will take the oath or promise before the king on the assumption of their posts."

The 10 are: Manuel Garcia Pelayo, Jeronimo Arozamena, Rafael Gomez-Ferrer, Aurelio Menendez, Francisco Rubio Llorente, Manuel Diez de Velasco, Francisco Tomas y Valiente, Luis Diez Picazo, Gloria Begue Canton, and Angel Latorre.

AT-TURAYKI SAYS DENKTAS, KIPRIANOU TO MEET IN LIBYA

In his statement, Denktas said that, upon the request of both sides, At-Turayki is trying to solve the problems obstructing the resumption of the intercommunal talks. Denktas said that he is ready to meet Kiprianou in Libya and discuss with him the difficulties and the ways in which these difficulties could be solved within the framework of the 4-point and 10-point agreements reached with the Greek Cypriot side. Denktas also thanked At-Turayki for his assistance.

At-Turayki said his meeting with Denktas constitutes a continuation of contacts previously held in various places and that he is very satisfied with his contacts. The Libyan minister noted that both sides are in favor of attaining a solution and that both sides have accepted his assistance. He said that, as a fraternal and neighboring Mediterranean country, Libya is trying to be of assistance. At-Turayki noted that his government will do everything possible toward this end. He also expressed his gratitude for the welcome he received in the federated state.

In reply to a question on whether his statement signifies that Kiprianou has agreed to meet Denktas in Libya, At-Turayki said yes. [Nicosia Domestic Service and Nicosia Domestic TV in Greek on 14 July both signed off without being heard to mention that Greek Cypriot President Kiprianou has agreed to such a meeting.]

Denktas Briefing for UN Representative

TA151011 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 0900 GMT 15 Jul 80

[Text] President Rauf Denktas received UN special representative in Cyprus Hugo Gobbi and conferred with him for some time today. In a statement after the meeting, Denktas said that this was a courtesy call. Denktas added that he briefed Gobbi on the meeting he held yesterday with Libyan Secretary of Foreign Affairs At-Turyaki because At-Turyaki's contacts were held within the framework of Waldheim's goodwill attempts. In reply to a question, Denktas said that Gobbi did not bring any proposals.

TURKISH CYPRIOT CAGATAY CALLS FOR INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS

[Text] Prime Minister Mustafa Cagatay called on the Greek Cypriot side to resume the intercommunal talks in a bid to secure real peace and said: Otherwise, if it is necessary to make decisions to protect the existence of the Turkish Cypriot community and implement them, then the responsibility will lie with the Greek Cypriot side.

In a speech at the Inonu Memorial during a ceremony in commemoration of the Inonu martyrs, Cagatay said: The Turkish Cypriot community, which established the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus will succeed in protecting and ensuring the survival of its state and fulfill its duty. We trust and believe in this.

Pointing out that the Turkish Cypriot community has relentlessly waged a struggle for its existence and freedom against all pressures and barbaric attacks, Cagatay noted that all the institutions of the federated state, which was established after the peace operation, can serve the community in a satisfactory manner and that the necessary efforts are being exerted by the community to overcome the economic problems.

Noting that while the bitter experiences of the past are still fresh in our minds it is not possible for the Turkish Cypriots to live together with the Greek Cypriots, Cagatay stressed that the Turkish and Greek Cypriot communities can live peacefully in Cyprus side by side under conditions of peace and security and in a bizonal federal system based on the equality between the two communities. Calling for the resumption of the intercommunal talks with the Greek Cypriots within the framework of these principles, in an effort to secure real peace, Cagatay noted that an agreement could be reached within the framework of these principles and said: Otherwise, if it is necessary to make decisions to protect the existence of the Turkish Cypriot community and implement them, then the responsibility will lie with the Greek Cypriot side. Cagatay added that in such a case the entire world should demonstrate understanding for us.

ROLANDHIS LEAVES ON OFFICIAL VISIT TO SPAIN

[Text] Foreign Minister Rolandhis has left on an official visit to Madrid. In a statement prior to his departure, Mr Rolandhis said the main topic of his talks in Madrid will be the Cyprus issue, about which Spain is demonstrating particular interest. He added: During the course of my talks with the Spanish Government, I will try to strengthen Spain's interest and support for the Cypriot people's struggle. Mr Rolandhis will open his talks with his Spanish counterpart tomorrow. He will also be received by King Juan Carlos the day after tomorrow and convey to him a message from President Kiprianou. On his way to Madrid, Mr Rolandhis will make a stopover in Athens for talks with Foreign Minister Mitsotakis.

KIPRIANOU: READY TO HOLD DIALOGUE WITH PARTY LEADERS

[Text] President Kiprianou has declared that it is not permissible for the national issue to be factionalized. He reiterated that he is ready to begin an honorable dialogue with all the parties in order to rally all the people to the national cause.

Speaking at a meeting of Democratic Party cadres in Paphos, Mr Kiprianou expressed his disappointment because, for purely party reasons, some will not attend the 21 July rally. I call on those who made this wrong decision, he added, to reconsider it. The people united in one body should come to Elevtheria Square so that we may declare together and let the whole world hear us that these people are determined to struggle until the end; until justice prerequisites for their salvation are secure; until the fate of their missing persons is ascertained; until the rights of the refugees to return to their homes are safeguarded; until they secure true freedom, independence, territorial integrity, sovereignty, a nonaligned and united state in which all citizens irrespective of origin, will enjoy the comforts of freedom and progress.

Mr Kiprianou said that it is permissible for parties to have disagreements on any issue. However, a dispute on the national issue is not permissible. He added: Unity is imperative and all are responsible before history for its achievement.

PAPAIOANNOU ATTACKS RALLY PARTY, IMPERIALISTS AT AKEL RALLY

NC150937 Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 15 Jul 80 pp 3, 4

[Text of speech by AKEL Secretary General Ezekias Papaioannou at 14 July Nicosia rally to mark the 1974 coup and Turkish invasion anniversaries]

[Excerpts] We are summoned for the 6th consecutive year to this magnificant rally to manifest our strongest protest and shout out: "All the leaders of the monstrous crime against the martyred Cypriot people must be punished in an exemplary manner!" "Fascism will not succeed!" "The Turkish and all foreign troops must withdraw from Cypriot territory!" "Cyprus for the Cypriots!" "Greeks and Turks of Cyprus together in the struggle for an independent, sovereign, territorially integral, federal, nonaligned and demilitarized Cyprus; a common homeland for all the Cypriot people!"

Who does not know that both the juntist-fascist coup and the Turkish invasion are the work of the same imperialist mastermind, namely, the American CIA and the most reactionary imperialist circles of NATO?

Who does not know that with this double crime the imperialists and their stooges in Greece and Turkey aimed at partitioning Cyprus, strengthening the southeastern flank of NATO and converting Cyprus into the strongest NATO military springboard in the eastern Mediterranean and the Middle East?

Who does not know that imperialism is the most relentless enemy of Cyprus, the very same enemy that, together with the Israeli Zionists, has thrown the Palestinians out of their country and aims at imposing its own order of things on the Arab countries and the entire Middle East region?

Who does not know that the imperialists have used and are still using Cyprus as a center for international espionage and military adventures against neighboring and other nations?

This is why the titantic liberation struggle of the Cypriot people joins with the struggle of the Palestinians, Arabs, Iranians and all the other people in the area who are struggling against imperialism, for independence, to shake off foreign occupation and for freedom.

Who is to be blamed for the nonimplementation of the UN resolutions on Cyprus and the lack of any progress toward a Cyprus solution? AKEL does not have the slightest doubt that the main responsibility is borne by imperialism and, particularly, the U.S.-NATOite imperialism. It encourages and fans the Turkish intransigence, because this imperialism pursues the dissolution of the Cypriot state, the partition of Cyprus and its conversion into a NATO military bridgehead.

The U.S.-NATOite imperialism has its bases in Turkey and regards this country as a policeman in the Eastern Mediterranean and an advanced outpost against the Soviet Union. This imperialism would not in any way displease Turkey, especially since it pursues the dissolution of the independent Cyprus state. The stand taken by the Western imperialist countries at every UN debate of the Cyprus issue is indicative of their intentions toward Cyprus. Therefore, it would be an unforgivable illusion and futile to expect any support from the U.S.-NATOite imperialists for a Cyprus solution on the basis of the UN resolutions. The only solution that they pursue and are struggling to impose is their own imperialist, NATOite solution and, what is more, at a Camp David-type conference.

Compatriots, the serious rifts existing in our domestic front weaken the Cypriot people's liberation struggle; they encourage Cyprus' relentless enemies both abroad and at home. It is really a lamentable state of affairs that fills all honest patriots with pain.

In the past few years since President Makarios' death, AKEL has done everything to maintain and strengthen the cooperation among the democratic forces. AKEL has shut its eyes to many things that were concocted against it. AKEL has also condoned the fact that while it was not represented in the government, EDEK was represented, although unofficially. AKEL even overlooked the unfavorable discriminations which have been made against it in the armed forces, the police and the state machinery. AKEL has also made many other sacrifices for the sake of cooperation and for the sake of strengthening the Cypriot people's liberation struggle. With an exemplary unselfishness, AKEL has worked and continues to strive for patriotic unity and cooperation.

However, unity and cooperation are not an end in themselves. They are the means to promote the primary aim of our people which, in the present circumstances, is the liberation of Cyprus on the basis of the line and tactics for a Cyprus solution that were approved and declared by the National-Ministerial Council under the chairmanship of Makarios.

I would now like to say a few words about Mr Kliridhis' [Democratic] Rally Party which provides shelter and political status to the coupists. The Rally leader, Mr Kliridhis, held a pan-Cypriot rally in this square on 24 June.

Mr Kliridhis made a speech and talked about cooperation among the Western, socialist and nonaligned countries on the Cyprus issue. However, he forgot to tell us that it is only the socialist and nonaligned countries which give us their vote at the United Nations every year, whereas the Western countries vote against us or abstain from voting.

The policy of the Rally Party in the Cyprus issue is actually the policy of NATO and the imperialists. Moreover, the Rally Party wants us to abandon our nonaligned policy and join NATO, because the wealthy oligarchy, which is represented by the Rally Party, sees its interests protected by imperialist NATO and is not concerned whether Cyprus is partitioned and wide open to NATO. The oligarchy of wealth, which is expressed and represented in the Rally Party, wants an antipeople's, anti-Cypriot solution that would secure for it the rule under the roof of its imperialist protectors.

The Rally Party and its leader Kliridhis are exploiting the inconsistency of the president and his government to deceive the people and gain their support. If they succeed in climbing up to power, be certain that we will relive the dark days of the coup and the Turkish invasion in a much worse form.

Central Committee Message

NC121109 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 12 Jul 80

[Text] In a message on the sixth anniversary of the coup and the Turkish invasion of Cyprus, the AKEL Central Committee calls on the people's patriotic democratic forces to rally together around what has become known as the Makarios policy in order to block the way to imperialism and fascism, save Cyprus and make it truly independent, sovereign, territorially integral, federal, nonaligned and demilitarized.

The AKEL message says that the anniversary finds the shameful coupists unpunished and lifting their heads while the Turkish invaders continue to occupy 40 percent of Cypriot territory, disregard UN resolutions and violate fundamental human rights.

The message also adds that the anniversary finds the internal front divided because of everyone's failure to comply with the joint line and tactics for solving the Cyprus problem as decided by the national and the ministerial council under the chairmanship of the late President Makarios.

PAPANDREOU DISCUSSES PASOK PLANS IN CENTRAL COMMITTEE ADDRESS

AT141401 Athens EXORMISI in Greek 12 Jul 80 p 3

[Report on the opening statement by PASOK Chairman Andreas Papandreou to the seventh session of PASOK's Central Committee in Athens on 12 July]

[Text] At the beginning of his opening statement to the seventh session of PASOK's Central Committee, the movement's chairman, Andreas Papandreou, analyzed the latest political developments and referred to the "mild climate" and the dangers to the country which are becoming discernible internally and to national, economic and social issues.

He then referred to PASOK's government program which is being drafted into its final form by 25 working groups; it will then go through internal party processes and be submitted to the movement's Central Committee for final approval. He also referred to the great contribution of the international seminar on "transition to socialism" and its positive recommendation for the development of a strategy which must overcome the obstacles which the establishment will attempt to raise in an effort to stop progress toward radical change.

He then referred to the "screen of silence" which has been forced upon the country today through the press "lockout" and the stranglehold over television by the New Democracy government, and he recommended ways for dealing with this unacceptable situation.

In conclusion, he stated that the elections, which will assuredly give our people and PASOK the opportunity to forge a new course for the country, will take place soon because, over and above the intentions of the New Democracy government, the objective conditions which are developing in the country as well as the expressed will of the people will not allow the rightwing to stay in authority any longer.

Antipeople Policy

Referring to the recent changes on the country's political stage brought about by Karamanlis' rise to the presidency and Rallis' simultaneous assumption of the leadership over New Democracy nd the prime ministership, the chairman of PASOK specifically stressed that, in principle, this change is nothing more than a continuation of the very same rightwing policy. This is a policy which continues to be defined by intensive Atlanticism, unacceptable authoritarianism, insistence upon one-sided austerity for the many and luxury for the few, and a total lack of programming, something which is totally characteristic of the rightwing government.

"Mild" or "Harsh"

Continuing, the PASOK chairman then stressed:

A. The clashes within the rightwing are the results of the momentous failures of the New Democracy governments and they are breaking up and weakening the political representative body of the ruling class. Our people, however, do not draw a line between the "mild" or "harsh" rightwing. As a result of bitter experience, the people know that the rightwing, irrespective of its disguises and changes, is dedicated to serving the country's economic oligarchy.

B. The characteristics of the Greek rightwing have been and remain the following:

1. Misuse of the state apparatus which is always being attempted in an effort to erect a state of the rightwing extending into a parastate.

2. Attempts to remain in authority iregardless of the will of the people, attempts undertaken through various unacceptable means and disguises.

3. Absolute, one-party monopolization of the mass media.

4. Development of an unacceptable paternalistic and controlled government trade union movement.

5. Subjugation of local self-governments within the limits of strangling centralism.

6. Full national dependence upon Atlantic centers of power with a resultant one-sided, dependent foreign defense policy.

7. Active defense of the interests of the oligarchy within the limits of a strongly antipeople and promonopolistic income policy, the results of which are particularly felt by the working people.

Referring in particular to the "mild climate" which the rightwing very recently discovered and promotes with the objective prupose of gaining "absolution" for its policy, the chairman of PASOK stated:

We do not question the need to develop political struggle without personal accusations of abuse and, in this regard, PASOK has always contributed to the establishment and preseravation of a "mild climate" in the country.

He stressed, however, that there should be no confusion between preservation of a "mild climate" with quiet opposition, with "absolution" or with giving the green light to the policy of the rightwing government, thus only guaranteeing dangers to the country. The people have come to understand that the period we are passing through today is particularly dangerous for the nation and is particularly oppressive for the working people, the nonprivileged Greeks.

Analyzing the characteristics of this critical and historic moment for our country, PASOK's chairman stressed that unbearable pressure is being exerted by the United States and the "Allies" for our return to NATO and the signing of a bases agreement in 1980. This is because they foresee--and they foresee correctly--PASOK victory in the next election confrontation.

They know very well that there will never be any cession of national and sovereign rights either to Turkey, to the United States or to NATO, which is their objective goal today.

Deep Crisis

He then analyzed the deep and protracted capitalist crisis which is taking on the dimensions of economic bankruptcy in our country and has the following characteristics:

A. High and galloping inflation, a huge gap in the foreign payments balance and stagnation in productive investments.

B. "Liberalization" of the economy which, in reality, means yielding it to the high-handedness of large capital.

C. Total lack of programming.

D. One-sided austerity with the workers in the city and village, the small and medium [businessmen] and the greatest majority of the people as its victims.

E. The strict antilabor and anti-trade union policy and activities of the New Democracy government.

The PASOK chairman particularly referred to the historically great responsibilities of PASOK toward the people's movement and determinedly stressed that the movement's present duties are the following:

A. To put a stop to the trend of accept faits accomplis in Cyprus, overthrowing the status of the Aegean, returning to the military wing of NATO, and making the presence of foreign bases in our country permanent.

B. To continue its pioneering role with greater intensity in our people's struggles against the policy of one-sided austerity, against the anti-trade unionist arsenal of the rightwing, and against the stark exploitation of the workers by monopolistic capital, both local and foreign.

C. To mobilize all of its forces in order to guarantee a decisive victory in the next election which will permit implementation of its program through its strength alone.

The PASOK chairman set forth the completion of PASOK's 4-year government program by the next election as its primary goal, together with completion of the democratic process for selecting candidate deputies and the establishment of its tactics in the forthcoming election struggle. In conclusion, he also set forth as a primary goal the preparation, after very careful selection, of leading personalities who will be responsible for chief positions within the state apparatus after the victory.

The Program

Referring to the movement's government program, the PASOK chairman particularly referred to the the guidelines of PASOK's government policy as they were explained to the people during the 1977 elections. He noted that the text at that time was not a program because it did not prioritize measures, nor did it set forth local programs. In reference to the next election, however, he stressed that PASOK's government program will be ready by the end of the summer. This is a program the final phases of which are being ironed out by 25 working groups. Upon completion it will be submitted to the executive bureau of the movement which will make changes it considers necessary, both with regard to the priority and extent of programs. Lastly, the final version of PASOK's government program will be submitted to the Central Committee for its final approval.

The People Support Us

Referring to the very considerable contribution of the international seminar on "transition to socialism" held at the Pantios Technical Academy under the auspices of the Mediterranean Studies Center, the PASOK chairman concluded that this seminar contributed toward a fuller understanding of the methods used by the establishment on an international scale to undermine and entrap any government which aims at transition toward socialism through peaceful, democatic means. He also stressed the seminar's contribution toward developing a strategy aimed at overcoming the obstacles which the establishment will erect in an effort to stop progress toward radical change.

Finally he said that PASOK will soon publish a book which will contain both the seminar's recommendations as well as its discussions so that all the Greek people may be informed about the problems discussed as well as the solutions proposed during the seminar.

The PASOK chairman stressed, however, that there are certain points which could well be underlined now. In summary:

1. The first rule consists of absolute sincerity. When the people know what they are voting for they will be able to support the government's efforts even though there may be obstacles and difficulties along the way.

2. The first direct measures must have a "fire-fighting" character; they must be aimed at the speediest possible stabilization of the economy. Naturally, overcoming the inherited crisis will, in the end, require direct institutional changes which fall within progress toward socialism.

3. The rate with which basic institutional changes will be implemented will be very significant. This cannot be faster than what the people are ready to follow. Every measure, every change must have the broadest support of the masses. At the same time, it must be sufficiently speedy so that it can bind the country to the path toward socialism.

Radical Change

The PASOK chairman stressed that it is particularly important for us to understand that implementation of a program for "radical change" has the following prerequisites:

1. It must be made clear to the "foreign factor" that the government positions are irrevocable. This is the only way for them to adjust to the new reality.

2. We must locate new supports (on an international scale) which will contribute to our country's course toward socialist change. A considerable portion of PASOK's efforts in the international arena, which has been conducted and will continue, follow in this direction, and I must tell you "that PASOK has achieved considerable success in this sector."

3. Basic condition is for PASOK's policy to be supported by the trade union organizations of the workers, farmers, artisans, scientists and youth.

4. It is equally vital that the small and medium strata support PASOK's policy.

5. This point is most important and it concerns direct and radical administrative decentralization through the development of local self-government, of the first, second and third degree, with important and basic jurisdictions and with suitable resources. In this way authority will pass from the "upper" controlled bureaucratic establishment of the state apparatus into the hands of the people themselves.

He then concluded that only in this way will PASOK's government program become the framework within which the Greek people will develop, with their own initiative and participation, the social and economic progress of the country.

Total Blackout

The PASOK chairman then referred to the total blackout which has recently been enforced on public information as a result of the cessation of publication of the daily newspapers. He concluded that this development clearly and scandalously is helping the government and "New Democracy" because the government has exclusive control over radio and television. This explains why the government not only tolerates but also favors continuation of this unacceptable situation.

He stressed that the governments of the rightwing have always monopolized the mass media and added that during this period the monopolization fundamentally means abolition of the opposition and particularly the abolition of the majority opposition party. He stated that the tactics followed by the government at this moment give the country's political affairs the attributes of a totalitarian regime. Reacting to this situation the PASOK chairman announced to the Central Committee the dispatch of an open letter to Prime Minister Rallis in which he denounces this unacceptable situation. He also referred to the interview he gave to the international press.

He then stated that PASOK will not sit by with "hands folded." We will wage the battle in order to force the government of the "mild climate" to recognize that this country finally does have an opposition. With regard to this effort the PASOK chairman announced the selection of 25 personages of the movement who will undertake to organize our country during the summer and mobilize our people in a struggle for the democratization of the mass media while simultaneously utilizing EXORMIS, to the extent possible, in the battle to inform the people. He mentioned that full details on the mobilization of all of PASOK's organizations in this effort to inform the people will be given by him during the session through a recommendation he will make to the executive bureau.

In conclusion, the chairman of the movement stressed that it is clear that we have entered the final stretch toward elections. Rallis' tours [throughout the country] further confirm our forecasts that elections will be held in the fall of 1980.

"Swansong"

There is absolutely no doubt that the government would like to put off elections until the fall of 1981. This is not only because they want to welcome our country's accession to the EEC but also so that they can close "all pending business" on NATO and the bases.

The deterioration of the economic crisis, however, is happening so fast that, under the weight of repercussions from the nonexistent rightwing government policy and amid the peoples' outcry, the rightwing will be unable to live through any further stay in authority. We believe, he said, that without a doubt the "speeches" of Rallis this summer will be the "swansong" of the rightwing. Irrespective of any situation within the rightwing, however, PASOK proceeds toward the struggle with confidence in its victory. This will be a victory which will give our people the opportunity to set forth the path toward the future, the path which will lead us out of today's huge deadends and which will, at the same time, open the way toward great change and vast reformation.

The Iranian authorities have been informed of the incident and an investigation is continuing.

MILLIYET COMMENTS ON HOSTAGE RELEASE, IRANIAN PLANS

NC141630 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 12 Jul 80 p 3

[Commentary by Sami Kohen: "The 250th Day"]

[Excerpt] Yesterday was the 250th day of the captivity of the 53 American hostages in Iran.

No one knows how or even where 52 of these diplomats held by militant youths have spent the day today. However, the 53rd hostage is known to have gained freedom from captivity and is on his way home. The young vice consul owes his freedom to an illness that has proved to be incurable in Iran.

In annoucing the release of the young hostage, Khomeyni said he was taking this decision on "compassionate grounds." Carter welcomed this decision and urged the release of the other hostages too.

Is this possible? Can yesterday's gesture by the aging and ailing ayatollah convey a political significance?

Naturally, the release of one of the hostages will please the American people and even arouse some hopes. It may even slightly reduce the tense and unchanging atmosphere between the United States and Iran. However, it is yet too early to consider this gesture the harbinger of a change in the attitude of Khomeyni's regime.

Khomeyni believes that the final word about the hostages will be said by the newly formed assembly which has not yet met. However, it is not known when the assembly will debate and finalize this matter. It can therefore be said that the remaining hostages will spend many more days in the hands of the militants.

Khomeyni has been using the hostages in an attempt to realize his political aspirations. At the beginning, the president, the political parties and the entire American public showed deep concern over this matter. They strongly opposed the Iranian revolution and severed all relations with Iran. On the other hand, the Iranian militants held tight control over the hostages in the hope of bringing the United States to its knees. Unfortunately, after the abortive U.S. military operation last April, Washington seems to have actually sacrificed the hostages. Recently, the Americans from President Carter down to the last man in the street seem to look upon the hostages in Iran as prisoners of World War II or the Vietnam war. This has weakened the trump card in the hands of Tehran. That is, both Khomeyni and the youths who occupied the U.S. Embassy in Tehran are now less hopeful that the United States may hand over the shah or comply with the other conditions set by the revolutionaries.

On the subject of the shah the Iranian trump card also has lost its old effectiveness. The shah is in Egypt now and As-Sadat is resolutely determined not to hand him over to Iran. The ailing shah may die there, but the militants and the administrators in Tehran cannot hope to capture him alive.

In view of all this, one wonders what Iran stands to gain from holding the U.S. diplomats captive indefinitely. Surely, Iranians with common sense must have started to ponder this. Similarly, Americans with commonsense must have started to realize that their thoughtless and hostile attitude toward Iran is bound to bring more harm than good both to them and to the world.

NSP LEADER SAYS PRO-ISRAEL STANCE SHOULD CHANGE

[Text] National Salvation Party Secretary General Oguzhan Asilturk has said that his party considers it inappropriate for Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen to have visited Bulgaria while the extraordinary conference of the Islamic countries' foreign ministers was being held in Amman.

In a written statement issued in Ankara today, Asilturk recalled that during the conference, the Islamic countries were once more warned about having relations with Israel and it was decided to sever relations with countries that move their embassies to Jerusalem. Pointing out that having relations with Israel provokes a reaction in the Islamic work, Asilturk noted that, while Turkey does not have a diplomatic mission in several Islamic countries, it is represented by a large number of people in Israel. He continued: This kind of attitude is preventing us from establishing better relations with Islamic countries, which are very sensitive about relations with Israel, and obstructs the full development of our economic relations and deprives us of export markets that would help balance our trade deficit.

Asilturk added that the government should renounce its pro-Israel stand and mentality which is in opposition to the Islamic world and which damages Turkey's interests.

ECEVIT CLAIMS GOVERNMENT PROTECTS 'RIGHTIST TERRORISTS'

TA141727 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 14 Jul 80

[Excerpts] RPP leader Bulent Ecevit has said that his party has decided to file a complaint about Interior Minister Mustafa Gulcugil with the public prosecutor's office. At a news conference in Ankara, Ecevit recalled the statement made by Gulcugil in Antalya yesterday that the Corum incidents were a plot designed by the left and that a rightist group, thinking it was supporting the state, confronted the leftists. Ecevit said: Thus, the interior minister has revealed that he accepts, as forces representing the state, various rightist terrorists whose offenses have been confirmed by court decisions, rightist activists being convicted for their atrocious murders, criminals and bandits. With this statement the interior minister has confirmed that the government protects some of the terrorists and that it benefits from their support. He has confessed that he views some of the terrorists as a support for the state. The statement made by the interior minister reveals that the JP government is biased regarding the incidents of violence and that it is even involved in them.

Ecevit said the government was biased in its approach to "liberated areas." He added: The government does not consider it bad for a province or district to be under rightist occupation. Noting that the methods used in various operations were significant in that they reflected the attitude and mentality of the government, Ecevit said that the state resorted to the help of certain masked persons during the operation in Fatsa and that certain persons were taken into custody with the help of the masked persons. [paragraph continues]

He added that various eyewitnesses and a news agency confirmed the fact that some of these masked persons were rightist activists. Pointing out that the use of masked informers in such an operation was unprecedented in any law-biding state, Ecevit said, a government that benefits from the support of various irresponsible forces and bloody activists who are involved in terror and the help of masked or unmasked informers can not prevent but increase it.

FATSA INCIDENT DEMONSTRATES NEED FOR EFFECTIVE ACTION

NC141719 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 12 Jul 80 p 3

[Editorial by Oktay Eksi: "Fatsa Must Serve as a Lesson"]

[Excerpts] Let us first stress a point: The "state" had for some time been subdued in Fatsa. An administration set up by a person who was elected as an "independent" mayor with the support of some leftist organizations had begun to be influential in Fatsa, so much so that this administration had made itself acceptable to the people of Fatsa through the "people's committees" and through its specific methods of trial and punishment. Let us go a step further and say that this administration had responded to the people's greatest desire for "an effective and righteous authority," and that it had grown powerful enough to push the state authority in the area into the background as it became more and more integrated with the people. This is one of the facts we find when we examine the Fatsa incident. A settlement has to be found to satisfy the needs of the Turkish people by recognizing this reality.

The badly shaken state authority in Fatsa has to be restored and revived. In today's Turkey, Fatsa is just one of many incidents amid the "scandals of liberated regions." Establishing the legitimate and official authority of the Turkish Republic not only over Fatsa but also over all other "liberated areas" in Turkey and carrying out "point" operations in those areas too has become absolutely unavoidable.

The fact that the honorable prime minister must clearly see is that no matter who attempts to destroy the authority of the state, the state must deal with them with equal effectiveness, equal impartiality and equal determination. If he fails to see this and instead resorts to idle words, he will be giving an unsatisfactory reply which evades the truth, as he did when asked if it had not been the rightist militants who had destroyed the state authority in Corum. He replied: "Our government does not protect criminals. There is no reason why the incidents should be distorted." It is impossible to achieve success through such methods because this kind of reply exposes the fact that the honorable prime minister is not yet willing "to establish an impartial administration." Still worse, he refuses to admit that he will never be able to win the support of the people and he will be unable to cope with anarchy and terrorism unless he establishes an impartial state administration.

On the other hand, the Fatsa incident or, to put it more correctly, the way the people living in this district look at the incidents, is interesting. The fact that the people of Fatsa seem to have identified themselves with the "illegitimate authority" formed by the Fatsa Municipal Council and the mayor should teach the administrators of Turkey a lesson, because our people wish to convey this message to them: "We are looking for a just administration which is capable of resolving our issues. We are looking for an administration which will listen to us and which will act effectively."

This message should be heeded before new Fatsas crop up throughout Turkey. Responding to the needs of the fellow countrymen through a just state administration is the only way out of the present dilemma.

KREISKY: AUSTRIA WANTS TO BE KEPT OUT OF ALL ALLIANCES

AU151314 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 15 Jul 80 p 5

[AZ report: "Kreisky on Luns: Keep Austria Out of All Alliances"]

[Text] Vienna (AZ)--Commenting on NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns' statement that NATO would come to Austria's aid should the country be attacked, Chancellor Kreisky said that a neutral state prefered not to be mentioned in such a context. Austria wants to be kept out of all alliances, he said, adding that he does not know what induced Luns to make that statement. Should a state violate Austria's neutrality, however, then this would mean war, and in that case Austria would welcome any aid.

Regarding the question of what attitude the Austrian athletes should take at the Moscow Olympic games, Kreisky said he had merely recommended to Austrian Olympic Committee Chairman Kurt Heller that only those athletes should participate in the opening parade who wanted to do so themselves. No one should be forced to participate.

Asked to comment on the statement by Franz Josef Strauss on television Sunday that the present situation in Afghanistan would never have developed had there been a CDU government in the FRG Kreisky said only that this remark by the Bavarian premier was so tremendously primitive that he refused to comment on it altogether.

Kreisky said that he had heard about a private trip of Egyptian President as-Sadat [to Salzburg] but he did not know any details. Should As-Sadat come, this would certainly be a good opportunity for them to meet, Kreisky said. He added that he himself would perhaps visit Egypt in September.

Regarding the trip to Iran of the Socialist International delegation Kreisky said that it served the purpose of establishing contacts, and in that respect had been successful. If Iran has now released one hostage, this confirms the Iranian assurances that the hostages' lives are not endangered.

Muhri Demands Official Protest

[Unattributed report: "Franz Muhri: Government Must Clearly Repudiate the NATO Impudence"]

[Excerpts] Vienna--Both the earlier statement by Foreign Minister Pahr and today's statement by Chancellor Kreisky on the statements of NATO Secretary General Luns are completely inadequate, party Chairman Franz Muhri stated Monday at a session of the Austrian Communist Party [KPOe] Vienna city leadership. The statement by Luns must be resolutely repudiated for two reasons:

First, it insinuates that Warsaw Pact forces will attack Austria although there are no such intentions whatsoever. The existence of the socialist states is an essential factor for Austria's security and independence.

Second, Luns' statement that Austria would have to side with NATO constitutes direct contempt and an open violation of the status of permanent neutrality. The KPOe demands an official protest by the Austrian Government against this provocation, Muhri said.

BELGIUM

LE SOIR: EUROMISSILE DECISION TO BE POSTPONED

LD141231 Brussels LE SOIR in French 11 Jul 80 p 3

[Christian-Guy Smal report: "'Chancellor Schmidt Has Done My Work Well,' Nothomb Says"]

[Text] Belgian Foreign Minister Charles-Ferdinand Nothomb has just missed two opportunities for travel in the cause of Eurostrategy: It is no longer so urgent for him to go to Moscow, since Chancellor Schmidt has done the job by inducing the Kremlin to agree to negotiations on theater weapons without preconditions; and there is no urgency either for him to go to Washington to induce the Americans to agree to this "concession," since they seem ready to do so.

The rest is a matter for careful consideration and debate. This was more or less the sentiment apparent on Wednesday following the meeting of the Chamber Foreign Affairs Committee at which the minister revealed the nuances of the Belgian stance on the question of cruise missile storage and deployment on our territory from 1983 onward, following the 12 December 1979 NATO decision.

Let us recall that the Brussels and The Hague governments modified their agreement, the former retreating behind a 6-month "moratorium" (expired), the latter reserving for itself a reflection period until 31 December 1981.

Since that time there has been the June Ankara NATO meeting, where Nothomb participated but was unable to announce a Belgian "decision" without upsetting the West German chancellor and especially the Brezhnev-Schmidt meeting of 30 June and 1 July.

It is true that the experts are still arguing about the exact nature of the Soviet "concession" on medium-range missiles in Europe and primarily about the extent of the catalogue of armaments in question. Whatever the case, it now seems possible to begin negotiations, although no conclusion can be expected before ratification of the U.S.-USSR SALT II treaty. On Thursday the senators--slower or more inquisitive than the deputies--were to have a further opportunity within their foreign affairs committee to manipulate (theoretically) our future missile battery.

What then can Charles-Ferdinand Nothomb tell them after his contacts with our accredited ambassadors in the Eastern bloc countries and all our major NATO allies, from Schmidt to Edmund Muskie?

First, some facts:

On the military level the results of the Moscow interview are zero, since the USSR is continuing to reinforce its Eurostrategic armaments at the rate of one SS-20 missile per week. On the other hand, on the diplomatic level there is a palpable gain: by lifting its precondition, the Kremlin is in fact accepting the NATO 12 December decision.

Then an analysis: Why this success for the chancellor? There are three reasons: He had consulted his allies, he was negotiating from a position of strength, and he was asserting a European stance made concrete by an original initiative. Belgium was perfectly at home in all this: Ever since Harmel Belgium has been cultivating defense and detente at the same time. It arms itself, it remains loyal to its allies, but it maintains an open stance vis-a-vis the Eastern bloc countries. Seen from this angle everything seems simple. Unfortunately it remains a fact that Belgium must take a definite decision and that meanwhile the minister's position is increasingly delicate, since he is forced to introduce nuances and subtleties into his explanations.

But what is the government going to do then? According to Nothomb, as soon as he has finished with the parliamentarians (a debate could begin next week in the Chamber, when the foreign affairs budget is discussed), he is going to reexamine the whole affair in terms of a dual objective:

1. To do everything to promote an effective beginning to negotiations on a specific basis;

2. To ensure by his action Europe's participation and influence in determining the basis for negotiation.

And especially, it seems, not to fix any dates, not to aim for any deadlines.

Nonetheless, two fundamental questions remain: isn't the state of indecision in our country going to weaken the Western stance during future negotiations; and can the Belgian Government, taking account of internal contingencies, take the risk of a positive decision?

To the first question Nothomb replies that the main point is to have accepted the missiles in principle on 12 December 1979 (the site of deployment being secondary); to the second he replies that "all governments have their little problems...."

PRIME MINISTER INTERVIEWED ON MIDEAST PROBLEMS

LD151429 Riyadh AR-RIYAD in Arabic 13 Jul 80 pp 12, 13

[Interview granted by Belgian Prime Minister Wilfried Martens to AR-RIYAD Beirut correspondent (Kristel Lecloc); presumably in Brussels--date not given]

[Excerpts] AR-RIYAD: The Arab world is expecting Europe to adopt a more independent stand so that it may become a significant spokesman. But do you not believe that such expectations go beyond reality, bearing in mind that there is more than one decision-making center in Europe?

Martens: In fact I believe that it is right that we should realize that the Arab world expects much from Europe. On the other hand, no one denies that the Mediterranean and the Middle East are two very important areas for our continent both politically and strategically and not just economically.

On this basis agreements have gradually been concluded between the EEC, on one hand, and the Mediterranean states, on the other. There is current talk about concluding agreements with the Middle Eastern countries. We began the Arab-European dialogue several years ago and in this regard the European Council decided in Venice on 13 June to step up this dialogue and to expand it.

In other words, this means that Europe is not quite absent from this part of the world. We definitely hope that Europe will have a more dynamic presence. This calls for strengthening solidarity and cohesion among the member states.

There is no doubt that the Venice summit took an important step in this field since this was the first time the European Community expressed its views fully on the subject within the context of political coordination.

AR-RIYAD: Can it be said that Europe has missed many opportunities in the Middle East because it has not separated itself from the U.S. strategy?

Martens: Certainly Europe has a role to play in the Middle East. It has expressed this stand several times through joint statements (by the Nine countries), particularly in the recent European Council resolutions in Venice which took into consideration the previous statements and added new dimensions to them.

The recent resolution provides for holding contacts with the Arab countries in an initiative in the interest of peace and security in the area. Needless to say, the United States has the potential for a wider initiative and has greater influence in the area. The United States shoulders the major responsibility for encouraging the achievement of peace. We should not believe that any independent action in this part of the world could be decisive, but it is right to say somehow that such action could contribute to finding a solution while taking Washington's policy into consideration. Such action must be systematic and give a new impetus to the peace process that began with the Camp David agreements and should, one way or another, be complementary to such agreements.

AR-RIYAD: How would you explain the negative reaction of the United States, Israel and Egypt to these resolutions?

Martens: Israel's reaction, which was expressed by its foreign minister, was positive at the beginning but Begin's reaction afterward was very negative. The PLO statement was also negative.

As for the attitude of Egypt and the United States, it was in fact positive. We were very surprised by these reactions because they are not based on the basic contents of the resolutions.

AR-RIYAD: Is there a specific danger from a French-German coordination in Europe and how do you see the dimensions of such potential danger?

Martens: We cannot achieve European coordination without good detente between Germany and France. I personally believe that distinctive French-German relations are positive relations on condition that they continue to provide the opportunity for a wider cooperation on the European level.

History has shown us that major powers achieve detente more easily within the European Community and do not reach it through bilateral relations from which the small countries are excluded.

This French-German coordination could harm the European Community and paralyze it. But the member states must adopt their own attitude despite the existence of such coordination. We must, therefore, be very careful in maintaining the normal process of EEC work and not hindering it.

AR-RIYAD: It appears that the European stand today supports Israel less than it used to to. Is it true that this new European stand is due to economic and not moral considerations as Israel alleges?

Martens: I do not know if Europe is supporting Israel less than before. I believe that our countries particularly want to achieve peace in the Middle East. European statements contribute to developing the peace efforts which we expect from both the Arab and Israeli side since final peace can be achieved only if we take into consideration the basic interests of all the parties concerned in the Middle East and inasmuch as each of of these parties exert the necessary efforts.

AR-RIYAD: Why has Belgium so far not allowed the PLO to open an office in Brussels?

Martens: In 1976 the PLO opened an information and contact office in Brussels which enjoys all the facilities compatible with its activities.

AR-RIYAD: Khalid al-Hasan, a PLO official, recently suggested in Strasbourg a five-point plan providing in particular for the stationing of UN observation forces in the occupied territories for a transitional period preceding the establishment of an independent Palestinian state and later organizing a public referendum for the Palestinian people. Can we know what Belgium's attitude toward this proposal is?

Martens: I am aware of the proposals submitted by the PLO representative in Strasbourg but I am not sure that they represent the PLO's official view. These proposals seem to be not quite realistic in the circumstances but are worthy of attention.

AR-RIYAD: The majority of observers believe that the Camp David agreements are obsolete or have reached a dead end. What is the Belgian attitude on the subject?

Martens: The Belgian Government considers the Camp David agreement an important step toward peace in the Middle East, but bilateral agreements should reach a wider agreement including all the parties concerned.

AR-RIYAD: The Venice resolutions called for the need to hold contacts with all the parties concerned. Is it to be understood from this that the PLO and the Soviet Union are also concerned?

Martens: The wording of the resolution is very important. The resolution provides for the participation of "all the parties concerned." The EEC has clearly indicated that the PLO is a party concerned.

AR-RIYAD: What is Belgium's attitude toward the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan?

Martens: The Belgian Government considers the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan as a breach of the international law and a threat to stability in this important part of the world, on which we greatly depend in obtaining our energy supplies. I would like to point here to the Nine countries' resolution in Venice in this respect.

DUTCH MILITARY ADVISER TO TRAIN SURINAME ARMED FORCES

[ANP report: "Military Adviser to Suriname"]

[Text] The Hague, 7 July--At the request of the Suriname Government and the National Military Council the Dutch Government has decided to send a military adviser to Suriname. He is 43-year-old Maj J.J.H. Kooiman from Harderwijk, who will leave for Paramaribo at the end of July.

Major Kooiman will have the task of organizaing the training of the Suriname Armed Forces. In Suriname Major Kooiman will be under the Dutch ambassador's supervision.

The Dutch Government made the decision to send a military adviser to Suriname in mid-June, before Minister Without Portfolio of Development Aid de Koning's visit to the country, according to the army information service.

SCHMIDT STRESSES IMPORTANCE OF NATO COUNTERARMING

LD151632 Hamburg DPA in German 1458 GMT 15 Jul 80

[Text] Bonn--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Bonn today strongly underlined the importance of NATO's counterarming decision of last December.

Schmidt told journalists after a meeting of several hours with Luxembourg Prime Minister Pierre Werner in Bonn that serious negotiations with the Soviets can only be expected if the West leaves no doubt until and during such negotiations that it is as serious about the counterarming decision as it is about the offer to negotiate. The Luxembourg prime minister fully agreed with the chancellor.

Werner had come to Bonn for a brief visit as current chairman of the EC Council of Ministers to discuss topical questions of world politics and of the EC, including the contentious budget problem, with the chancellor. He expressed the conviction that Schmidt represented in Moscow the positions of the West on the Soviet incursion into Afghanistan with urgency, even with firmness. Other topics included the expansion of the European currency system and the role of radio and television satellites in the service of Radio Luxembourg.

The Middle East was also discussed. The EC Council of Ministers on 21 July will discuss the visit by an EC delegation to the Middle East where it will discuss the possibilities of a peace settlement, with the main participants including the representatives of the Palestinian people and the PLO. Prime Minister Werner returned to Luxembourg in the afternoon.

GENSCHER EMPHASIZES TIES WITH YUGOSLAVIA

LD152146 Hamburg DPA in German 1443 GMT 15 Jul 80

[Excerpt] Bonn--Two days before his official visit to Belgrade, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has stressed that the Federal Government attaches great importance to the dialogue with Yugoslavia. In an interview with the Yugoslav news agency TANJUG published today, Genscher stated that his forthcoming talks in Belgrade would to a large extent be devoted to world political developments and their effects on Europe and on the two states.

Genscher stressed the intensification of economic relations with Yugoslavia. He praised Belgrade's active role as a leading force in the nonaligned movement, whose will to independence will have a lasting influence on world politics over the coming decades.

PRESS DISCUSSES PRAVDA ARTICLE ON DISARMAMENT TALKS

DW160921 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 16 Jul 80

[Press review on the Soviet Union's approach to disarmament talks]

[Excerpts] SCHWAEBISCHE ZEITUNG of Leutkirch stresses: So it is not true that the Kremlin has dropped its demand that the decision to close the arms gap must be renounced as a prerequisite for serious arms limitation talks. If something has been moving at all in Moscow, it was, if anything, the price of negotiations--and that has clearly moved upward. In addition to renouncing the closure of the arms gap, the inclusion of forward based American arms systems is now being demanded, which is something the Western alliance has rejected for 10 years. The fact that the Soviet Union goes ahead with clearing away illusions in such an unceremonious way indicates how certain it is that its propaganda has already fully served its purpose by driving the wedge of limited solidarity into the Western alliance.

The following is a quotation from RHEINPFALZ of Ludwigshafen: PRAVDA pointed out yesterday that the Soviets have extended their field for negotiations far beyond those things that concern the Americans and what Schmidt criticized in Moscow as the USSR's superiority in arms vis-a-vis Europe. What has actually gotten underway is the great poker game between Washington and Moscow for the Western aim of achieving a strategic balance and for the Soviet efforts not to abandon their existing advantage in the negotiations. It seems to have turned out that the Moscow signals passed on by the federal chancellor are not free of irritations. Bonn ought to abandon its possible prejudice after Schmidt's visit should a new assessment of negotiating possibilities be involved.

In this connection BRAUNSCHWEIGER ZEITUNG wonders: Did the chancellor, as the opposition claims, apply more favorable cosmetics than warranted to the news of Soviet receptiveness to negotiations he brought back with him? Is there any contradiction between the official Bonn assessment that the Soviet proposals are constructive and the fact noted by U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Christopher that the Russians do want to negotiate, but on something other than what was envisaged? For the time being we will have to wait for exploratory talks on the alliance level and Soviet-U.S. contacts to see what the subject of negotiations might be. Right now the Soviets do not wish to discuss the NATO offer of negotiations made in December last year. Yet despite some anxieties the NATO decision on the closure of the arms gap has had the very effect it was supposed to have, namely inducing the other side to negotiate on principle, the editorial of BRAUNSCHWEIGER ZEITUNG says.

STUTTGARTER NACHRICHTEN notes: It is not unimportant indeed that Chancellor Schmidt has again expressly advocated NATO's decision on closing the arms gap again. Following the chancellor's Moscow visit many Western politicians were already fixed too much on negotiations, arms control and disarmament. At any rate, these were the terms that dominated the discussion during the past few weeks, and especially in some neighboring countries such as Belgium and the Netherlands where the tendency was evident to mistake the East's existing receptiveness to negotiations for Western negotiating successes. It is not surprising that this alarms Schmidt.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE

[Article signed Ein: "Obscuring"]

[Text] The language of PRAVDA is clear: The Soviets have not accepted the Western decision to close the arms gap. They hold to their standpoint that only the strategic situation that existed prior to NATO's decision can be discussed. What looks like a clarification can be a planned obscuring. Henry Kissinger described in his memoirs how the men in the Kremlin play the great game between maximum demands and the final acceptance of minimum gains. The Russians maintain that the presence of the SS-20 of the "Backfire" bombers maintains the balance of forces. The Western objection is rejected that these arms systems, on the contrary, have created Soviet preponderance. So logically every Atlantic attempt to reestablish the balance that has been upset through the introduction of Eurostrategic arms would upset detente. The West cannot negotiate on that basis. But who is the West? Who is NATO? Some 15 sovereign states with dozens of different opinions complicate every process aimed at making a decision. The PRAVDA article is counting on that.

DIE WELT

[Article signed Kem: "The Missile Game"]

[Text] The big fight for the starting position for the next disarmament dialogue by the big powers has begun. The Soviet Union considers it to be mainly a show fight. After Washington noted Moscow's unconditional preparedness to enter such talks, PRAVDA has now argued strongly against any "distortion" of the Soviet preparedness to enter talks. Since the chancellor is out as a "distorter" because to the contrary he was praised for his correct rendition of Brezhnev's position, PRAVDA must be aiming at the Americans.

The demand by the Russians is not new. They have always wanted to make the "organic" cohesion of all American arms systems a subject of negotiations. Why should they this time, when their readiness to enter into talks has been sold quite well to Europe, refrain from "adding up" those U.S. strategic nuclear arms that are already deployed in Europe? The Americans have coolly juxtaposed their own "offensive" assessment of Moscow's readiness to enter into talks. Those things that could follow an "initial" discussion round with the Soviet Union are being assessed rather realistically in Washington. There they are more concerned by the actual aim of Moscow's propaganda which persistently concentrates its fire on a possible break in the alliance somewhere between Bonn, Paris and Washington.

OPINION POLL POINTS TO SCHMIDT, SPD/FDP VICTORY

DW161010 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 16 Jul 80 pp 1, 2

[Eghard Moerbitz report]

[Excerpt] Bonn, 15 Jul--Some 3 months prior to the Bundestag elections to SPD top echelon has made a positive assessment of the social-liberal coalition's chances of scoring a victory. Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt's attraction was also assessed positively. Deputy SPD Chairman Hans Juergen Wischnewski on Tuesday in Bonn warned nevertheless against exaggerated optimism. Based on opinion poll results from early July, he stressed that according to the present mood the SPD has "not yet achieved" its election aim of again being represented in the Budestag as the strongest faction, saying that scoring an absolute majority is an "illusion."

As regards the so-called chancellor question "Who should be federal chancellor?" Helmut Schmidt with 61 points holds a clear lead over Strauss who has 24 points. As regards preference for parties, the situation is the reverse. Had elections taken place on 6 July, Wischnewski's evaluation of the opinion poll shows, the CDU/CSU would still be the strongest Bundestag faction with 230 deputies despite a loss of 13 seats, while the SPD with 222 seats (despite a gain of eight mandates) would still depend on a coalition with the FDP, which would win 44 seats (plus five). The CDU/CSU would have 44.5 percent, the SPD 43, the FDP 8.5 while some 4 percent would support other parties, 3 percent of which for the Greens.

GOVERNMENT SUPPORTS AMBASSADOR OVER SOVIET CENSORSHIP

[Excerpt] The French Government fully supports the attitude of our ambassador in Moscow who refused to censor his speech for Soviet television on the occasion of 14 July. The Quai d'Orsay has just revealed that part of the sppech which Mr Froment-Meurice was due to make--as he does every year--was devoted to international tension, and our ambassador recalled that the points of views of France and the USSR were very far apart on the cause of this aggravation. The French ambassador cited the Afghanistan affair in particular. This passage was censored, and rather than change the contents of his message, Mr Froment-Meurice, justifiably, the Quai d'Orsay stresses, chose not to speak on television.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs adds further: Any other attitude would have given the impression that the French Government had changed its position, which is not the case. The Soviet intervention in Afghanistan is unacceptable and the withdrawal of the Red Army essential. Four days before the opening of the Olympic games, this is a noteworthy incident.

FRANCOIS-PONCET VISIT TO ALGIERS POSTPONED

[Daniel Junqua dispatch: "Mr Francois-Poncet's Visit Postponed by Algiers for 'Timetable Reasons'"]

Excerpt] Algiers--Mr Francois-Poncet's visit will not take place on Saturday, 12 July. Circles close to the Foreign Ministry in Algiers revealed on Thursday, 10 July, that it has been postponed "for technical, timetable reasons." It will take place shortly and a new date will be agreed in the next few days. It is Algeria which took the initiative to postpone the visit.

Algeria's Ambassador in Paris Sahnoun informed the Quai d'Orsay of the postponement on Wednesday and French Ambassador in Algiers Merillon had a meeting with chief of Algerian diplomacy Benyahia on this subject on Thursday. Since his return from Freetown, where he was heading the Algerian delegation to the OAU summit, Mr Benyahia has had a packed program, taking part in a cabinet meeting on Wednesday and receiving UN General Assembly President Salim Ahmed Salim and U.S. representative to the United Nations McHenry, who is on a fact-finding tour of the region.

The meeting between Mr Benyahia and Mr Francois-Poncet was to mark an important stage in the negotiations started at the beginning of the year to settle the points of dispute which have arisen between the two countries since independence. It was to just precede the "final" date of 14 July set by the two sides as the end of their undertaking. This date will, therefore, not be respected.

However, the postponement of the French minister's trip does not seem to be connected with the development of the discussions and does not indicate a crisis or even a resumption of tension. According to some Algerian officials, dates should not be considered "sacred" since the essential point is that the process started 6 months ago is continuing. It is also pointed out that the six working groups set up to study the various points of contention took longer to complete their work than the timetable allowed, finishing on 7 July not 30 June as planned.

PAPERS VIEW OUTCOME OF GISCARD-SCHMIDT SUMMIT

LE FIGARO Comment

LD141333 Paris LE FIGARO in French 12-13 Jul 80 pp 1,2

[Serge Maffert editorial: "Long-Term Action"]

[Text] The visit which Mr Giscard d'Estaing has just made to various parts of Germany and the French-German summit which followed in Bonn are particularly instructive regarding the general political line taken by the French president and that taken by his FRG partners.

Despite appearances, Mr Giscard d'Estaing's visit to the "heart of Germany" was really more a European undertaking than a French-German affair. The president of the republic, with Mr Schmidt's approval, clearly wanted to give Europe a new dimension. The institutional summit in Bonn resulted in Giscard and Schmidt asserting their intention to lay an additional stone in the building of Europe, namely the idea of common security based on the French nuclear force and the German conventional military capability.

The many contacts which Mr Giscard d'Estaing had during the various stages of his visit, particularly with young Germans, took the general tone of asserting a European identity which should transcend not national identities but hostility, disagreements, and the consequences of a stormy past as well as current misunderstandings.

Two observations can be made on all these points:

1. First, agreement is now closer than ever in essential spheres between the president of the republic and the FRG chancellor: Europe's future, East-West relations, evolution of detente, the continent's security.

This is a striking change from the situation which prevailed just a few years ago. The FRG, which was unconditionally tied to Washington's policy and strategy for decades, has given itself more room and, with growing boldness, is assuming under the leadership of the Social Democratic Party of Germany complete autonomy in decision-making.

The fundamental reason for this is simple: The FRG's observation that the U.S. nuclear guarantee toward Europe has lost a good part of its credibility and that the United States is tending "to eliminate any automatic link between the European theater and the use of the central systems" (in other words the intercontinental nuclear deterrent).

For Germany the continent's defense and security now depend on the organization of a strategy and an arms system, of which the Americans will of course be part, established in Europe itself; hence the major importance assumed by the "theater weapons" and the Euromissiles.

At the same time France is undergoing a development which moves it closer to Germany. Originally France's aim was to ensure the defense of the national sanctuary by nuclear deterrence. It seems to be increasingly holding the view that its security is also linked with that of its neighbors. Mr Giscard D'Estaing's announcement last month of his decision to prepare for production of the neutron bomb has been interpreted as a positive factor in Bonn even if--or perhaps because--no details have been given in Paris on the method of incorporating it into our nuclear arsenal.

2. It may be thought that the French and Germans are not always on the same wavelength with regard to the future in general and the European idea.

The sentimental rationalism of the French, or at least of those who are most attached to "Europe," leads them to transpose the deeply rooted notion of the "French homeland" to the European level. Like the "French homeland" the European homeland takes not only a political but a mythical and personalized dimension: They speak of Notre Dame l'Europe as people did of Notre Dame la France.

All that is entirely foreign to Germanic or Benelux pragmatism. An "independent and strong Europe" literally does not mean anything to young Germans, or German businessmen and politicians. At the same time, although Mr Giscard d'Estaing was undoubtedly a hit with the people in Germany, his success was not reflected in the media or in political understanding in the Laender. The French and Germans have moved a great deal closer. There is still a long way to go however before they can talk of a common destiny at the level of the two peoples' collective consciousness. Mr Giscard d'Estaing and Mr Schmidt have realized that and will draw a long-term program of action from it.

L'HUMANITE Editorial

[Yeves Moreau editorial: "Europe--A Bridgehead"]

[Text] The press conference given in Bonn yesterday by Helmut Schmidt and Giscard d'Estaing at the end of the latter's visit to the FRG confirmed the importance attached to military questions throughout this trip.

Once again Helmut Schmidt made a point of welcoming the "modernization of the French deterrent force"--a nice euphemism for Giscard's neutron bomb plans. It is a particularly false euphemism, since the only conceivable doctrine of use for the neutron bomb implies abandoning the deterrence strategy in favor of the "forward battle" strategy.

This is certainly Helmut Schmidt's meaning since, speaking on French television Channel 3 yesterday evening, he was not afraid to tell young French recruits serving in the FRG that they are not there "to have a good time...."

The West German chancellor spelled things out even more clearly by stressing that, in manufacturing the neutron bomb, Giscard's government is showing that it has "identical motives" to those which last December led NATO to decide to deploy the new U.S. Pershing-2 and cruise nuclear missiles in Europe. There could be no clearer way of admitting that the neutron bomb plan is not inspired by a concern for national defense but corresponds to the NATO and Bundeswehr general staffs' concerns.

Far from repudiating Helmut Schmidt's remarks, Mr Giscard d'Estaing's statements faithfully echoed their Atlanticism. For instance, the French president, who had hitherto refrained from any comment on the new missiles, broke his silence in Bonn to urge their introduction.

Indeed, instead of urging that advantage be taken of the recent Soviet approaches to prevent a dangerous revival of the arms race, Mr Giscard d'Estaing proclaimed that the negotiations proposed by Brezhnev should not prevent "the implementation of the NATO decision" taken last December, in other words deployment of the Pershing-2 and cruise missiles in Western Europe.

This recommendation cannot easily be reconciled with the desire he also expressed to see "the strategic balance in Europe and the world respected."

Another contradiction: According to Mr Giscard d'Estaing, "The approach to the problem should be an all-embracing one.... The balance should cover all types of forces." However, he obstinately persists in envisaging negotiations on only conventional weapons in Europe.

How can we fail to be confused by all these inconsistencies? Do Giscard's intricacies of thought not reflect the desire to find excuses for avoiding any constructive proposals? The possibility of negotiations on medium-range nuclear weapons is countered by the value of an all-embracing approach. To the offer of a European conference on disarmament comes the retort: Let us only discuss conventional weapons. The feigned concern for nuclear parity is contradicted by a drive toward excessive armament which jeopardizes this parity.

This plays into the hands of Bonn and Washington. It is certainly not in this way that we will succeed in "giving Europe its role in the world." Quite the reverse; this undermines the favorable influence it could have. Western Europe is brought down to the rank of a bridgehead for Atlanticism and, at the same time, West German military ambitions are encouraged and France is abased.

It is by taking the opposite line that our country's interests would be served, by taking initiatives to halt the arms race and by building a Europe of cooperation and peace. The Helsinki agreements heralded such a Europe. However, the detente principles which these agreements embodied still have to be put into practice, especially at the military level.

This means that neither the neutron bomb nor strengthening the alliance with the Bundeswehr should be on the agenda.

LE MONDE SEES USSR IN IMPASSE IN AFGHANISTAN

[Editorial: "Soviet Impasse"]

[Text] The Soviets, probably working on the theory that bulldozer tactics would enable them to eliminate pockets of resistance, have just launched large-scale reprisal operations around Kabul. Although they recently withdrew from Afghanistan a few units unsuited to antiguerrilla warfare, they have now replaced them with more mobile and lighter elements. However, these forces and what remains of a disintegrating Afghan Army at present only control the cities and a few major road networks. In the interior the resistance controls the territory.

Moscow would have to pour in at least three times as many men to effectively police a people who have in the past left those who have tried to subjugate them--the British in particular--with bad memories. The campaigns to draft men into the Afghan Army to replace deserters have produced hardly any results. The resistance, on the other hand, has inexhaustible reserves of fighters among the population and now seems to be receiving more sophisticated equipment.

More than 7 months after the invasion of Afghanistan, the USSR has succeeded in raising virtually a whole people against it in a reaction which is not only inspired by Islamic feeling but is motivated by fierce nationalism. Around 1 million Afghan refugees have been allowed into Pakistan and Iran, and this number is still growing.

In addition, on the domestic plane, the regime which the Soviet forces have installed in power in Kabul is also in a complete political impasse. The Soviet strategists would have probably have liked the two factions of the Afghan communist party [as published] to co-exist within the Karmal government. However, they have been in constant conflict and have even been killing each other. These clashes have come to a head. The purges announced by Mr Karmal at the beginning of Ramadan will probably not end them. In these conditions, how could the Soviets find replacements in the Kabul leadership team who would be acceptable to the population, in whose eyes the Karmal regime is hopelessly discredited?

Its isolation probably also explains why the Kabul government is constantly asserting its readiness to have discussions with Tehran and Islamabad. This is not the first time that a regime at war has tried to negotiate with its adversaries...over their heads. Nonetheless, with the mediation of the Islamic countries which certainly do not unanimously support the resistance, and the rather discreet diplomatic approaches made by countries such as India and even France, the Afghan conflict is to some extent also moving toward the search for a political settlement. So far the Islamic Conference initiative has only served to ensure legitimate international recognition for the resistance. However, the pressures exerted by the Western countries, especially the United States, before the Olympic games have, to say the least, scarcely encouraged yet a more flexible Soviet stance.

Quite the reverse: The USSR seems to think that it has time on its side. This is likely to prove a serious miscalculation. If they want to prevent dogmatic Islamic groups which are by no means united from taking power in Kabul and if they want to limit the human, financial and diplomatic cost of their adventure, the Soviets will sooner or later have to extricate themselves completely from the Afghan mire.

PCF'S GREMETZ RENEWS APPEAL FOR RECOGNITION OF KAMPUCHEA

[Unattributed report: "It Is in France's Interest To Recognize and Aid the Phnom Penh Government"]

[Text] Maxime Gremetz, deputy for La Somme and PCF Central Committee secretary, yesterday sent a letter to French Foreign Minister Francois-Poncet stating in particular:

"I have already approached the government on the PCF's behalf on many occasions to urge it to reopen normal diplomatic relations with the Government of the People's Republic of Kampuchea. Now India has recognized the Kampuchean Government. This is a positive and important decision by this great nonaligned country, whose role in the world has been stressed by the president of the republic on several occasions.

"So the real situation in Kampuchea is becoming apparent to a growing number of countries. This country is coming to life again after the horrible genocide perpetrated by Pol Pot and Ieng Sary and is developing under the leadership of the new authorities it has installed, whose representative nature can no longer be seriously disputed.

"In these circumstances it is vital that France establish diplomatic relations with Kampuchea. It must take part in the recovery of this sorely tried country and carry out with it an economic cooperation plan of mutual interest. Such a policy would correspond to the interests of our people and our country, bound by deep historical ties to Kampuchea and the Kampuchean people. It would be an important factor contributing to peace in Southeast Asia. France must not be one of the last countries to recognize Kampuchea. That would damage France's role and influence in the world."

COLOMBO ADDRESSED SENATE ON 'PURSUIT OF DETENTE'

[Text] Rome, 15 Jul (ANSA)--Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo declared today that one of the major guidelines for Italian foreign policy is the pursuit of detente by "keeping open the channels of communication and the prospects for dialogue between East and West" in a statement to the Senate. Colombo's remarks touched also on the series of recent encounters at the international level, including the June Venice summit of the world's seven most industrialized nations.

The head of Italian diplomacy affirmed that the nation's foreign policy is based on realism, "which does not at all entail renouncing the pr[illegible]ct of an operative role for our nation in international affairs but which allows us [illegible]void positions and initiatives we are incapable of following through on". Colombo the[illegible]lled that, on the other hand, detente is "influenced in a decisive fashion by the ov[illegible] trend of relations between the United States and the Soviet Union and it would not be [illegible]ible for Europe to foster this process with only our good will". The foreign minister [illegible]ed that Europe should expect to hold down more than a mere subordinate role in this process. Colombo went on to identify as "elements which have meant more than general and uncoordinated activism: the reality of our attitude and position outlined these past few months in relation to the Afghan crisis, and to the general repercussions..." The Italian position on the "need to relax tensions in an extremely delicate area like Southwest Asia in connection to the question of the American hostages held in Iran and the active and constructive efforts in the Middle East crises to reclaim Europe's role". According to the foreign minister, these elements "have defined, in the brief time of a few months, the prospects for initiatives and achievements characteristic of autonomy and, taken together, are consistent with a policy aimed at a comprehensive vision of detente and peace". Referring to the NATO offer to negotiate limitations of and controls for long range nuclear weapons, Colombo disclosed that French and West German conversations in Moscow with Soviet leaders "have cast light on the movement within the Moscow position. This came about," he said, "a month and a half after this phase of the dialogue was begun in Vienna". Continuing on the same issue, Colombo said, "Moscow has always been extremely attentive to the central European area, because of the delicate problems present here and has, therefore, paid special attention to the Federal German Republic as the point of balance of the forces of the Atlantic alliance." Colombo noted that, at present, the NATO missiles deployed in West Germany are capable of a strike against the nations of the Warsaw Pact but not against the Soviet Union, a territory which appears as a "sanctuary" in relation to the NATO missile systems, even though Soviet territory is within the range of American intercontinental missiles and the advanced American missile systems. This disparity between the range of missiles located in central Europe in relation to Soviet territory and the Warsaw Pact nations will no longer exist beyond 1983, the foreign minister said, when the deployment of NATO missiles to counter the Soviet SS 20 will begin. "It is understandable, at least on the psychological level", the foreign minister continued, "why the West German chancellor...was approached by the Soviets to convey 'some signal' of a positive nature as regards NATO's offer to negotiate". This signal, Colombo said, was accepted by the NATO countries which will explore "the developments of the Soviet position and, on the basis of these changes, will draw the relevant policy conclusions".

Other than East-West relations, the foreign minister also spoke of European solidarity with the rest of the West and European unity. In relation to the latter point, the minister recalled the peril posed to the European Economic Community by the [word indistinct] of British financial contributions to the Community budget and the climate of confidence restored to the Community once this issue was settled. The foreign minister also mentioned "the happy initiatives represented by the official visits of the Italian head of state to Algeria and Spain" in connection to Community relations within the Mediterranean region and the future enlargement of the EEC.

FRG'S GENSCHER GIVES LUNCHEON SPEECH ON EUROPEAN ISSUES

DW160941 Bonn FOREIGN MINISTRY PRESS RELEASE in German 15 Jul 80

[Text] Dear colleague, Madame: I would like to thank you cordially for your friendly words and the hospitality with which you have received us here. I am very happy to be in your beautiful country again for a visit. The Federal Republic of Germany has watched with great interest and sympathy the development of your country. Your country's avowal of its affiliation with the European democracies is a gain for all of us. We are aware indeed of how keenly interested you are in as early a membership in the European Community as possible. This is our desire as well. Let me assure you that the Federal Government will keep supporting with all its strength the smooth continuation of the accession negotiations.

By returning to democracy Portugal has lived up to the precondition to which the member states justly attach great significance. Our goal goes beyond a Common Market. It includes the political union of Europe. As you know, the Federal Republic of Germany is one of the strongest advocates of this great goal. Important stimuli for growth for the member countries' national economies will emanate from the enlargement of the Community. Hence the time pending membership and the subsequent transition period should be utilized by your country and by Spain for any measures of restructuring and adaptation that may be required, because the enlargement of the EC is an opportunity and a challenge at the same time for both the Community and the countries joining it. We are convinced that the incorporation of your country and of the other accession countries into the circle by the European democracies constitutes an important factor for stability in the south of Europe and thus for the security of Europe at large.

Freedom, democracy, progress and social justice in a united Europe are the aims of our policy on Europe. Our policy on Europe is the core of a far-reaching foreign policy aimed at the preservation of peace. The basis of this policy is a firm link between the Federal Republic of Germany and the Atlantic alliance as well as the European Community. Our peace policy is aimed at preserving the security of Western democracies through a policy of balance, at decreasing tensions between East and West through a more credible and predictable policy of arms control and disarmament. A dangerous arms race is to be stopped based on a balance thus contributing to the stability and independence of the Third World. These aims have become even more important in view of the difficult international situation that has been created through the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan.

Dear colleague, the good cooperation between our two countries in the various multilateral bodies as well as in the bilateral field are the expression of a close and trustful partnership. You can feel assured that the Federal Republic of Germany will continue to promote cooperation with your country as much as possible. With the signing of the double taxation agreement we will create on the occasion of this visit an important basis for the further involvement of German firms in your country.

SPANISH-SOVIET PREPARATORY TALKS ON CSCE END

LD151923 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1800 GMT 15 Jul 80

[Text] The Soviet and Spanish delegations which met yesterday and today have brought their work to an end. The aim of this meeting was to study the subjects of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe which will take place in Madrid next November.

They also discussed the nonproliferation of nuclear arms and, finally, it seems that the bilateral relations between Spain and the Soviet Union were emphasized.

On finishing its work the Soviet delegation met the secretary of state at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Carlos Robles Piquer.

Oreja-Rolandhis Talks

LD152230 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1800 GMT 15 Jul 80

[Text] Foreign Minister Oreja today received his Cypriot counterpart, Nikolaos Rolandhis, who arrived this afternoon on an official visit to Spain. During the meeting they discussed general subjects of the present international situation, especially those pertaining to the situation in the Mediterranean as well as various subjects concerning the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. The Cypriot foreign minister is scheduled to remain in our country until Friday.

DEFENSE MINISTER TO VISIT BAGHDAD 17 JULY

LD122032 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1800 GMT 12 Jul 80

[Text] Spanish Defense Minister Agustin Rodriguez Sahagun will attend the celebration to mark the Iraqi revolution on 17-18 July in Baghdad at the invitation of his Iraqi counterpart, General Khayrallah. This visit falls within the framework of the close relations which exist between Spain and the Republic of Iraq.

GOVERNMENT TO BUILD SUBMARINES USING TRIDENT MISSILE

[By Alastair Percival, PA staff reporter]

[Text] Britain is to build a new fleet of nuclear submarines armed with the West's latest and most powerful intercontinental ballistic missile.

The government today announced a 5,000 million pound plan to replace Polaris with the American-built Trident C-4 rocket carrying British warhead.

The huge project--equivalent to 3 percent of the defence budget over 15 years--will allow Britain to maintain an independent nuclear deterrent committed to the NATO alliance.

Four or five submarines will be built to take over from the ageing Polaris fleet whose life will end early in the 1990's. Most of the money will be spent in job-hungry British shipyards and factories over the next decade.

Defence Secretary Mr Francis Pym told the House of Commons: "I intend that as much work as possible should go to British industry.

"At least 70 percent of the total cost will be spent in this country, and that will be reflected in a substantial amount of employment."

But Shadow Defence Secretary Mr William Rodgers said the case for Trident had not been made out and the opposition would not approve it.

The Trident programme will arm the new submarines with a shower of nuclear missiles which can be individually steered and targeted. Each vessel will carry 16 three-stage, solid-fuelled rockets. And each missile is designed to carry up to eight warheads which can be targeted independently.

The Trident has a huge range--4,000 miles against the 2,800 miles of the Polaris--much more than is needed to threaten Russia from Britain.

The Royal Navy's missiles will carry warheads which are to be designed at the atomic weapons research establishment at Aldermaston, Berkshire.

The American weapons system--in operational service with the United States Navy since last year--is expected to cost 1,000 million pounds.

The Trident weighs 65,000 lbs compared with the Polaris's 35,000 lbs.

As well as submarines, missiles, warheads and support equipment the massive spending programme will also involve new construction projects at the Coulport armament depot and at the Faslane submarine base in Scotland.

It 's expected that the first Trident submarine will be launched in the early 1990s. Each sub will spend 70 days at sea on patrol, compared with 60 days for the four Polaris submarines based at Faslane.

The defence secretary told MPs that the government regarded Trident as the "best and most cost effective" replacement for Polaris.

Mr Pym explained that Mrs Thatcher's buying agreement with President Carter was on the same lines as the 1962 Nassau Treaty under which Britain acquired Polaris.

"We shall design and build our own submarines and nuclear warheads here in the United Kingdom, and buy the Trident missile system complete with its MIRV (multiple independently-targettable re-entry vehicles) capability from the United States.

"Once bought, it will be entirely in our ownership and operational control, but we shall commit the whole force to NATO in the same way the Polaris force is today."

Britain will have the right to press the trigger in the unlikely event that the government should wish to do so without the co-operation of the United States and its NATO allies.

The total firepower of each submarine will be equivalent to nearly 50 million tons of TNT.

The project's huge cost is likely to create a backlash against the government's decision from senior officers and politicians who argue that a land-based cruise missile with an extended range would be far cheaper and just as effective.

In Whitehall, it was pointed out that Britain spent much higher proportions of the defence budget in the 1950s on building up the V-bomber force.

Initially, the government is to order four submarines at a cost of 600 million pounds each. A decision on whether to have a fifth boat will not be taken before 1982.

The announcement in the Commons was made because of leaks on the agreement from official American sources.

But it was no surprise that the replacement was planned, because it had been common knowledge for at least six months that the Cabinet was thinking along these lines.

The agreement that Britain could use the weapon system independently came out in one of the letters from Mrs Thatcher to President Carter after the correspondence between the leaders was made public today.

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH Praise

LD161029 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 16 Jul 80 p 16

[Editorial: "Top-Grade Deterrence"]

[Text] By choosing "Trident" Mrs Thatcher has given another example of the across-the-board courage and leadership that she was elected to provide and that is now increasingly expected of her. As the argument went on about whether Britain should replace Polaris, and if so what with, Russia's enormous military expansion has accelerated and she has become even more brazenly aggressive. This, in conjunction with the emergence of huge explosive forces in the Third World, which she seeks to exploit, has made the world an increasingly dangerous and unpredictable place. The arguments for remaining insured and paying a rather higher premium are overwhelming. So are those for paying a surcharge to get the best and most reliable cover--which by almost general agreement "Trident" provides.

We have, fortunately, very little experience of nuclear deterrence under stress. Strategic, political and psychological factors--rational and irrational--would be involved on such an unprecedented scale as to be perforce largely unpredictable or even unimaginable. The conflicting views of leading experts presented in the article on this page by Lord Gladwyn all testify to this. But so many uncertainties remain and so much is at stake that it would be imprudent,irresponsible, perhaps fatal, to relinquish the capability, in case of need, to make a contribution to the alliance and our own defence.

The extra cost of "Trident" as compared with the alternative of cruise missiles is justified by its greater range, flexibility and security. Certainly there must be no deprivation of the conventional forces, whose adequate strength is the essential basis for a credible nuclear capability. It is painful for the government to be obliged, in the national interest, to impose some additional defence burden on the country at a time of recession and cuts in expenditure elsewhere. They are doing their duty in putting freedom and security first. It is gratifying, at a time when the alliance is facing great dangers and some internal strains, that the agreement with America for the supply of "Trident" has been concluded so amicably. The whole of NATO will benefit from the renewal and strengthening of this transatlantic link.

LABOR PARTY SPLIT OVER CRUISE MISSILE DECISION

Mr Rodger's statement conflicts with the "draft manifesto" issued last week by the Labour left-wing-dominated National Executive, which rejects outright the stationing of American cruise missiles in Britain.

It is also seen by the left as a repudiation of the defence policy overwhelmingly endorsed by the party's special conference at Wembley in May.

Although some members of the shadow cabinet believe that Mr Rodger's timing was particularly unfortunate and that he has put Mr Callaghan in an embarrassing position, the Labour leader is understood to regard Mr Rodgers arguments as a fair reflection of his own views.

In the pamphlet on defence, Mr Rodgers argues that there is "no new principle" involved in the location in Britain of nuclear weapons assigned to NATO. He says that the Russians can forestall a decision to deploy "cruise" by agreeing to withdraw their own SS30 missiles from Eastern Europe.

Such an argument is seen by Labour right-wingers as being in line with the policy pursued by the party in office and not differing greatly from the line taken by Mr Callaghan at Wembley.

But the former prime minister was contradicted later in those proceedings by Mr Wedgwood Benn who received a much more enthusiastic response.

The left's anger with Mr Rodgers is the greater because his justification of the deployment of cruise missile has been issued under the auspices of the Labour and Trades Union Press Service a body partially financed with funds from NATO.

First reaction of several prominent left-wingers yesterday was to call for Mr Rodger's resignation or dismissal. Mr Martin Flannery, chairman of the Tribune group, described him as "so biased and sectarian a person that he is not suitable to be shadow defence secretary."

Mr Frank Allaun, chairman of Labour Action for Peace, said: "If Bill Rodgers cannot accept the official Labour Party policy on cruise missiles he should resign. The party's position on the 160 cruise missiles being deployed here is unconditional."

A call to factions within the party to be "careful not to assist" the press in reporting splits in the movement was made yesterday by six left-wing members of the NEC [National Executive Council]. It will be seen in the party as a call to Mr Callaghan's supporters to stop rocking the boat.

'NO SURPRISE' AT SUZUKI ELECTION IN JAPAN

OW150601 Tokyo KYODO in English 0536 GMT 15 Jul 80

[Text] London, July 14 KYODO--Britain showed no particular surprise at the news of the election of Zenko Suzuki as new president of the ruling Liberal-Democratic Party [LDP] as British newsmen have been predicting that he would succeed the late Prime Minister Masayoshi Ohira.

There were reports at the time of Ohira's death that former LDP Secretary General Yasuhiro Nakasone, former Foreign Minister Kiichi Miyazawa and Toshio Komoto, former minister of international trade and industry, were considered potential successors to Ohira.

Komoto was least known among the three in Britain and the Japanese Embassy received inquiries about him.

Suzuki is almost totally unknown in Europe. THE OBSERVER described him as a man who has had no experience in diplomacy.

THE TIMES said Suzuki was picked as a byproduct of internal compromise, and that one reason he received the top party post was because he had the least number of political enemies.

But at the same time, the newspaper said former Prime Minister Kakuei Tanaka played a key role in Suzuki's election.

Britons apparently had little interest in who would become next Japanese prime minister as they thought Japan would have a stable political situation as a result of the LDP's sweeping victory in the June 22 general elections.

KIPRIANOU READY TO MEET DENKTAS IN LIBYA UNDER UN AUSPICES

NC151447 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1400 GMT 15 Jul 80

[Text] Referring to Libya's proposal for a meeting with Denktas in Tripoli, President of the Republic Kiprianou, has declared that he is prepared to participate in such a meeting within the framework of the mission's good offices and under the auspices of the UN secretary general, whenever Waldheim considers this opportune.

Speaking today after his second meeting with Libyan Foreign Affairs Secretary At-Turayki, president Kiprianou expressed appreciation for the keen interest of At-Qadhdhafi and the Libyan Government in the Cyprus problem. He also expressed his thanks to At-Turayki for his visit to Cyprus and for all his efforts.

In his statement the Libyan foreign affairs secretary said that his talks had had positive results, and added that he is very gratified with the trust that President Kiprianou and Denktas are showing in Libya's efforts to help. At-Turayki also expressed his gratitude because both President Kiprianou and Denktas have accepted Al-Qadhdhafi's invitation to participate in a summit meeting in Libya under the auspices of the UN secretary general. At-Turayki added that some progress has been achieved in his talks and expressed the hope that the Tripoli meeting will take place as soon as the parties concerned and the UN secretary general agree on a suitable date. We believe, he added, that it will not be long before this comes about.

The Libyan foreign affairs secretary then said that Al-Qadhdhafi and the people of his country will make every effort to help the people of Cyprus, a friendly and fraternal country, to find a peaceful and just solution to their problem.

Asked whether the meeting would take place in a week or in a month, At-Turayki said that this is not an easy problem. I can assure you, he added, that we are not pessimistic in any way. A solution can be found to every problem. The important thing is that the two sides accept the idea of such a meeting. Time, he added, is not a problem.

In their statements both President Kiprianou and At-Turayki expressed their satisfaction with relations between Cyprus and Libya and said that in the course of their talks they had discussed ways of further strengthening and developing these bilateral relations.

At-Turayki Comments

NC151550 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1500 GMT 15 Jul 80

[Text] Speaking at a press conference in Nicosia today, Libyan Foreign Affairs Secretary At-Turayki said that UN Secretary General Waldheim had been informed of Libya's intention to mediate in the Cyprus issue after the meeting that At-Turayki held with President Kiprianou in New York last October.

Asked about the date on which the Tripoli meeting will be held, Mr Turayki said that this will depend on the UN secretary general's other commitments as well as those of President Kiprianou and Denktas. At-Turayki expressed the hope that the meeting would take place before the end of the year.

Replying to a question, At-Turayki said that the basis of the meeting will be the Makarios-Denktas and Kiprianou-Denktas agreements without any advance conditions, which, he emphasized, is very significant.

Asked about Libya's role at such a meeting, At-Turayki said that his country will do everything possible to help it succeed. Our role, he added, will not be limited to one meeting; we will continue our efforts for a rapprochement in the views of the two sides and for finding a solution.

Replying to another question, At-Turayki said that President Al-Qadhdhafi intends to attend the meeting personally.

In reply to a question, Mr At-Turayki said that certain agreements for cooperation in the technological, social and humanitarian fields between the Turkish Cypriot community and Libyan organizations in no way reflect any desire on Libya's part for the division of Cyprus. On the contrary, he added, Libya supports the unity of the island and its position is very clear.

Replying to another question, Mr At-Turayki said that Libya stands for the abolition of the British bases in Cyprus and added that one of the fundamental principles of the nonaligned movement is the elimination of foreign troops and foreign bases from the territory of other countries. At-Turayki left this afternoon to return home.

HOUSE, EDEK MARK ANNIVERSARY OF 1974 COUP, INVASION

House of Representatives Session

NC151342 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 15 Jul 80

[Text] The House of Representatives convened in a special session today and denounced the treacherous [1974] coup and Turkish invasion; it also paid homage to the victims of the double crime against Cyprus. After the speech by House President Mikhailidhis, the body observed 1 minute of silence.

In his speech, Mr Mikhailidhis stressed that, despite the pain and ruins, our determination remains firm and immutable to work for a truly independent and united Cyprus in which the inalienable human rights of all citizens will be safeguarded irrespective of religion and national origin. Mr Mikhailidhis condemned the architects and perpetrators of the crime and stressed that the responsibility for the future falls on everybody's shoulders and that, if we fail to carry out our duty, we will be blameworthy. He stressed: Let us prove, through our responsible words and our own planned deeds, that we are worthy of the struggles and sacrifices of our great leader Makarios, our heroes and our martyrs. He concluded: We all have a duty to carry out and contribute to the struggle for national survival and vindication by continuing with firmness on Makarios' path of struggle.

The Democratic Party parliamentary spokesman, Mr Ambizas, denounced the coup and the Turkish invasion and said the people do not forget when they see those responsible for the catastrophe and the unrepentant ones who unhesitatingly assault the wounds and attempt a coarse distortion and forging of our history, particularly at its most crucial and painful time. We are passing through difficult times, he said, and there are intensive attempts toward disorientation. Our national duty dictates that we should never lose our courage. He added: The crime always keeps us awake, resolute and relentless for every presumptive dictator who would besiege and trap us with the well-sounding slogans of patriotic exploitation so that he may later on drive the chains of his tanks over our symbols, creeds and virtues.

AKEL Parliamentary Spokesman Papaioannou said that, 6 years after the dark days of the monstrous double crime, there has been neither a purge nor have the UN resolutions regarding Cyprus been implemented. On the contrary, he went on, the same shameful coupists raise their head again and threaten us with a new round, which they promise will be much worse than the previous one.

Mr Papaioannou added that Ankara's chauvinistic expansionist circles and the reactionary Turkish Cypriot leadership are taking advantage of the situation in consolidating the faits accomplis and proceeding with the declaration of a Turkish Cypriot state. He stressed: For these reasons, we must remain strongly adherent to the line and tactics decided by the national and ministerial council. Otherwise, deviation from this line and tactics will lead us to a worse situation.

The chairman of the socialist party EDEK, Mr Lissaridhis, said that it would be a smear on the memory of those who fell fighting for democracy and constitutional legality if we merely referred to their sacrifice without making a decision to continue on a course that has been consolidated with their blood. He went on: Today, more than ever, we feel the need to declare that we will not write off homelands and rights; we will not sell out the right of any refugee to return and that we will never accept a solution that would legalize or semilegalize the faits accomplis created by the occupation.

Deputy Ierodhiakonou, who represents the Democratic Rally Party in the house, said that the big lesson drawn from the facts of the treacherous and criminal coup and the Turkish invasion is that discord and bigotry are sources of calamity; the use of force and unlawfulness in attaining political aims is a catastrophic method and should vanish from our political life forever. He said: Today it is imperative that we concentrate all our attention on upsetting the existing unacceptable de facto situation. Mr. Ierodhiakonou added that we are passing through the most crucial time of our history and said: If we all responsibly plan and place the common object--which is the salvation of Cyprus--above all other interests, then there will be better days for all Cypriot people--Greek and Turkish Cypriots alike.

Independent Deputy Khristofidhis said the opening of the Cyprus dossier is imperative in order to uncover and provide evidence as to who the enemies of Cyprus are and what their plans ar . After the dossier is opened and the perpetrators punished, he added, then we should all join hands in saving Cyprus and chart a common line for our homeland's salvation. Anything else, he said, would lie heavy on our generation with all the weight of treason and the catastrophe or Cyprus.

Lissaridhis Adress at EDEK Rally

NC151942 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1900 15 Jul 80

[Text] Speaking a a rally organized by his party in Nicosia's Elevtheria Square this evening, EDEK Chairman Lissaridhis came out against any further concessions in the Cyprus issue and against the bizonal solution; he repeated his call for a purge and the revival of moral values, for a defense shield and a people's civil guard, for a mobilization of resources, and for persistence on the UN resolutions.

Mr Lissaridhis spoke of errors and omissions that have affected the Cyprus question, which he set among the broader framework of international relations. He then came out in support of substantive talks and a solution that would secure the return of all the refugees as well as a free, united, independent, sovereign and nonaligned Cyprus that would be without any foreign armies and bases.

The EDEK chairman also supported drastic changes in the socioeconomic structures of today and referred to the need for a change saying that EDEK is the force of change. In parallel he came out in favor of a tested leadership capable and willing to promote a specific line on the national and other issues. Finally he said that EDEK holds out a cordial hand for cooperation.

Denktas Comments on Coups

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has said that, from the Turkish Cypriot viewpoint, there was no difference between the 15 July 1974 junta coup and Makarios' 21 December 1963 coup, because both coups aimed at annihilating the Turkish Cypriots, Hellenizing the island and making it a Greek colony. In reply to a question on the demonstrations held and statements issued in the Greek Cypriot sector on the anniversary of the junta coup, Denktas said: They referred to the beginning of a coup, but in fact a coup was launched by Makarios on 21 December 1963. Makarios' secretly prepared forces, together with the Greek regiment, attacked the Turkish Cypriots and expelled the Turkish Cypriot partner from the legal Cyprus Government by force. After that Makarios had the audacity to proclaim the Greek Cypriot wing of the partnership government as the Cyprus Government.

Noting that despite all efforts for 11 years the Greek Cypriots were unable to rule over the regions inhabited by the Turkish Cypriots due to the latter's political struggle, Denktas continued: The 15 July coup launched by a bloody Greek Cypriot group against the 1963 coupists is [words indistinct] Makarios was to be eliminated. The 11-year-old illegal Greek Cypriot administration was to annihilate the Turkish Cypriot community and enosis was to be declared. The Greek Cypriot leaders and the Greek Cypriot people, who condemn the second coup today, actually supported the results of the first fatal coup and usurped all Turkish Cypriot rights for 10 years.

FOREIGN MINISTRY OFFICIAL VISITS JAPAN, PRC

NC110629 Nicosia CYPRUS MAIL in English 11 Jul 80 p 3

[Test] Cyprus is discussing with Japan the possibilities of an economic, scientific and technical cooperation agreement. The matter was raised during talks in Tokyo by the Cyprus Foreign Ministry Director General Mr G. Pelayias who flew to Japan from China where he signed a cultural cooperation agreement in Beijing. Reports from Tokyo say that Mr Pelayias was assured by the Japanese Government that there is no change in Japanese policy and the the Japanese Government was not at all involved in the visit there of Turkish Cypriot Leader Mr Denktas.

TURKISH FINANCE MINISTER, TURKISH CYPRIOT BEGIN ECONOMIC TALKS

TA151429 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 15 Jul 80

[Test] Formal talks on the economic problems of the Turkish Cypriot Community opened in Nicosia today between Turkey and the Turkish Federated State. Opening the talks, the prime minister Mr Cagatay, said that the federated state was formed only 5 years ago and it was impossible for the federated state to reach the desired level of development in such a short period. However, the Turkish Cypriot community was eager and making intensive efforts to achieve the desired level.

The visiting Turkish finance minister, Mr Sezgin, who is leading his country's delegation at the talks, praised the Turkish Cypriot community for overcoming many difficulties during the transitional period before achieving its status as the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus. He added that the efforts exerted after the proclamation of the federated state had been equally successful. He gave an assurance that Turkey would continue to extend every help to the federated state. He addedthat the talks would deal with financial and social problems of the Turkish Cypriot community. The Turkish Cypriot delegation at the talks is headed by the minister of finance, Mr Hakki Atun.

KKE PAPERS CITE NEED FOR DIFFERENT ELECTION POLICY

RIZOSPASTIS Article

AT151245 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 15 July 80 p 1

[Editorial: "Realistic Goals"]

[Text] The country's political affairs are at the crossroads of a critical decision: will it continue the same course, the same policy which led to a dangerous impasse in our national issues, deteriorated all social and peoples' problems, brought the economy to the threshold of crisis and brought poverty to the workers; or will it change course and take a democratic turn through implementation of a policy of national independence and friendship with all nations, a policy of democratization, limitation of monopoly high-handedness, of easing the economic lot of the workers and of economic development for the benefit of the people and the country?

In other words: Will "New Democracy" continue to handle the fate of the country or will the anti-imperialist democratic forces take over by means of a government which is willing and able to implement this different policy, the need for which appears in relief in all aspects of the country's life?

The resolution of the last plenum of the KKE [Exterior] Central Commitee is an important contribution to this search for solutions by the workers, to the discussion which in one way or the other has already started between the fighters for change and the democratic political forces. It points to a course of unity and struggle along which the people's desire for change could discover its fulfillment.

In the forthcoming elections, which we want immediately, the people will have the opportunity to take authority away from the rightwing and to elect a democratic government which, supported by the people themselves and by the cooperation between democratic parties, will be able to promote a program for a democratic change. This course passes through the determined expansion of the peoples' struggle for bread, for work and for liberties, through the multifaceted development of the trade union and other mass movement. We do not passively wait for the solution of the immediate and burning problems all by themselves "through the elections." Their solution lies, primarily, in the very hands of the workers themselves who by strengthening their unity and joint struggle simultaneously become the power which will be able to support, promote and protect change tomorrow. This course also passes through a determined effort to strengthen the KKE both in votes and in deputies. It will be impossible to bring forth a basic democratic majority in the chamber of deputies if the workers fail to give their mass vote to the KKE so that, by breaking the barrier of discrimination and by overcoming the stealing of its votes and seats, it will be able to participate in the second distribution of seats. It is only in this way that it will be able to guarantee for itself the number of deputies which will approach its true electoral strength.

This is not a line which leads to confrontation with other democratic forces. It is, without a doubt, a more tangible answer to the false theory of the "lost vote" and, most of all, it is aimed at cutting down the seats of the rightwing and is an imperative prerequisite if the anti-imperialist democratic forces are to gain the parliamentary majority. At the same time this is not just a case of interest only to the communists and their party. It is of vital interest to all the workers who seek change, to all the democrats who, as a result of their own experience, understand that if there is to be a democratic government, if steps toward democratization are to be taken, if under this effort the danger from hesitations concessions and contradictions are to be eliminated it is absolutely essential to have this: A large and strong communist party, the irreplaceable force and the guarantee for any true change. Our goals are not easy ones. They are, however, realistic, in the same way that the cause for change is equally difficult but also realistic. We proceed to a difficult and hard struggle for tomorrow with optimism and confidence in the inexhaustible force of the working class and of all the working people.

It is with this optimism that the communists address themselves to all the fighters of the leftwing, of progress and change and invite them to a joint struggle for immediate elections and for the attainment through them of a democratic majority for the sake of true change.

I AVYI Colum.

AT151345 Athens I AVYI in Greek 15 Jul 80 p 10

[From the "I AVYI" Column: "They Furor Around Elections"]

[Text] Lately there has been an increased effort to promote imaginary forecasts on elections. Prime Minister Rallis undertakes a tour of the provinces during which, although he is careful to introduce a purely preelection climate, he simultaneously states that elections will be held "in 16 to 17 months." Leading government personalities state "confidentially" that elections will be held in the spring of 1981. On the other side PASOK Chairman Papandreou forecasts the government will proceed to elections in the fall of 1980. At the same time the leadership of Florakis' party [the KKE Exterior] asks for immediate elections as "an imperiative national and democratic necessity" but at the same time it concludes that the government wants to speed up elections because it sees that time is working against it....

One could state that this is an attempt at orchestration, to lump all the country's serious problems into only one problem--elections. This is, in our opinion, both wrong as well as bad for the peoples' movement.

Taking advantage of the one-sided information situation created by the lockout of the owners of Athenian daily newspapers, which affects hundreds of thousands of people, in conjunction with its own control over ERT, the National Radio and Television Network, the government actively hastens to adopt final decisions in vital sectors such as the country's economy and national issues. It is attempting to create "faits accomplis" with the smallest possible reaction from the people. Therefore, we have the question: Is there no other way to truly express the peoples' reaction other than the demand for elections? Is it impossible to coordinate the effort to defend the peoples living standard in face of mounting inflation; to enforce adjustment of salaries and wages on the basis of the cost of living index; to stop dismissals? Is it impossible to stop the trend of accepting U.S. pressure for our return to NATO's military wing and for a shameful "compromise" with Turkey? How is it possible that faced with all these problems the parties and primarily the opposition parties, present immediate elections as the only solution as if the people have no other weapon at their disposal other than their vote? At the same time, how is it that they fail to lay down the most basic of prerequisits for the conduct of just elections, such as guarantees of equality among parties in the dissemination of information, adoption of the simple representation system of election and so forth?

This, then, is the reason why the furor around elections, as it is cultivated, tends to become--irrespective of intent--only part of a process to disorientate and immobilize the peoples masses. Under all this furor the government manages to maintain its initiative for maneuvering and manages to enforce its policy. Simultaneously it also creates conditions for a surprise election when it considers that conditions favor it. The direct duty of all parties of the democratic opposition of all the democratic forces, is that they must specifically deal with, step by step, the problems created by the government's policy. They must help toward correct orientation of the people and organization of the peoples' struggles on the basis of a joint foundation against the government's policy. This becomes even more imperative today when the economic situation is rapidly deteriorating, now when faits accomplis are being prepared in our relations with NATO and on national issues, now when it is essential to have a fast mobilization to cope with the conditions to be created on 1 January 1981. When the agreement on accession to the EEC will become operative. The more effectively the struggle on these issues is conducted the more favorable the conditions will become for the democratic forces in the election battle.

RPP DEPUTY SHOT DEAD IN ISTANBUL BY TERRORISTS

TA151814 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1800 GMT 15 Jul 80

[Text] RPP Deputy from Istanbul Abdurrahman Koksaloglu was seriously wounded by shots fired by two terrorists in Istanbul today. Koksaloglu died in the hospital. According to information received by a TRT correspondent from Istanbul security officials, the incident occurred around 1815, when shots were fired at his office on Abideihurriyet Avenue. Koksaloglu, who was seriously wounded, was taken to the Sisli Cocuk hospital where he died before he could be operated upon.

In a statement to the TRT on the killing of the RPP Deputy from Istanbul Koksaloglu, Interior Minister Mustafa Gulcigil said that extensive measures have been taken in Istanbul and its vicinity to apprehend the assailants. Gulcigil expressed his deep sorrow over the incident.

Leaders Reaction

[Summary] In a news conference in Ankara today, RPP leader Bulent Ecevit deplored the killing of RPP Deputy from Istanbul Koksaloglu and recalled that lately attacks against his party's members have intensified. Ecevit added: "This is the first time that a member of parliament has been the victim of terrorist fire." Ecevit said that the fact that this murder was committed following the prime minister's slanders and provocations against the RPP aggravated the situation. Recalling that this murder occurred only 2 days after the interior minister claimed that anarchic incidents had been curbed, Ecevit expressed his deep sorrow over the incident. He continued: "All RPP members will continue their task of safeguarding the republic and the democratic system and peace in the country without being intimidated by acts of pressure, cruelty or murder."

National Assembly President Cahit Karakas, Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel, Republican Reliance Party leader Turhan Feyzioglu, JP Secretary General Nahit Mentese, NSP Deputy leader Sevket Kazan, NAP leader Alpaslan Turkes and Turkish Unity Party leader Mustafa Timisi denounced the despicable murder and expressed their sympathy.

SECURITY COUNCIL URGES SECURITY BILLS RATICICATION

[Text] The National Security Council convened under Acting President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil at the Cankaya Mansion at 0930 today. It lasted 5 and 1/2 hours. Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel, Chief of Staff Gen Kenan Evren, ministers who are members of the council, force commanders and the National Security Council secretary general were present at the meeting. A statement issued after the meeting said that the participants of the meeting discussed the public order situation throughout the country and the domestic and foreign developments of the past month, as well as the recent incidents in certain sensitive areas outside the martial law regions aimed against the state's unity and indivisibility and the nation's unity and solidarity.

The statement then says: In the face of the extraordinary situation in the country, the National Security Council considers it necessary for all our citizens and all establishments, which owe their existence to the constitution and whose duties are cited in the constitution, to direct their efforts toward the achievement of national unity and solidarity.

Furthermore, the National Security Council believes that it is essential to ratify as soon as possible the state of emergency and state security courts bills which will increase the effectiveness of the martial law commanders and the security forces in fighting anarchy, terrorism and divisiveness and will speed up judicial activities as well as the amendment that increases the authority of the martial law commanders. The national Security Council has decided to recommend that the government continue the determined and effective struggle against all types of illegal activities until these laws are enacted.

ECEVIT WARNS RPP ABOUT COOPERATION WITH 'LEFTIST CIRCLES'

[Excerpts] The RPP Senate and National Assembly groups have completed their joint meeting where they held a general discussion on Turkey's and the party's problems. Addressing the joint group after 6 days of general discussion, RPP leader Bulent Ecevit pointed out that unlike the previous group meetings, this time the participants discussed the intraparty opposition frankly and extensively. Noting that he was not nervous during the general discussion or duringthe intraparty criticisms, Ecevit said: I was only nervous that these criticisms might reach dimensions that could damage the party.

Referring to the RPP's social organization problems, Ecevit said that the party had certain deficiencies regarding the issue. He pointed out that the cooperation of a democratic leftist party with leftist circles outside the party increased the middle classes' fear of communism. He added: I do not know of any democratic leftist, democratic or democratic socialist party that has become stronger, that has come to power or, even if it has come to power, that has remained in power through cooperation with leftist circles outside it.

FOREIGN MINISTER ERKMEN LEAVES FOR OFFICIAL VISIT TO ROMANIA

[Text] Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen left today for a 4-day official visit to Romania as the official guest of Romanian Foreign Minister Stefan Andrei. A delegation of Foreign Ministry officials is accompanying the foreign minister. In a statement before his departure at Ankara's Esenboga Airport Erkmen said:

[Begin recording] I am leaving for Romania on an official visit. I shall visit Bucharest for 2 days. During my stay in Romania we shall have talks with Romanian foreign minister Andrei. I shall also be received by Romanian President Nicolae Ceausescu. World issues and international relations as well as bilateral subjects will be discussed during the talks. No problems exist between Turkey and Romania on the political field. Though Turkey has no border with Romania, the two countries are situated in the same region. Romania is a country in our region with which we have had good relations all along. Bilateral relations are directed toward promoting trade relations. We shall express our views and make our proposals with this principle in mind. I am confident that our proposals will be received with full understanding and that we shall decide upon the most practical and swift measures to insure cooperation between the two countries. Review of Relations

TA151952 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1480 GMT 15 Jul 80

[Text] In connection with Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen's official visit to Romania, we would like to review relations between Turkey and Romania. Foreign Ministry Publications and Information Department Director Akgun Teciman said the following on this subject:

[Begin recording] In accordance with its policy of cooperation and neighborliness in the Balkans, Turkey has regularly improved its relations with Romania. Bilateral relations, which are progressing satisfactorily are based on the principles of respect and cooperation stated in the joint Turkish-Romanian declaration signed during Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel's visit to Romania on 29 August 1975.

Turkey, which lays great importance on security and cooperation in the Balkans, observes the same concern in Romania. Trade between our country and Romania is based on a long-term agreement signed in 1970. Trade and economic relations between the two countries are on a high level. Romania is one of our most significant trade partners among the socialist countries. Economic cooperation with Romania exists in the fields of energy, industry, tourism, communication, food and agriculture. The most intensified cooperation between the two countries exists in the energy field. The building of the central Anatolia refinery is the main project in this field. Efforts are also being made to promote cooperation in oil exploration. In 1979 the trade volume between the two countries reached $273 million. Though this amount is satisfactory, the fact that Turkey always has a deficit in its trade relations with Romania makes it imperative to have a more balanced regulation of these relations. Our foreign minister's visit to Romania is expected to prepare the ground for an extensive exchange of views on international subjects and for beneficial steps in bilateral relations particularly in the economic field. [end recording]

U-2'S CREATING DIFFICULTIES FOR KIPRIANOU, DEMIREL

NC151243 Istanbul CUMHURIYET in Turkish 14 Jul 80 p 3

["The World Today" column by Ali Sirmen: "Kiprianou's Zigzags"]

[Excerpts] Greek Cypriot leader Spiros Kiprianou is in a pretty tight position today. Following the withdrawal of AKEL's support from the government and the intolerably arrogant attitude of the fascist forces on the island, Kiprianou has been doing nothing but delivering speech after speech. As if this was not enough, the Soviet Union, which has been very particular about the island's independent and nonalignment since the days of Makarios, and has used its influence in the arena of international politics in this respect, has unilaterally withdrawn an invitation extended to the Greek Cypriot leader to visit Moscow.

The reason for this withdrawal is the silence that the Greek Cypriot leader has been maintaining about the flights of American U-2 planes from the British bases and his indirect expressions of approval for such flights.

On the one hand, Kiprianou talks about his determination to prevent the island from becoming an arms depot and an unsinkable aircraft carrier and he pledges to keep it independent and nonaligned. On the other hand, he gives his implicit blessing to the spy planes taking off from the British bases in Cyprus. This is not an easily explainable contrast. It is this contrast that pushes Kiprianou into an impasse. The interesting side of this situation is that Kiprianou has inherited this contrast from Makarios. After the Turkish "peace operation," Makarios extended monitoring facilities to the CIA in the Greek Cypriot sector. Makarios could not stand on his feet without AKEL's support, yet he would not object to the arbitrary acts of the members of the "national guard" smuggled onto the island by the fascist colonels' junta. Now Kiprianou is playing the same game. Earlier he allowed NATO countries to establish monitoring bases in the guise of radio stations, and now the question concerning U-2 flights has emerged.

The U-2 flights have deprived Kiprianou of AKEL's support at home. The Greek Cypriot administration is bound to face new difficulties in the international arena.

Another interesting aspect of the issue is the problem that the Greek Cypriot administration will face among the nonaligned countries, of which Cyprus is a member. Undoubtedly the nonaligned countries will not welcome the implicit consent of a country that authorizes U-2 flights.

Kiprianou's zigzags could afford great opportunities to Turkey and the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus for attracting the Greek Cypriots to the negotiating table for a settlement of the Cyprus issue. But unfortunately, just like the rightist governments of the past, which had failed to turn to good account Makarios' inconsequent policies, today there is also a rightist government in power in our country which is unable to take advantage of Kiprianou's contradictory behavior. Like Kiprianou, Suleyman Demirel also seems to be preparing to plunge into the quagmire of the U-2's. This is the most unfortunate aspect of the situation for us.

GENSCHER, POLISH OFFICIAL DISCUSS MOSCOW TALKS, CSCE

[Text] Bonn--The recent Moscow visit by Chancellor Schmidt and Foreign Minister Genscher was a major topic at an exchange of views between Genscher and Polish Deputy Foreign Minister [director of the minister's cabinet of the Polish Ministry of Foreign Affairs] Jozef Czyrek, in Bonn today. According to the Foreign Ministry, both ministers emphasized the importance of the dialogue between East and West, especially in difficult periods. Genscher and Czyrek also agreed that the CSCE followup conference in Madrid in November is of particular signficance and must therefore take place. The federal foreign minister called for a thorough and balanced discussion of further developments and the issuing of a mandate for a disarmament conference in Europe which will have to provide for confidence-building measures for all of Europe. In the Federal Government's view the Madrid meeting should be held at the foreign ministers' level.

According to the Foreign Ministry both Genscher and Czyrek paid tribute to German-Polish relations as a factor of detente in Europe. Genscher drew the attention of his guest to the importance of humanitarian questions. He expressed the hope that the Polish side will continue to apply the protocol on ethnic Germans leaving Poland in the spirit of the "hold open clause" which will promote bilateral relations still further.

GENSCHER LEAVES FOR 3-DAY VISIT TO SFRY

LD170850 Hamburg DPA in German 0743 GMT 17 Jul 80

[Text] Bonn--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher left this morning for a 3-day official visit to Belgrade. He will hold talks with Yugoslav Foreign Minister Vrhovec and other leading state and party representatives. It is assumed that the main topic will be East-West relations, and in this connection the recent Moscow visit by the federal chancellor.

SPOKESMAN COMMENTS ON TALKS IN IRAN ON PHARMACEUTICAL FIRMS

[Text] Bonn--The German Embassy in Tehran has held initial talks with Iranian Government authorities on the measures taken in Iran against branches of German pharmaceutical firms. The Foreign Ministry spokesman told the press today that the talks had resulted in preliminary explanations. The whole matter, however, still "needs further clarification."

The spokesman stressed that he was not yet in a position to give detailed information regarding the state of affairs in connection with Iran's measures against the firms. An assessment of all the proceedings as such could therefore not be made either. According to him, embassy representatives in their talks to date with the Iranian authorities have pointed to the existing German-Iranian investment protection agreement. Under this agreement, Tehran would be obliged to provide compensation in the event of nationalization. CSU Deputy Michael Glos also pointed this out in Bonn on Tuesday.

PAPERS COMMENT ON REGAN'S REPUBLICAN NOMINATION

DW170933 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 17 Jul 80

[Press review on the Detroit Republican convention]

[Excerpt] KOELNISCHER RUNDSCHAU writes: To some people the idea may be a nightmare that the future president of the United States and thus the top leader of the Western world could turn out to be an aging motion picture actor. This is not particularly encouraging. But neither is there any call to turn up one's nose or be amused by this idea, because it is much too important for us who the master of the White House in the near future is going to be. The best man is just good enough, but probably the best man for this powerful and responsible office will never be found. The paper goes on to say: Ronald Reagan, who is somewhat old fashioned and officious, on the one hand, while being very self-confident, on the other, fits into a trend which is becoming increasingly evident in the United States, namely, the longing for orderly conditions and old splendor. This is a natural reaction to developments in which the American citizen has been hit hard in the past few years on domestic policy in general, and in economic policy in particular, and often enough has been humilated overseas.

HANNOVERSCHE NEUE PRESSE asks: The United States, a world power on the decline? Many Americans resist with real stubbornness the idea of having to play a more modest role in the concert of nations in the future. Rarely has this become more obvious than lately at the Republican convention in Detroit. Delegates seeking salvation cling again to the quasi-theological assumptions about the role of the United States in the world which determined the activities of the governments in Washington up to the defeat in Vietnam. These represent simple answers to complicated questions instead of a rational approach to the problems. The party convention goes into jubilation for a Ronald Reagan who has changed his makeup from actor to politician, for a dangerous extremist who wants to reclaim the old greatness for the United States through his crusade.

Discussing Reagan's program, NUERNBERGER NACHRICHTEN notes: The whole election platform adopted without great debate by the Republican convention in Detroit bears the candidate's hallmark. The simple messages promulgated by Ronald Reagan wherever he appears have been turned into a conglomerate of conservative theses, unattainable promises and unrealistic hopes. Besides, there is a whiff of socioreformist new deal along the lines of a F.D. Roosevelt in the form of drastic tax cuts. The contradictions are obvious, but this apparently did not bother the delegates.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG writes: Reagan's advocates all argue in terms of world events. They attack Carter in the foreign policy field. Will the presidential elections in November, against all American custom, be won or lost this time on foreign policy considerations? The obviously deteriorating power of the country and its relations with the Soviet Union seem to be the main aspects for many voters. They have been late in noticing this, but they have noticed it after all.

AUGSBURGER ALLGEMEINE notes: America under Reagan would give far more priority to negotiations from a position of strength. The efforts of the United States--efforts that have been started anyway--to close the gaps with regard to missiles, bombers and ships, would be intensified enormously. The conservatives believe anyway that this would be good for the economy, that it would decrease the number of unemployed and that it would make America great again. There will be changes anyway, regardless of whether Carter or Reagan takes the oath on 20 January 1981. The change of mood in this country can be clearly felt. It is a widely popular wish to become number one again. The American giant is stirring.

BULGARIA's BOZHINOV TALKS WITH PCI LEADERS, CONFERS AWARD

LD170921 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 11 Jul 80 p 16

[Unattributed report: "Luigi Longo Awarded 'Dimitrov Order'"]

[Text] Rome--Comrade Todor Bozhinov, Bulgarian Communist Party Politburo member and first deputy chairman of the Bulgarian Council of Ministers, has conferred on PCI Chairman Comrade Luigi Longo the "Georgi Dimitrov order," the highest decoration of the Bulgarian state, whose government awarded it to him on his 80th birthday. The ceremony was attended by, among others, Bulgarian Ambassador Venelin Kotsev and PCI Secretariat member Comrade Pio La Torre.

Comrade Bozhinov, who is in Italy on a brief vacation, has also had a meeting at PCI Directorate Headquarters with directorate member Comrade Gianfranco Borghini and economic section aide Comrade Domenico Gravano and a meeting with central committee member and Foreign Section Chief Comrade Antonio Rubbi.

SOMALI FOREIGN MINISTER LEAVES ROME AFTER OFFICIAL VISIT

The Somali Ambassador to Rome Salah Mohamed Ali said in a press conference today that the talks focused on problems of common interest, bolstering economic and technical cooperation between the two nations and other bilateral issues. The ambassador also criticized the "conspiracy of silence" on border clashes between Somalia and Ethiopia and asserted that in the last three years the Ethiopian Air Force has carried out eighty incursions on Somali territory which claimed the lives of at least 200 persons and serious damage.

COLOMBO SPEAKS ON EEC CHAIRMANSHIP IN SENATE

AU161925 Rome ANSA in English 1915 GMT 16 Jul 80

[Text] Rome, 16 Jul (ANSA)--Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo today delivered his reply at the end of the Senate debate on foreign policy focusing on the results of the six-month Italian duty chairmanship of the European Economic Community which wound up at the end of June, on the Afghan crisis and East-West relations.

Colombo underscored the "flattering opinions" expressed on the Italian chairmanship by the other EEC partners and, referring to the "individual initiatives" of Paris and Bonn, voiced "satisfaction" if they serve to stimulate European integration but also "fear" "should they signify the creation of an exclusive leadership."

As for East-West relations, the Italian minister said that the government has "always urged ratification of the SALT Two strategic arms limitation accords between the United States and the Soviet Union" and that "the essential point of Italian foreign policy remains pursuing peace and detente."

With respect to Afghanistan, Colombo said that "thus far the Soviet Union has made no overtures on this problem".

In a polemic with the Communist Party, which has been very critical of what it claims is Italian subservience to United States policy, Colombo said these criticisms are "slogans to be rejected" and reiterated the validity of the "Western solidarity" option.

PCI, PSI AIR DIFFERENCES OVER COMMUNISTS' TIES WITH MOSCOW

LD171011 [Editorial Report] Rome AVANTI in Italian 12 July 1980 carries on pages 1 and 6 a 700-word "F.Go." commentary on the 10 July joint communique on PCI-CPSU talks in Moscow, criticizing its "many silences and reticences" "on issues such as the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, the harsh criticism of Eurocommunism and Moscow's angry reaction to Berlinguer's visit to China," which, the commentator claims, "clearly reveal the limits of the PCI's autonomy." The commitment contained in the communique to oppose "every policy of hostility against the Soviet Union and the socialist countries," he adds, implies "a homage to the 'untouchability' of Soviet foreign policy" and means that "in the future the CPSU can easily reproach the Italian Communists with betraying the Moscow communique if they question the legitimacy of the intervention in Afghanistan."

A 600-word unattributed reply, published on page 16 of Rome L'UNITA on 13 July, points out that AVANTI "mutilates" the communique, explaining that the "policy of hostility" referred to "is reflected mainly in acts of reprisal aimed at reducing economic and cultural relations and every form of cooperation" and asks: "Are we to deduce that the Italian Government and AVANTI are in favor of a policy of reprisals, inimical acts and reducing all forms of cooperation?" If not, L'UNITA asks, "why does AVANTI criticize the document and reproach us for its content?" L'UNITA points out that "the PCI's stances on Afghanistan are well known, and so are the CPSU's" and asks "where is the possibility of an ambiguous interpretation of the communique," when it states that "the two delegations confirmed and illustrated their respective stances on several issues connected with the international situation and international policy"?

BERLINGUER URGES EUROPEAN AUTONOMY IN STRASBOURG SPEECH

LD161021 [Editorial Report] Milan L'UNITA in Italian 9 July 1980 carries on pages 1 and 19 a 1,500-word unattributed report on PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer's 8 July address to the European Parliament in Strasbourg, headlined: "Community in Crisis, Must Adopt Another Role." Berlinguer reportedly highlighted some of the EEC's economic problems and called for "the full affirmation of the specific autonomous role which Europe deserves in world life as a whole." He reasserted his party's stance on Afghanistan and praised governments and forces which, "even within the context of the Atlantic alliance and observance of its obligations, have managed to resist the U.S. injunctions and pressures." He apparently called on the European Council of Ministers to "define a positive and open line for the Madrid conference," to be debated by the European Parliament.

FRG PRESIDENT ADDRESSES PORTUGUESE NATIONAL ASSEMBLY

[Excerpts] Members of Portugal's adjourned Assembly of the Republic returned to their seats yesterday to attend a special parliamentary welcome for FRG President Karl Carstens on the 2d day of his 3-day state visit. The session was also attended by Prime Minister Sa Carneiro, the president of the supreme court, members of the Council of the Revolution, the three services chiefs and the diplomatic corps accredited to Portugal.

Addressing the house, the FRG president drew a dismal picture of the international situation, which is marked by great imbalances. [begin Carstens recording in German with superimposed Portuguese translation] The situation in the world today is disquieting. Suffice it to mention Afghanistan, the hostages in Iran, the Middle East conflict and the developments in Southeast Asia. The plight of the majority of developing countries is getting worse, on the one hand, as a result of a demographic explosion, and, on the other hand, due to the enormous rise in the price of oil. This disquieting situation has come about in an era in which man has reached the moon and huge arsenals of arms are being built while hundreds of millions of people go hungry. [end recording]

This speech was also marked by three keynotes: two matters which primarily interest the Portuguese and another concerning the specific issue of divided Germany.

The Common Market and NATO: West Germany's stand as far as Portugal is concerned is clear. Carstens said: We shall also assist in the pursuit of the course which, in keeping with your and our wishes, will make you a member of the European Community. The European Community is not merely an economic community, but also represents a step toward Europe's political union. It is our objective to gradually create a politically united Europe where the multiplicity of cultures and the diversity of the ways of life of member states are preserved.

Portugal's entry into the European Community is not only in its own interests but also in the interests of the Community, which Portugal will enrich with its vast cultural heritage, its great experience and its diverse international relations.

On NATO, Carstens said that West Germany and Portugal are already cooperating in the Atlantic alliance. This cooperation must (?be followed up). NATO is only a defensive organization, driving against no one and threatening no one. But NATO is indispensable in upholding peace and maintaining our security.

Germany's division is a painful matter for the Germans. Carstens said: Our country remains divided. The burden of division is becoming cumbersome to the people, despite the fact that in the last few years it has been possible to intensify and increase reciprocal contacts. Our policy continues to be aimed at working for peace in Europe in which our people will be able to restore their unity by their freely expressed wish.

Concluding his speech, the FRG president paid tribute to the Portuguese people, for their history, courage, moderation and humanism.

Carstens, Sa Carneiro Luncheon Speeches

LD162144 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1900 GMT 16 Jul 80

[Text] West German President Karl Carstens, who is visiting Portugal at the invitation of President Ramalho Eanes, today was the guest of honor at a luncheon in Sintra Palace hosted by Prime Minister Sa Carneiro.

Speaking on the occasion the West German president stressed that Portugal's accession to the EEC will be beneficial both to us and the Community. Addressing the head of government and Foreign Minister Freitas do Amaral, Karl Carstens touched upon the issue of European unification in which, he said, Portugal and West Germany have a common role to play. In another part of his speech Karl Carstens referred to Portugal's African experience, its special relations with Brazil and other Latin American countries and above all to Portugal itself, its land and people, as some of our Portugal's potential contributions to the EEC.

In connection with the problems raised by the accession of new members to the EEC, the West German president recalled the Brussels resolution which points to the need for structural changes within the Community, particularly in the agricultural and financial spheres. For this reason, he said, negotiations should not be delayed, and added that in his country's opinion the accession negotiations should continue without delays and that the appropriate EEC bodies should (?vote) on the resolutions within the scheduled timetable.

Expressing his admiration for Portugal which, in such a short period of time and despite so many ups and downs, has managed to create since 25 April 1974 a pluralist democracy, Carstens said that both Portugal and West Germany share the same basic beliefs and values of human dignity, freedom and justice. In conclusion he assured his host of his country's intention to assist Portugal both in the economic and defense spheres within the framework of NATO.

Prime Minister Sa Carneiro said the West German president's visit to Portugal is a way to enhance cooperation of which we are proud and which we wish to see extended and deepened in various fields. The current defense efforts of the allied countries corresponds to a realistic view of the present situation, and we shall support it in the context of NATO, he added. Only from a position of equal strength will the allied democracies be able to defend their values, the prime minister said.

Sa Carneiro also spoke about the attempt to crush [words indistinct] and freedom in Afghanistan and about the violation of human rights in Iran. In both cases, he said, we can see the firm way West Germany has defined its stance, thus contributing to the West's strength. Sa Carneiro also mentioned Portugal's wish to contribute to building a new Europe capable of being more than just an economic community and reaffirmed his government's solidarity with those wishing to progress in that direction and with those who wish to use the present moment to advance toward common strategies based on the common wish to turn the EEC into the greatest economic bloc of the world.

After recalling the support given by the FRG to Portugal in its bid for EEC membership, Sa Carneiro said: Today we have a wide consensus on this matter and once again we are certain that the quality of our relations will reflect on the way the process of our country's accession will develop in the short term.

CHIEF DELEGATE CITES EFFECT OF NATO, AFGHANISTAN AT CSCE

LD170917 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 13 Jul 80 pp 1, 3

[Soledad Gallego-Diaz dispatch: "Government Will Present Entry Into NATO as Organic Law"]

[Excerpt] Brussels--The Suarez government will propose to parliament that Spain's accession to the Washington Treaty (NATO) requires the same treatement as an organic law, so that our country's entry will be decided on not by a simple majority but by an absolute majority, that is, 176 of the 350 deputies. This was stated in Brussels yesterday by Javier Ruperez, head of the Spanish delegation to the Madrid CSCE and member of the Union of the Democratic Center Executive Committee.

Ruperez, an expert on matters concerning the Helsinki Final Act and a member of the Spanish delegations which went to the Finnish capital and Belgrade, expressed the view that the procedure according to which entry should take place will be debated at the same time as the debate on Spain's entry into NATO.

Ruperez added that the foreign minister's recent reaffirmation of the Suarez government's Atlanticist policy "need not influence the course of the Madrid conference favorably or unfavorably, and in the meetings which I have just held in Belgrade and Vienna I did not detect the slightest apprehension or doubt about Spain's right to accede or not accede to a treaty of alliance." "I personally believe that Yugoslavia's future is totally unconnected with Spain's decisions."

The head of the Spanish delegation, who will meet with a Soviet delegation in Paris next week, confirmed that as a result of the Afghanistan invasion the preparations for the Madrid conference were suspended for 4 months in many European capitals, in view of doubt about whether the conference would be held. "The most critical moment is now over," he added, "initially, some countries contemplated 'punishing' Moscow by postponing the CSCE, but they have subsequently become convinced that the conference has merits in itself and could give rise to new initiatives for detente."

Javier Ruperez asserted that a moderate stance has finally prevailed among the European allies over more radical stances, which were prepared to focus the Madrid conference almost exclusively on the appraisal of the implementation of the previous agreements and, of course, on the grave violation of human rights and international law represented by the Afghanistan crisis.

"Afghanistan will continue to have a considerable influence," he continued, "but if we want the Madrid conference to be a success the European allies believe it is necessary to maintain the balance among the three 'baskets' of the Helsinki Final Act: Military measures to promote mutual confidence, cooperation, and human rights."

Ruperez added that, although the most acute point of the crisis has been surmounted, the international circumstances will cause the Madrid CSCE to proceed with a high level of confrontation. According to the talks which he has held with senior NATO leaders, the allied strategy is aimed at a first stage "substantially dominated by the Afghanistan issue."

The timetable envisaged for the conference begins on 9 September with the opening of the preparatory session, at which a schedule for the proceedings will be drawn up.

One of the aims of the Madrid conference will be to lay the foundations for a subsequent security conference, institutionally linked with the CSCE, at which, as France proposes, new confidence-building military measures could be studied, among other matters.

CARRINGTON ON GOVERNMENT, EC STANDS ON MIDEAST

[Mahir 'Uthman untitled report on press conference given by British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington in London on 14 July]

[Text] British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington yesterday afternoon held a press conference in his House of Lords office that was attended by 10 Arab journalists including ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT's correspondent. The following are details of the conference:

Question: How far have you gone after the Venice summit with regard to the Middle East problem? Having issued the statement are you now waiting for the results of the U.S. elections?

Answer: Waiting was not our objective. We have been thinking (since the Venice meeting) about subsequent steps and are holding talks in this regard. On 22 July the EEC foreign ministers will meet in Luxembourg, when I believe we will be making some decision on how exactly we will proceed at the next stage. The committee (fact-finding mission) will represent the EEC countries and will hold contacts. We will decide at our meeting with whom the committee will hold contacts and under what arrangements. Obviously the committee will meet with all the parties concerned, and we hope that all the parties will agree to meet the committee. We believe that this is the right method. One of the things we would like to clarify is the question of terminology and meanings. What does each party, for example, mean by what has become commonly known as "the right to self-determination"? Every party means something different by it than the term used by another party.

Question: What is your comment on Begin's remarks about you in response to your advice in an interview with Israeli television not to move his office to East Jerusalem, and what is the British Government's attitude to this?

Answer: I am somewhat surprised by Begin's and Shamir's remarks. Our policy toward the West Bank and Jerusalem is the policy of successive British Governments of various complexions.

Question: How far are you prepared to stand against Israel?

Answer: I don't know what you mean by "against." The British Government's attitude toward the West Bank is well known, and the question of standing "against" does not arise at all for us, since we do not recognize Israel's occupation of the West Bank and Jerusalem. This has been the attitude of successive British Governments. What we are seeking to do is not to stand against any party but to persuade every party to proceed toward a specific goal. Certainly our experience in settling problems over the years has taught us that the parties stand very far apart at the beginning which makes one feel that it is impossible to settle the dispute. But if no effort is made to ascertain the lowest or the highest common denominator, then no agreement can be reached. At present the parties seem to be very far apart.

Question: Do you believe that the steps you are about to take might be wasted should the situation in the area explode at the hands of one party or another, which might bring pressure on you to expedite the present steps?

Answer: I hope that the situation will not explode, that self-restraint (in the area) will prevail, and that a situation will prevail in the Middle East that will enable the EEC committee to fulfill its tasks. But I believe that none of us is unaware of the increasing tension and the existing dangers, which is one of the reasons that led us to believe that we can help (in solving the problem) in this manner.

Question: How do you evaluate the PLO's reaction to the Venice declaration?

Answer: I do not think the PLO's public reaction was as favorable as we thought it would be. Nor do I think that the Israelis' reaction was as favorable as we hoped. I hope that this is not either side's final word. But I believe that the sort of declaration issued by the Fatah movement (in Damascus) does not make it easy to find a solution, if the words used were to be taken literally.

Question (by ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT): What has in fact delayed British and EEC recognition of the PLO, particularly since we hear from time to time from responsible people like yourself that the PLO does exist, that it cannot be ignored, and that it represents the Palestinians?

Answer: You have said (in the question) what the Europeans have already said, which is: Obviously the PLO represents in the problem as a whole an element that cannot be ignored. It is a strong representative of Palestinian opinion. Nobody can deny or disagree with this fact. Some people may not like it, but that is the reality. The Europeans have therefore agreed to accept these realities. As I have said on many occasions, when people talk about "terrorists" or "guerrillas" or "freedom fighters" or any other name--and I have spent the past 15 months sitting with them and found nothing terrible about them--the man whom one person might consider a "terrorist" could in the view of another be a "freedom fighter" and, suddenly, within a few weeks could be holding some post or another.

Question (by ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT): What is then delaying the official EEC recognition of the PLO?

Answer: I do not think that recognition at present, or at any other time, would serve any purpose. As a state we do not recognize organizations; we recognize states. We have never recognized organizations.

Question: A large segment of Arab opinion says that the European countries revolve in the U.S. sphere of influence and therefore will bring nothing new with regard to the Middle East.

Answer: My answer to this is that it is untrue. The Israeli claim, on the other hand, that we are influenced by the Arabs is also untrue. The fact that all these parties are criticizing us probably proves that we are following the right course.

Question: How would you describe your relations with Saudi Arabia?

Answer: Obviously they are not as good as they ought to be. We have been unable to return our ambassador to the Saudi Arabian Kingdom, and no Saudi ambassador has been appointed to London. This is indeed unfortunate, because Saudi Arabia is important in relation to all the Middle East problems in general. I hope that before long relations will again be as good as they were before that incident.

NKOMO RETURNS TO LONDON AFTER VISIT TO LIBYA

LD161436 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1400 GMT 16 Jul 80

[By Tom McMullan, PA diplomatic correspondent]

[Text] Mr Joshua Knomo, Zimbabwe's minister of home affairs, is back in London following his weekend visit to Libya.

Mr Nkomo, who arrived in London unexpectedly last week, said today that he has no plans to meet British ministers. The Foreign Office was in touch with him last week but no meeting took place.

Mr Nkomo said he would be in London for a day or two and would probably visit one or two other countries before returning to Salisbury. He would not say which countries he intended to visit.

There has been speculation that Mr Knomo is seeking to ensure that his forces in Zimbabwe are in good shape in case the dissention between his supporters and those of Prime Minister Mr Robert Mugabe leads to clashes.

However, Mr Nkomo today declined to talk about his visit to Libya. He said: "I am visiting a number of countries I have worked with in the past. I want to say a thank you to them for what they have done for Zimbabwe".

Asked if, as a minister, he was travelling as an emissary of the government, he replied: "I did not say that".

OFFICIAL STATEMENT ISSUED ON IRISH OLYMPIC POSITION

LD161434 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1352 GMT 16 Jul 80

[Excerpt] The Irish Republic is joining the EEC boycott of the Olympic games, a Dublin government spokesman said today.

An official statement clarifying the position of Ireland's ambassador in Moscow, Mr Edward Brennan, was issued after reports that the Irish would be the only Common Market members represented at diplomatic level at the Olympics. The statement said the envoy and his wife had been instructed not to attend the games or any connected ceremonies and receptions. The directive extended to clerical and secretarial staff at the Irish Embassy in the Soviet capital.

The statement, from the Irish Department of Foreign Affairs, made it clear though that there were no plans to bring home Mr Brennan as a protest. He would continue to carry out his normal duties during the Olympics.

The spokesman said the Kremlin was aware of Ireland's policy on the games and the absence of the envoy from the various functions was "a clear and adequate expression of the government's position."

DENKTAS OPTIMISTIC ABOUT SUMMIT MEETINGS WITH KIPRIANOU

TA161206 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 16 Jul 80

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has said that the recent contacts of the Libyan foreign minister, Mr At-Turayki, in Nicosia with the two Cypriot communities have increased the possibility of a summit in Libya between him and the Greek Cypriot leader, Mr Kiprianou. Mr Denktas was speaking after a meeting with the Libyan charge d'affaires in Nicosia, Mr Azzabi, this morning. The president told correspondents that the aim of the proposed summit was to speed up the efforts toward the goal set by the principles laid down in the Denktas-Makarios and Denktas-Kiprianou agreements. This goal was to establish a bicommunal, bizonal, independent and nonaligned federal state in Cyprus. It would include the guarantee provided by Turkey which would prevent the union of Cyprus with any other country in any way.

Referring to Mr At-Turayki's visit to Cyprus which ended yesterday, Mr Denktas said that the Cyprus reality could not be fully realized without an on-the-spot study of the problem and that from that point of view Mr At-Turayki's visit had been useful. When asked about the date of the proposed summit, the president replied that it could take place in the course of time.

TURKISH CYPRIOT DELEGATION CONCLUDES TALKS ON EEC AGREEMENT

TA121647 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 12 Jul 80

[Text] The talks between the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus and the EEC have been concluded in Brussels and the Turkish Cypriot delegation has returned to Lefkosa [Nicosia]. The Foreign Ministry official in charge of EEC affairs, Ahmet Barut, who attended the meeting in Brussels, made a statement to the TRT in which he said that EEC officials showed understanding regarding the requests of the Turkish Cypriot community. He added that this does not mean that they will go on to the second phase of the Cyprus association agreement and that, even if this transition were realized, a joint customs tariff could not be realized between Cyprus and EEC countries. The first phase of the Cyprus-EEC association agreement was concluded at the end of 1977, but transition to the second phase was postponed to 1 January 1981 due to the political situation in Cyprus.

YUGOSLAVIA'S DJURANOVIC CITES GOOD RELATIONS DURING STOPOVER

[Text] The president of the Yugoslav Federal Executive Council, Veselin Djuranovic, stopped over in Ankara at 1520 on his way to Baghdad where he will attend Iraq's National Day ceremonies. He was received at Ankara's Esenboga Airport by Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel and members of the Turkish Foreign Ministry as well as by members of the Yugoslav Embassy in Ankara. In a statement before his meeting with Djuranovic, Demirel said that efforts will continue to further develop the friendly relations between Turkey and Yugoslavia. He pointed out that he had held bilateral talks on various international questions with Djuranovic during his visit to Belgrade for the funeral of the late Marshal Tito. Demirel said that the present meeting will be a continuation of the contacts which were begun in Belgrade.

The president of the Yugoslav Federal Executive Council stated that the good relations between Turkey and Yugoslavia are contributing to regional and world peace. Noting that the world was going through a period of strained international relations, Djuranovic said that his government agrees with the Turkish Government that the relations between the two countries can be raised to a more advanced level. He then expressed his pleasure at being in Turkey once again. The meeting between Demirel and Djuranovic lasted about 1 hour and ended at 1630. Djuranovic then left for Iraq.

CULTURE MINISTER KORALTAN LEAVES FOR TALKS IN GREECE

TA161127 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 16 Jul 80

[Text] Culture Minister Tevfik Koraltan left for Greece by air today to participate in the opening of the Alexander the Great Exposition which is being held in Thessalonica. During his stay the culture minister will hold talks with Greek officials on the issue of cultural relations between the two countries. Koraltan will also visit the house in which Ataturk was born and which has now been restored as a museum.

GREEK TOURISM OFFICIALS ARRIVE FOR COOPERATION TALKS

TA151954 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 15 Jul 80

[Text] Talks aimed at promoting relations on tourism between Turkey and Greece will begin in Ankara tomorrow. Greek National Tourism Organization Administrative Council Director Yeoryios Dhafkalakis and the same organization's foreign relations directors, (Evthimios Pirlas) arrived in Istanbul today to participate in the talks. The two Greek tourism officials will meet Tourism and Information Minister Barlas Kuntay tomorrow. The issue of which steps to take to begin and promote tourism between Turkey and Greece will be taken up during these talks. Details of cooperation on tourism between the two countries will be discussed by the Turkish and Greek delegations in 2 days of talks in Ankara. Tourism and Information Ministry Under Secretary Kemal Baytas and Prof Dhafkalakis will be heading the Turkish and Greek delegations respectively.

Promotion of Cooperation

TA161305 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 16 Jul 80

[Text] Talks on the issue of resuming cooperation between Turkey and Greece in the field of tourism began in Ankara today. Tourism and Information Minister Barlas Kuntay received the Greek delegation headed by Greek National Tourism Organization Director Yeoryios Dhafkalakis before the talks started.

In a statement during the meeting, Kuntay said that details on cooperation in the sphere of tourism between the two countries will be discussed in talks to be held by the two delegations. In reply Dhafkalakis said that his country is ready for full cooperation with Turkey on the subject of tourism. Recalling that Turkey and Greece have the necessary geographic and historic qualifications to become the tourism center of the region, Dhafkalakis said that principles that will best serve both countries' interests in this subject will be taken up in tall between the delegations.

In reply to a question on incidents which occurred during the Turkish ship Gemlik's arrival at Rhodes, a Greek tourism official said: We are ready to do everything in a bid to promote our relations with Turkey. Safeguarding visitors is a Greek tradition. The Greek people will not now change this centuries-old habit. Commenting on the same incidents, Tourism and Information Minister Kuntay said that the incidents are regrettable and added that he expects the Greek Government to take the necessary measures. Talks between the Turkish and Greek tourism delegations began later at the Foreign Ministry.

EUROPEAN INVESTMENT BANK GRANTS $172 MILLION LOAN

TA141713 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 14 Jul 80

[Text] A loan of $172 million has been secured from the European Investment Bank to finance the Karakaya dam and certain private sector investment projects. The agreement concerning the loan, which is being extended within the framework of the third financial protocol between Turkey and the EEC, was signed in Brussels today. The agreement was signed by Turkey's permanent representative to the EEC, Ambassador Cenap Keskin, and European Investment Bank officials. According to a statement by the Finance Ministry, of the $172 million, $110 million will be used to finance the imports necessary for the Karakaya dam and hydroelectric power station which is being built on the Firat River. The loan will be extended for a period of 40 years, with a 10-year grace period, at a 2.5 percent interest rate. The other $62 million will be used to finance the imports for certain private sector investment projects and the paper and carton installations in Dalaman.

RPP ORGANS, ASSEMBLY COUNCIL DISCUSS KILLING OF DEPUTY

[Text] The authorized organs of the RPP are discussing the killing of RPP Deputy Abdurrahman Koksaloglu from Istanbul. The RPP General Administrative Council met at the parliament at 0900 to discuss the issue. A three-man delegation composed of members of the administrative council has been sent to Istanbul to conduct an on-the-spot investigation of the incident. After the 2-hour administrative council meeting the RPP Senate and Assembly groups met in extraordinary session. Deputy leader of the Assembly group Coskun Karagozoglu, who was chairing the joint group meeting, the first part of which was open to the press, said that it was the first time in the history of the republic that a parliamentarian was killed as a result of anarchy. Karagozoglu added that the attack against Koksaloglu was actually directed against the parliamentary democracy, the regime and the national will. After the joint group meeting paid tribute to Koksaloglu, RPP leader Bulent Ecevit made a statement.

Meanwhile the National Assembly Chairmanship Council met under Assembly President Cahit Karakas at 1100 to discuss the killing of Koksaloglu by terrorists. Ecevit called on Karakas prior to the chairmanship council meeting and conferred with him for some time. In a statement in connection with the chairmanship council meeting Karakas said that it was the first time in the history of the National Assembly that one of its members had become a victim of anarchy and that this grave incident will be discussed at the meeting. A statement in connection with the assembly chairmanship council meeting will be issued at 1330.

National Unity Group leader Fahri Ozdilek and a representative of the presidentially appointed senators, Fahri Coker, called on Ecevit separately. Ozdilek and Coker expressed their grief over the incident and extended their condolences.

RPP Assembly Walkout

TA161651 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 16 Jul 80

[Excerpt] A minute of silence was observed at the joint session of the Senate and the National Assembly today in memory of RPP Deputy Abdurrahman Koksaloglu from Istanbul, who was killed yesterday, and of JP Deputy Ahmet Hamdi Sancar from Denizli, who died a short while ago. The RPP senators and deputies then left the hall because the government did not inform parliament about the murder of Abdurrahman Koksaloglu and because it did not express its grief over the incident.

CUMHURIYET CRITICIZES INTERIOR MINISTER FOR BIAS TOWARD RIGHT

NC170913 Istanbul CUMHURIYET in Turkish 16 Jul 80 p 1, 9

["The Truth Behind the Events" column--unattributed]

[Text] The behavior and the utterances of the interior minister have added new dimensions to anarchy and terrorism in Turkey. At the very least the biased attitude of the prime minister and his interior minister toward terrorism is as dangerous and has had as destructive an effect on the future of the state as terrorism itself. It is apparent that an administrative system that seeks to put a end to the Turkish [illegible]ublic as a state of law is trying to dominate the state. Interior Minister Mustafa [illegible]gil has made this statement: "The Corum incidents were plotted by the leftis[illegible] they were intended to destroy the state. A rightist group motivated by the thoug[illegible]pporting the state has opposed them."

Honorable Gulcugil's approach to the incidents is interesting. According to the interior minister's logic the RPP parliamentarians wounded one another in the Nevsehir incidents. The rightists who tried to help the state in Corum were subjected to savage and indiscriminate killing. Masked rightist militants participated in operations in Fatsa in order to assist the state.

It is natural for a person with such a mentality and occupying the Interior Ministry to hurl Turkey, a country already in a state of confusion, into unexpected situations in a very short time. The minority government no longer thinks in terms of "offender" and "innocent," but of the "leftist" and "rightist," and if the rightist militants embark on massacres, as they have done in Corum, they are considered to be supporters of the state.

Let us consider Turkey's present plight: Are the martial law authorities emphasizing a truth when they talk of an "unproclaimed civil war"? How does civil war break out in a country? If a government empowered to use the forces of the state considers a group of its compatriots to be offenders because of their affiliations and collaborates with others in an attack, then anything can happen in that country. Under such circumstances the people are compelled to resist the government's illegal attitude. Forces that seek to take advantage of such acts of resistance are sure to find favorable ground in our country. Preventing the danger of a civil war and restoring order and harmony in the state is only possible if those using the powers of the state are resolutely impartial, fair and law abiding.

It is natural that there should be forces, both at home and abroad, that would seek to destroy Turkey, which is situated in the most sensitive region of the Middle East. The effect of these forces, however, can be as dangerous and destructive as the way the minority government's interior minister approaches the question of terrorism.

INDONESIAN FOREIGN MINISTER MEETS PAHR IN VIENNA

AU170900 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 17 Jul 80 p 3

[Text] Indonesian Foreign Minister Prof Mochtar Kusumaatmaja arrived in Vienna yesterday from Czechoslovakia for a short private visit. In the afternoon he had working talks with Austrian Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr, and in the evening he attended a dinner given by Pahr in his honor. Today he will proceed to Poland.

Mochtar Interview

AU171257 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1000 GMT 17 Jul 80

[Harry Sychrovsy interview with Indonesian Foreign Minister Mochtar Kusumaatmaja in Vienna on 17 July--recorded; questions in German, answers in English fading into German translation]

[Text] [Question] Mr Minister, with its 150 million inhabitants and a territory of 2 million square kilometers the Republic of Indonesia is the biggest Islamic country. Nevertheless and Indonesia's role in the Islamic world is rather restrained and modest. What is the reason for this? Or, can it be said that there are, on the one side, the liberal-moderate Muslim states of Asia and Africa and, on the other, radical Arab states?

[Answer] First, let me say that the right way to characterize Indonesia is that it is the country with the biggest Muslim population. It is not an Islamic state in the sense that religion is part of the state ideology. We have complete freedom of religion for Muslims just as we have it for the Christians, Buddhists and Hinduists. When you say that our role at the Islamic Conferences is modest I must say that we have been brought up in the spirit of modesty. It is up to others to decide whether this policy is effective or not. I hesitate to speak of a division of Muslim states into radical and moderate ones. Certainly there are differences in views, but the Muslim states are united on fundamental issues such as Palestine.

[Question] You have now mentioned the Middle East problem. What is Indonesia's attitude to the other Islamic points of crisis, Iran and Afghanistan?

[Answer] Our basic position is that we do believe and we do fully support the Arab and Islamic countries in the Arab cause. Likewise we cherish great sympathy and have a deep understanding for the Iranian revolution, even though it is every complicated and difficult to understand. We cannot do anything else but hope that this revolution develops for the benefit of the Iranian people. Another principle is that we would like to see at what time the conflicts will be solved peacefully. As far as Afghanistan is concerned Indonesia's attitude is clear from the support for the decisions of the Islamic conference.

[Question] Well, in the Southeast Asian region Indonesia has been pursuing its own foreign policy. It is conspicuous in the connection that despite the liberalization in China and Beijing's course, which is friendly to the United States, Djakarta, I believe, regards Beijing, as before, as the main enemy while, on the other hand, vis-a-vis the Vietnamese aggression in Kampuchea, it rather adopts a moderate attitude. How can these contradictions be explained?

[Answer] The first question on normalization with China: Let me say that the basis for policy is the realization that China is a fact in the world today which we cannot ignore. We have decided on this basis to establish normal diplomatic relations with China when the occasion arises. On the other hand, we have had experiences that prompt us to be cautious, hence we do not want to precipitate anything. Two years ago the Chinese foreign minister told me in New York that his government was not impatient about this problem, nor are we impatient. But it is not correct to say that we regard China as a main enemy.

I would like to make it clear as far as the problem of Vietnam is concerned that we regard it as a country that has fought heavily for its independence and we should show great understanding for this. Naturally sometimes Hanoi undertakes steps with which we do not agree. But we are convinced, as before, that Vietnam is independent and that it pursues an independent policy. It is our principle that we want to see the Southeast Asian region free from interference and intervention, and this applies to all external powers, regardless whether they call themselves superpowers, great powers or any other powers.

AUSTRIA WILL PARTICIPATE IN OLYMPICS OPENING CEREMONY

AU181044 Vienna ARBEITER ZEITUNG in German 18 Jul 80 p 1

[Excerpt] Moscow (APA)--The final decision has now been made regarding the opening ceremony of the Olympic games in Moscow according to Austrian Olympic Committee Chairman Kurt Heller Austria will participate in the opening parade with a flag bearer--who is yet to be nominated--and 30-40 persons. The exact number will be known only immediately before the ceremony, because each athlete and functionary can decide for himself whether he wants to participate.

The decision was made yesterday in Moscow at a session of the 18 West European national olympic committees.

PAHR, SWISS COUNTERPART DISCUSS MADRID CSCE MEETING

AU111155 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 11 Jul 80 p 2

[Text] On Thursday Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr made use of a short visit to Muerren near Bern to exchange opinions with his Swiss opposite number Pierre Aubert. The main topic of the talk was the preparations for the coming CSCE followup conference in Madrid. In this context the two ministers discussed among other things the possibility of a foreign ministers' meeting of the European neutrals for coordinating their countries' position at the Madrid conference.

Pahr returned to Vienna directly after his talk with Aubert. Earlier he had given a lecture in Muerren at the Swiss Civic Society outlining the aims of Austria's policy of neutrality.

SPOKESMAN ON CHRISTOPHER VISIT, SOVIET NEGOTIATING PROPOSAL

DW171255 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 1110 GMT 16 Jul 80

[Interview by reporter Lenz with State Secretary Klaus Boelling, chief of the Federal Press and Information Office--recorded]

[Text] [Question] There have been a number of international contacts by the Federal Government lately, particularly in connection with the Moscow visit by the federal chancellor. Were they the issue at today's cabinet session?

[Answer] You are quite right. Today's cabinet session chaired by the federal chancellor, who will leave on vacation tonight for Brahmsee, dealt mainly with foreign policy issues. It dealt mainly with German-French consultations, the state visit by President Giscard d'Estaing prior to the consultations, and with the very careful information we have given once more to U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Warren Christopher on the results of our Moscow visit.

[Question] Can one say after this information session that the Americans have swallowed the Moscow visit by the chancellor and its results?

[Answer] Well, not swallowed--I think this word is out of place here, if I may say so. They have fully identified themselves with our assessment, even though chancellor candidate Strauss and some others try to make you believe something different every day. And so Deputy Secretary of State Warren Christopher made a clear statement at the end of his talks with Federal Foreign Minister Genscher and State Secretary Van Well to the effect that one would do better--that is to say, those whom I must mentioned--to stop trying to sow discord between the U.S. Government and the Federal Government. The timetable has been discussed and set up by the Germans and the Americans together, but as you know the Americans are in charge. The alliance will examine matters further and in late summer--this is what we expect, together with the Americans--matters will move forward. No doubts exist in this respect.

[Question] Moving forward means that in late summer Western action will be coordinated vis-a-vis the Moscow offer to negotiate?

[Answer] It will have been coordinated, and there will certainly be no time lost in entering into the preparatory talks with the Soviet Union which have been suggested by the Soviet leadership. There is a common assessment that the chance which is available here ought to be exploited in any case. As you know, a discussion has taken place between Warren Christopher and Soviet Ambassdor Dobrynin. The process that was initiated through our visit to Moscow is continuing, and there is a desire not to lose much time. Naturally there is still the need for a number of talks, which will be handled with the necessary care.

[Question] The federal chancellor recently pointed out vehemently the necessity that NATO's decision to close the arms gap must be fully applied with regard to both of its parts. Earlier he reminded people in an admonishing way about part two, namely, the simultaneous disarmament talks between East and West, which in an ideal case would lead to a zero solution regarding missiles. Now he is reminding us about part one, about rearmament itself. Are there any undecided NATO partners who must be called to order?

[Answer] I do not want to use your formulation. But discussions are going on in neighboring countries, something was said yesterday about this in the joint press conference by the federal chancellor and Luxembourg Prime Minister Werner. Both government chiefs said yesterday after the consultations that it is important to maintain a balance between the two elements of the NATO decision of 12 December last year. One cannot believe that by neglecting the first element, namely, the necessary so-called closing of the arms gap, the second element will have a chance to show some effect in the talks.

Maybe I ought to mention here that the cabinet expressly welcomed the decision by the British Government about which we were informed together with all NATO partners, namely, the modernization of the British nuclear medium-range potential. We realize that this, similar to corresponding decisions by the French Government, is in our opinion a very significant contribution to the reestablishment of military balance in Europe. We welcome this decision by the British Government.

[Question] Moscow has explained more closely its offer to negotiate on arms control measures. It warned against a misunderstanding in the West that Soviet missiles can be negotiated on while the NATO decision on the deployment of American missiles in Europe simultaneously remains in effect. Has the Federal Government reason to take notice with regard to such a warning?

[Answer] We do not consider this a warning but a reminder by the Soviet Union. It has not come as a surprise, at least not to those who realized from the very beginning--and the federal chancellor said so in his government statement to the Bundestag--that the Soviet Union will adhere to its position, namely, that its suggestions made by Brezhnev on 6 October in Berlin will be valid only if the NATO decision is suspended. While holding to this position it has simultaneously suggested preparatory talks with the United States.

This is not a contradiction. The Soviet Union is holding to its line. We have always realized that. There are no contradictions here, although Bavarian Minister-President Strauss tried to make the people believe that there was a contradiction. This position was absolutely clear in the talks the chancellor had with the foreign minister in the Catherine Hall of the Kremlin.

The United States, the leader of the West, in the negotiations of the alliance, has seen as much as we did that despite the Soviet Union's adherence to this position, a chance does exist for holding preparatory talks; even though Warren Christopher said that one ought to concentrate first on land-based medium-range arms, while the Soviet Union made the request to us that the so-called forward based systems be included. But neither one side nor the other has made any preconditions. That must be made absolutely clear.

GOVERNMENT INDIGNANT OVER ATTEMPT AGAINST BAKHTIAR

NC181300 Paris AFP in English 1250 GMT 18 Jul 80

[Text] Paris, July 18 (AFP)--The French Government today expressed indignation over the assassination attempt here today against former Iranian Prime Minister Shahpur Bakhtiar and announced that a thorough police investigation would be conducted.

In a communique, the Foreign Ministry called the "terrorist attack" on Mr Bakhtiar "particularly abominable."

Mr. Bakhtiar, the last prime minister under the ex-shah, was unharmed in the incident, but two people died of wounds received in a gunfight that broke out when an armed commando stormed the building where he was breakfasting early today.

"The French Government expresses its most vigorous indignation against such an unspeakable act," the communique said.

Three attackers have been arrested and were being held for questioning, the communique added.

QUAI D'ORSAY STATEMENT ON MOSCOW ENVOY'S CENSORED SPEECH

LD171301 Paris LE MONDE in French 17 Jul 80 p 4

[Unattributed report: "What the French Ambassador Was Unable To Say on Soviet Television"]

[Text] Following the cancellation of the statement which the French Ambassador to Moscow was to make on Soviet television on 14 July, the Quai d'Orsay issued the following statement on Tuesday, 15 July:

"For several years now the French Ambassador to Moscow has been accustomed to marking the 14 July by an address to the USSR population on Soviet television.

"The text which Mr Froment-Meurice proposed to read included a passage on the international situation. He indicated in particular that 'the international situation has deteriorated in the past 6 months'; that 'the governments of our two countries have taken different views of the causes of this deterioration, especially with regard to Afghanistan'" and that France is prepared to 'seek a practical solution to this problem which would enable the Soviet armed forces to be withdrawn from Afghanistan.' Since this passage was censored by the Soviet authorities, the ambassador quite rightly decided to cancel his speech rather than alter its contents.

"Any other attitude could have suggested that the French Government had changed its view of and position on the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan. That is not the case. In its view the Soviet intervention remains unacceptable and the complete withdrawal of Soviet troops constitutes a vital element in a solution in keeping with the Afghan people's rights and the requirements of detente and international peace."

KHOMEYNI ENVOY DISCUSSES CONSEQUENCES OF SHAH'S DEATH

[Text] Rome, 17 Jul (ANSA)--The death of the former shah of Iran would not change the situation of the American hostages nor modify the demands of the Iranian people, according to Ayatollah Husayn Nuri in a press conference here today.

Nuri who is a special envoy of Iran's leader, Imam Ruhollah Khomeyni, said that the situation of the 52 Americans still detained in Iran would be debated by the Iranian parliament as announced, but he did not indicate when this would take place. "Our culture and our religion has taught us not to follow our sentiments but our reason", Nuri continued. He said that the former shah had trampled on the rights of the people and that Islamic justice must be done whether the shah lives or dies. All of the wealth taken from the Iranian people must be restored, he added.

Nuri is in Rome to meet with Iranian diplomatic representatives here. He admitted that Iran is going through a period of economic difficulty which he blamed on the previous regime.

Even the numerous plots that have been hatched in Iran are the work of persons who compromised themselves under the shah's regime, who became too attached to wealth and who can no longer continue their dishonest activities, the Ayatollah said.

The recent closure of foreign schools in Iran is to be seen in the context of a revolution in teaching, he went on. The schools shutdown were instruments of foreign penetration seeking to achieve that which must be avoided at all costs: The westernization of Iranian youth, Nuri said.

The Ayatollah, speaking in the name of a merciful god, said that he wanted to voice "a friendly complaint" to the Italian Government. "The Italian Government," he said, "has associated itself with imperialist plots and letting itself be influenced by the American dominator, has adopted several economic sanctions against Iran despite the friendship we have shown Italy." He said that this had taken Iran by surprise and that in future European governments must not allow themselves to be influenced by "the unjust policies of the United States."

"We know that the Italian people are intelligent and alert and sympathetic towards the Islamic revolution whose basis we seek to consolidate," Nuri continued. "Ours is an independent nation no one can influence us. We count only on the power of God and of Islam," he concluded.

TRADE MINISTER SIGNS ECONOMIC AGREEMENTS WITH PRC

LD170923 Lisbon DIARIO DE NOTICIAS in Portguese 10 Jul 80 p 3

[Unattributed report: "Portuguese and Chinese Enterprises Conclude Trade Contracts"]

[Excerpt] Portuguese enterprises have already signed several contracts for exports to the PRC. Portugal has concluded a contract for immediately supplying paper pulp worth 50,000 contos and another for supplying 500,000 contos worth of the same product through 1983. A contract for supplying processed cork, worth 10,000 contos, has also been signed, Minister of Trade and Tourism Basilio Horta announced on returning from a 10-day visit to that country.

Basilio Horta reaffirmed the importance of the trade agreement which he signed in Beijing, maintaining that in this way "an essential precondition for the consolidation of trading relations" between Portugal and China was fulfilled.

Referring to the new prospects opened up to Portuguese-Chinese trade, Basilio Horta cited in particular the beer and transportation sectors.

With respect to the former, the minister of trade and tourism stated, there is already a plan to set up a joint enterprise for manufacturing beer, based on Portuguese technology, to be established in southern China.

In the field of transportation, the possibility is being studied of setting up a joint enterprise for the transportation of coal (and in a second stage, of oil) by sea from the Far East to Europe, using ships to be built in Portugal.

In addition, there is also the possibility of constructing docks and port terminals in the PRC, using Portuguese technology.

The minister of trade and tourism, who described as "important" his visit and the agreement he signed, which is the first between the two countries, added that a "broad area of agreement" in the viewpoints of Portugal and China in the field of international policy was ascertained during the talks which he held with the Chinese authorities.

TURKISH SIDE, NEWSPAPERS COMMENT ON PROPOSED SUMMIT MEETING

No Agenda Planned

NC180715 Nicosia ELEVTHERI KIPROS in Greek 18 Jul 80 p 8

[Text] Yesterday, the government spokesman reiterated that the Turkish Cypriot side, within the framework of the initiative it has taken on the Cyprus issue, has set no preconditions on the meeting between President Kiprianou and Turkish Cypriot leader Denktas in Tripoli, Libya.

He said: "It was agreed that the meeting will take place without an agenda. Mr Kiprianou and Mr Denktas will not participate as interlocutors but will discuss the differences that exist in the positions of both sides to facilitate the resumption of the talks."

Libyan Role

NC180913 Nicosia O AGON in Greek 18 Jul 80 p 2

[From "Our Positions" column: "Serious Questions"]

[Text] The public is concerned about serious questions after Libyan Foreign Affairs Secretary At-Turayki's revelation that his country has signed an aid protocol with Denktas' regime.

Naturally, Mr At-Turayki has refrained from speaking about the extent of the aid to Denktas. However, the Turkish Cypriot leader has informed us that it is $3 million.

The Libyan foreign affairs secretary has made an attempt to play down the importance of the protocol by saying that it is nothing but a protocol and that this does not mean that Libya wants Cyprus to be partitioned.

However, things are different. Libya has become the first country to give substantive aid to Denktas' regime. The signing of the protocol means the recognition of Denktas' regime.

Any name given to this Libyan action does not change things. This is why Denktas is celebrating his first substantive success in 6 years.

After this, the public is asking what sort of mediation Libya will perform when it thus recognizes Dendtas' regime. How is it possible for this country to mediate when it invites Denktas to Tripoli and receives him with honors and parades as "president"?

Truly, we would like this mediation to bring some results. Nevertheless, Mr At-Turayki's revelation is causing us serious concern about the final outcome of such an issue.

'Trap of Turkish Diplomacy'

NC180915 Nicosia I MAKHI in Greek 18 Jul 80 p 1

[Editorial: "Before It Is Too Late..."]

[Text] One need not be a gifted politician or a shrewd diplomat to see that Libya's mediation in the Cyprus issue constituted a well-placed trap of Turkish diplomacy that had three aims:

1. To remove the Turkish side from the position that Mr De Cuellar, UN under secretary general for special political affairs, placed it in recently when he held it responsible for the failure of Waldheim's efforts.

2. To evade the UN resolutions, in the event of new talks and render substantially useless the offices of UN Secretary General Waldheim.

3. The Turks insist on "bizonality," as they interpret it, so that the Greek side can be shown as intransigent and then be put in the dock. Simultaneously, Mr De Cuellar and the United Nations can be exposed as favoring the Greek side.

However, the government political masterminds--the "hawks" of our diplomacy--and President Kiprianou himself, did not perceive these simple things and finally fell into the Turkish trap. They sustained a painful political defeat. They made a first class political error which, as hard as they try, they cannot cover. Denktas himself, speaking to Turkish journalists day before yesterday, already disclosed that: "The proposed summit meeting has the aim of speeding up efforts toward the goal that the principles of the Makarios-Denktas and Kiprianou-Denktas agreements provide. This goal is the establishment of a biocommunal, bizonal and nonaligned federated state. The agreement will also include Turkey's guarantees...."

These Denktas statements are enough to affirm that the Cyprus government and President Kiprianou fell into the Turkish trap by cooperating with Al-Qadhdhafi. If they have not realized this by now, developments will force them to do so. We only hope that it will not be too late then.

TURKISH COMMERCE MINISTER ARRIVES FOR TALKS, CELEBRATIONS

TA171625 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 17 Jul 80

[Text] The Turkish minister of commerce, Mr Basol, arrived in the federated state to attend the meeting of the mixed economic commission of Turkey and the federated state. In a statement on arrival at Ercan State Airport, Mr Basol said that he would also represent Turkey at the celebrations marking the 6th anniversary of the Turkish peace operation in Cyprus. The prime minister, Mr Cagatay, also made a statement saying that the commission meeting would reach a decision on principles which will regulate the economic relations between Turkey and the federated state in a better way. Referring to the celebrations marking the anniversary of the Turkish peace operation, Mr Cagatay said the anniversary was significant only for paving for way for the establishment of the federated state but also for bringing democracy back to Greece.

TURKISH CYPRIOT OFFICIAL COMMENTS ON ECONOMIC SITUATION

TA171830 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1630 GMT 17 Jul 80

[Text] The minister of finance, Mr Hakki Atun, has made a statement on the economic situation in the federated state. In his statement, which also deals with the talks he has held with the Turkish finance minister, Mr Sezgin, Mr Atun stressed that the federated state must establish a strong economic structure. He said that the 5-year development plan provided for a 7 percent annual economic growth and that in 1978 there was only a 10 percent [as heard] increase in the gross national product, because the necessary investments had not been realized owing to the shortage of financial resources. The report on the same subject for 1979, he said, has not yet been completed. Referring to exports, Mr Atun said that there was a favorable development in foreign trade and in the balance of payments and that efforts were being made to achieve further improvement.

Finally, he said that a promise had been made by the Turkish finance minister, Mr Sezgin, that his government would also help the federated state on the question of investments.

CROWD PREVENTS DOCKING OF TURKISH SHIP IN RHODES

TA152049 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 15 Jul 80

[Text] The ship Gemlik, which left Mugla's Marmaris port today to make its first trip to the Island of Rhodes, was prevented from docking by a big crowd that gathered along the dock. As a result, the Gemlik had to anchor off shore at 1115. The Gemlik is a ship of the State Maritime Lines. TRT correspondents have learned that the Gemlik, which left Marmaris at 0900, arrived in Rhodes at 1100 and began to approach the dock. A group of about 3,000 men occupied the dock area and began stoning the approaching ship and tried to cut the ship's ropes that tied it to the dock. The captain decided to take the ship out and anchored it there. As the crowd refused to disperse, the Turkish consulate general asked the island authorities to evacuate the dock or, if this were not possible, for a written statement by the port authorities stating that the ship could not approach the dock for security reasons.

When no results were achieved, the Turkish Embassy in Athens brought the incident to the attention of Greek Foreign Minister, Konstandinos Mitsotakis. The Greek foreign minister said that he regretted the incident, that the necessary directives would be given to the Rhodes governor and that President Karamanlis would be informed of the incident. Pointing out that the incident would be dealt with by the government, Mitsotakis said that he believed that the problem would be solved in a short while.

Agencies add that about 10 more ships with Greek and other flags were not able to enter the port of Rhodes. It is reported that the tourists on the island were concerned by the incidents.

Government Intervention

AT161258 Athens NEWS in English 16 Jul 80 p 4

[Excerpt] A group of residents of the Island of Rhodes attempted today to prevent the Turkish boat "Gemlik" from docking in the port of the island. The authorities intervened and order was restored. The said boat was making its first Marmaris-Rhodes trip many years after this route connecting Greece and Turkey was suspended. In an official statement, the Greek Government has made it clear that this route conforms to the generally accepted international principles and falls within the boundaries of the Greek-Turkish tourist cooperation in force since 1979.

Referring to the incident, a government spokesman remarked that the government will enforce the law and will punish any attempt designed to disturb order.

Normal Docking; Investigation Underway

AT161634 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1500 GMT 16 Jul 80

[Text] According to today's reports, the Turkish passenger ship Gemlik docked normally in the port of Rhodes after the police drove away a group of irresponsible persons who had attempted to obstruct the ship's approach. It has also been learned that, on the personal orders of Prime Minister Rallis, inspectors from the Ministry of Public Order and the Ministry of Interior have been sent to Rhodes to hold an investigation and apportion responsibility in connection with yesterday's incidents. Legal penal and administrative sanctions will be imposed upon the culprits.

In addition the government today reiterated that the law will in all cases be enforced and the normal execution of all regular maritime itineraries will be guaranteed in a way that conforms to the principles of shipping and to national interests.

More Protests

AT171223 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1000 GMT 17 Jul 80

[Text] New incidents took place last night in the commercial port of Rhodes upon the second arrival of the Turkish passenger ship Gemlik. As a result, 26 people were injured--5 civilians and 21 constables--and several demonstrators were arrested.

The incidents started when it was learned that the Gemlik would arrive again in Rhodes. Demonstrators began gathering at the port where they confronted strong police forces. Carrying stones and pieces f wood the demonstrators clashed with the police. The clashes later expanded and the constabulary was forced to use tear gas to disperse the demonstrators, who were throwing homemade molotove cocktails. The situation remained tense until early this morning when riot control police units appeared. Meanwhile, the command of the Rhodes constabulary has banned marches and gatherings in the town.

Rallis Statement

AT171233 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 17 Jul 80

[Text] In connection with the incidents in Rhodes, Prime Minister Rallis made the following statement today:

The incidents, which have been provoked by irresponsible elements in Rhodes, are unacceptable to a well-governed country. Greece is a member of the international society of states and is bound by international agreements. By participating in the OECO it has undertaken the obligation to guarantee the security of transport and the government is determined to honor Greece's signature. As a maritime nation, it is in our interests to guarantee the freedom of maritime transport. Agitators should not forget that 19 large Greek passenger ships with 7,500 passengers dock in Turkish ports every week, that 7 small Greek ships ply daily the routes between Khios, Samos, Mitilini and the Turkish coast and that 50 Greek transport ships totaling 250,000 tons dock seven times a month in Turkish ports.

It is not concievable, the prime minister stressed, why any hotheaded people would want to damage the interests of the Greek shipping industry, the third largest in the world, or Greek tourism. Only the Greek Government is responsible for foreign policy and thus far it has proved that it fully protects the country's interests. It does not allow anybody to be irresponsibly superpatriotic and it has the will and power to strike at mob demonstrations, wherever they may originate. Therefore, Rallis concluded, I ask those citizens of Rhodes who have been misguided and have provoked this sad incident to return to their peaceful occupations and stop creating additional problems to the already critical problems this country is facing.

Docking Without Incident

TA172035 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 17 Jul 80

[Text] The ship Gemlik, which is sailing between Marmaris and Rhodes, docked at the port of Rhodes at 2130 and its passengers disembarked. There were no incidents following the security measures at the port of Rhodes. However, it was reported that certain groups continued their protest demonstrations on streets near the port. Meanwhile, it was also reported that certain demonstrators gathered in front of the Turkish Consulate in Rhodes, but security forces dispersed them. The ship Gemlik will return from Rhodes to Marmaris around 0900 tomorrow.

DEMIREL STRESSES NEED FOR NEW LAWS TO COMBAT VIOLENCE

TA171610 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 17 Jul 80

[Text] The Council of Ministers held a 3-hour meeting today. Various problems of the country were discussed during the meeting, which was chaired by Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel. Demirel made the following statement after the meeting:

[Begin recording] It is extremely difficult to insure the full prevelance of law and order in Turkey without establishing democratic authority. Actually, the two complement each other. Democratic authority can be established only if there is law and order. It is the state which should insure the prevelance of law and order and it is the parliament which should legislate the necessary laws. When our government assumed power and when it accounted for its program at the end of 100 days it set out some of the laws necessary to combat anarchy in a bid to insure the full prevelance of law and order. A significant number of these laws have been ratified by the Grand National Assembly. Now it is absolutely necessary to enact the following laws: The state security courts law mentioned in the 136th article of the constitution; the state of emergency law which will make it possible to govern Turkey within the limits of the law under the current conditions; and a law which will eliminate the shortcomings of the martial law enforcement and amend the authority granted to martial law commanders.

There are continuous murders and bloodshed. The duty of the state is to engage in a relentless struggle against those disrupting Turkey. The state has done this. It is waging a relentless struggle. Let us be in unity and solidarity. Yes, this is necessary in order to confront anarchy. However, this alone is not sufficient. Unity and solidarity is necessary to enact the laws necessary to combat anarchy and to encourage and support the state security forces and the armed forces, which are combatting anarchy, divisiveness, destruction and defeatism. Only then can we solve this problem. [end recording]

RPP LEGISLATORS ISSUE STATEMENT ON KILLING OF DEPUTY

TA171940 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 17 Jul 80

[Text] The statement issued at the end of the joint RPP parliamentary group meeting, which convened in an extraordinary session yesterday following the killing of RPP Deputy from Istanbul Abdurrahman Koksaloglu, was released to the press by Assembly group deputy leader Coskun Karagozoglu today.

Noting that, through Koksaloglu, those who wish to destroy the democracy in the country and replace it with fascism were actually aiming at the Turkish Grand National Assembly, the statement said: The lives of legislators are not more valuable than any of our citizens. While performing their duty of protecting democracy, RPP deputies and senators do not hesitate to risk their lives. However, the fact that murders have reached the stage where they are being directed at legislators whould reveal the real target to those who have not yet realized it. The real target is our parliamentary democracy, which is based on the national will and the principle of a state of law.

Expressing the view that the government is attempting to transform the assembly into a rubber stamp by obstructing its functioning, the statement continued: Furthermore, in an Assembly where the parliamentary majority can be affected by the presence or absence of a few deputies, the killing of legislators is more significant. Thus, the possibility is created of changing election results through murder and the principles of elections and votes lose their value.

The killing of Koksaloglu is not an isolated incident. There is evidence and indications showing that this is part of the plan to insure the survival of the minority JP government through the use of force. Noting that the attacks and threats against the RPP legislators had increased since the interpellation to topple the government, the statement said: The minority JP government has become a government that is surviving by obstructing the functioning of the parliament, on the one hand, and by using the brute force of murder gangs on the other.

The statement concluded: The RPP, which is viewed as the greatest obstacle to those who wish to destroy democracy in our country, will continue to fulfill the duty of protecting our democracy against all the attacks and murders directed against it and against the provocation and incitement to murder voiced even by responsible people until the final defeat of the enemies of democracy. At a time when our democracy and republic are facing great dangers assembly group calls on all members of the Turkish Grand National Assembly to unite around the same sense of duty, to insure the functions of the Graet National Assembly and thus save our state.

Government Condolences

TA171705 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 17 Jul 80

[Excerpt] In a statement after the Council of Ministers meeting today, Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel said that the government decided during its meeting today to convey it condolences to the family and colleagues of Abdurrahman Koksaloglu, the RPP deputy from Istarbul who was murdered the day before yesterday.

GREEK TOURISM TALKS END WITH SIGNING OF PROTOCOL

TA171720 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 17 Jul 80

[Text] The talks on the resumption of tourism cooperation between Turkey and Greece have ended. The protocol at the end of the talks was signed by Tourism and Information Ministry under secretary Kemal Baytas and Greek National Tourism Organization Director Yeoryios Dhafkalakis in Ankara today. In a speech after the signing ceremony, Baytas said that the protocol will assist in the development and strengthening of the relations of friendship and neighborliness between Turkey and Greece. In his statement, Dhafkalakis noted that the subjects included in the protocol are on the technical level and will shed light on the solution of the problems between the two countries. Pointing out that Turkey and Greece have the necessary potential for tourism, Dhafkalakis said that the cooperation between the two countries will yield successful results from every aspect for both countries.

The protocol includes developing the transportation services between the two countries and facilitating and simplifying the entry and exit procedures for tourists. Cooperation in the fields of publication exchange and cultural and art exchange is also included in the protocol. The protocol, which mentions the development of cooperation between tour operators and travel agencies, stresses the importance of refraining from attitudes and propaganda that would hinder tourism.

Commentary on Improved Relations

NC180821 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 17 Jul 80 pp 1, 9

[Commentary by Professor Fahir Armaoglu: "The Rhodes Affair"]

[Text] The situation confronted at Rhodes when the ship Gemlik attempted its first tourist cruise between Marmaris and Rhodes must have dampened the hopes of those who wish to see Turkish-Greek relations improved. [paragraph continues]

In particular, friendly and allied countries which expect a soft rapprochement from Turkey toward the settlement of Turkish-Greek disputes and which somehow go out of their way to make suggestions to us about this should draw a moral lesson from this incident and try to see the realities more clearly.

The Rhodes incident has occurred at a very interesting time. Turkish-Greek cooperation talks are being held in Ankara, the Istanbul-Athens flights have just begun and our Minister of Culture Tevfik Koraltan is preparing to visit the "Alexander the Great" exhibition in Salonika.

Naturally, the Greek Government will try to find various excuses. But no excuse can justify its fault and its responsibility, because this trip by the Gemlik was extensively advertised in the press. It seems that the Turkish Government meant this link between Marmaris and Rhodes to serve as the first leg of a bridge of rapprochement and friendship between Turkey and Greece in the Aegean. The failure of the Greek Government to see and understand this is surely a diplomatic blunder, if not a belligerent act. Greece is totally responsible for ignoring the importance of the issue and for failing to take the necessary precautions. The Rhodes affair should be evaluated in light of developments in relations between the two countries, particularly since the lifting of the NOTAM 714. As we stated then, through this action Turkey passed responsibility for resuming a dialogue to Greece. Greece should now display some gesture of good will.

But unfortunately the opposite happened. Greece bitterly complained about the military and economic aid extended to Turkey and, without disclosing what it actually meant, began to talk of an "equilibrium" between Turkey and Greece. Turkey continued to display good will. But against this, Greece's only positive move has been to have its foreign minister delay his departure from Ankara, where he had attended the NATO Ministerial Council meeting, in order to have talks with Foreign Minister Erkmen. This short session was considered a serious move toward commencing the Turkish-Greek dialogue. We are not suggesting that this dialogue should be discontinued or that Turkey should terminate its unanswered or hindered moves. However, it is a fact that the Rhodes incident has dealt a heavy blow to the good intentions of Turkey. It is up to Greece to repair the damage.

FINANCE MINISTER COMMENTS ON INVESTMENT ON RETURN FROM CYPRUS

TA171645 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 17 Jul 80

[Text] Finance Minister Ismet Sezgin returned to Ankara today, after concluding his official visit to the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus.

At a news conference in Girne [Kyrenia] before his departure for Ankara, Sezgin said that he held contacts concerning the economic development of the federated state. Expressing the belief that the economy of the federated state will overcome its difficulties through the new measures to be adopted, Sezgin said that especially attempts will be made to increase the capacity of the industrial installations in the public sector. Sezgin added that work is under way to double the amount of Turkish liras which Turkish tourists can take with them to Cyprus.

In another statement on arrival at Ankara's Esenboga Airport, Sezgin noted that he exchanged views with Turkish Cypriot officials regarding future investments and Turkey's contribution to these investments. Noting that Turkey's contributions will continue in a bid to insure the economic freedom of the federated state as soon as possible, Sezgin added that the talks were positive.

WIENER ZEITUNG REPORTS ON 244th MBFR PLENARY SESSION

[Unattributed report: "East Waiting for an Answer: Forces Reduction: West Sees Geographical Disadvantages"]

[Text] At yesterday's 244th plenary session of the Vienna forces reduction talks East German Ambassador Andre Wieland demanded from the West a quick and positive reaction to the compromise proposals of the Warsaw Pact that were put forward last week. Dutch chief delegate Willem de Vos van Steenwijk, who addressed the meeting on behalf of the West, appealed in turn to the East to meet the NATO countries' demand for taking into consideration the different geographical preconditions for the two pact systems in central Europe.

In his speech at the next to the last session of the spring round of the talks Wieland explained the Eastern plan of 10 July, according to which 20,000 Soviet and 13,000 U.S. soldiers are to be withdrawn from central Europe in a first reduction phase. Including the 20,000 men, whose withdrawal from the GDR had been announced by Soviet state and party chief Leonid Brezhnev in October 1979 as a unilateral step by Moscow, he said, a total of 40,000 Soviet soldiers would thus have left central Europe by the conclusion of the first reduction phase. The GDR representative reiterated the Eastern viewpoint that at present there is an "approximate balance" of military forces in central Europe. This is what NATO is trying to unilaterally change in its favor, he added.

According to the Western press spokesman, Dutch Ambassador de Vos declared in his speech at the plenary session that the NATO countries had drawn attention to the inequality of the geographic conditions as early as at the preliminary talks, and that they had insisted that this essential factor be taken into consideration. The crux of the problem is that unlike the United States the USSR directly borders on the reduction zone.

NATO spokesman Aurelio Fernandez, who will leave Vienna at the end of this conference round, promised a thorough examination of the latest Eastern proposals. He added, however, that from the Western viewpoint the discrepancies over the troops strength figures of the two pact systems have not yet been eliminated.

DPA REPORTS START OF GERMAN-FRENCH 'COLIBRI' EXERCISE

LD161727 Hamburg DPA in German 1606 GMT 16 Jul 80

[Excerpt] Stetten--The 18th joint German-French "Colibri" exercise started today with an airborne operation on the "Grosse Helberg." About 2,000 soldiers, of whom 500 are French, and 60 Transall transport planes, fighter bombers and transport helicopters are taking part in the airborne combat exercise on the Schwaebische Alb. The exercise will end on Friday. The annual "Colibri" exercise alternates in site between the two countries and is intended to demonstrate their NATO partnership [as received]. At the same time it is meant to familiarize the French with German territory and with the deployment methods of the Bundeswehr.

GOVERNMENT CONDEMNS MILITARY TAKEOVER IN BOLIVIA

LD191004 Hamburg DPA in German 0922 GMT 20 Jul 80

[Text] Bonn--The Federal Government has condemned the military putsch in Bolivia and has expressed its regret at the fact that the process of democratization in that country has been halted for the time being. A Foreign Ministry spokesman said in Bonn today in response to a question that the latest developments are all the more grave since the people of Bolivia, like those of other Andean states, clearly demonstrated in the recent elections that they are in favor of a democracy.

The spokesman said that the Federal Government will carefully follow further developments in Bolivia and "take the necessary measures in due course in coordination with its European allies." The speaker would not give any details of the measures in question which could include a freeze in development aid to Bolivia. The Bolivian Government is a major recipient of German development aid targeted to Latin America. The aid promised for 1977-78 amounted to DM90 million.

The spokesman said that the position of Germans living in Bolivia gives no cause for concern at present. According to available information, none had come to any harm in the military takeover. He said that it is still proving difficult to obtain accurate information about what is going on in the country because it is not easy to keep in touch with the German Embassy in La Paz.

ARAB LEAGUE SECRETARY GENERAL ARRIVES ON VISIT

GENSCHER RETURNS FROM 3-DAY VISIT TO YUGOSLAVIA

LD191303 Hamburg DPA in German 1019 GMT 19 Jul 80

[Text] Belgrade--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher flew back to the Federal Republic at noon today at the end of a 3-day official visit to Yugoslavia. Earlier in the day he had a meeting with Yugoslav Premier Veselin Djuranovic. The 1-hour discussion was mainly concerned with economic questions. During the visit Genscher had talks with various politicians, mainly about international problems.

APEL COMMENTS ON U.S. MISSILE DEPLOYMENT IN WEST EUROPE

LD191048 Hamburg DPA in German 0938 GMT 19 Jul 80

[Text] Stuttgart--In the opinion of Federal Defense Minister Hans Apel negotiations on an agreement to limit European medium-range missiles can only be successful if NATO stands by its firm determination to counterarm. Apel reiterated this view today in an interview with South German Radio. Whatever happens, the military balance must also be restored for nuclear weapons. If this is not possible through arms limitation and arms control NATO will have to be prepared to deploy U.S. medium-range missiles in West Europe.

Apel said that the position of the Federal Government--that U.S. nuclear weapons in West Europe should not be deployed in the Federal Republic alone--remains unchanged. This condition has already been fulfilled by Italy's unqualified and unconditional approval of the possible deployment. The Federal defense minister added: "Our Benelux neighbors must be told quite unequivocally that NATO is a body in which there cannot and will not be membership with differing rights and privileges, which means that we expect their agreement in due course; from Belgium, let us hope, in the next few months, and from the Netherlands by the deadline of 1981, which they have set for themselves."

SPD'S EGON BAHR COMMENTS ON U.S.-FRG RELATIONS

LD181054 Hamburg DPA in German 0933 GMT 18 Jul 80

[Text] Bonn--Relations between the Federal Republic and the United States are "at the moment without serious problems." This is the impression of SPD business manager Egon Bahr at the end of his 9-day visit to the United States. Speaking to journalists after his return to Bonn today he stressed that there are just as few people in Washington as there are in the Federal Republic who question the Alliance or have doubts about it. Bahr said: "there is no question of a crisis in the Alliance." He stated that contacts between the United States and the USSR on the question of medium-range weapons "have been established in principle." He had gained the impression that there is practically no difference in the "great respect for the Federal chancellor, especially after his visit to Moscow and with regard to his conduct in Moscow," felt by Republicans and Democrats alike.

Concerning President Giscard d'Estaing's ideas for a more independent European role, Bahr said: "there can be no security in Europe without the United States."

CARSTENS VIEWS EEC EXPANSION, OTHER ISSUES

LD181109 Lisbon DIARIO DE NOTICIAS in Portuguese 14 Jul 80 p 3

[Unattributed report on FRG President Karl Carstens undated interview in Bonn with ANOP: "FRG Will Support Prompt Expansion of EEC"]

[Text] The FRG is aware of the political aspect of Portugal and Spain joining the EEC and is still committed to this taking place as soon as possible, FRG President Karl Carstens told ANOP in an interview in Bonn. President Carstens arrives in Lisbon today for an official visit to Portugal.

Referring to the Portuguese workers who live in the FRG, Carstens said that "they make an important contribution to the German economy. Therefore, the FRG has spared no efforts in recent years to preserve their jobs, in view of the deterioration in the job market," adding: "We will continue to do this in the future, despite the fact that the high number of unemployed in the EEC is a cause of concern for us."

As for the process of Portugal joining the EEC, the president said that in principle his country's stance has not undergone any changes: The FRG "considers it essential to continue the negotiations on membership without delay, in the interests both of Portugal and Spain and of the EEC itself."

Still on the same subject, Carstens pointed out that the resolutions adopted in Brussels in May indicate the need for structural changes within the EEC. But the EEC's internal changes will have to take place concurrently with membership negotiations. "The FRG," the president said, "is aware of the political aspect of Portugal's and Spain's membership and of its importance both to those countries and to the EEC. It therefore maintains its utmost commitment to Portugal and Spain joining the EEC as soon as possible."

With regard to Portuguese-German bilateral relations, Carstens said that his country has watched the young Portuguese democracy "with active interest," reflected in financial and technological cooperation. Some DM100 million in aid is expected this year. The German leader added that "Portugal is an important NATO flank country" and that "the FRG wants, through its support, to help stabilize the democratization process which began with the April 1974 revolution. This is the main reason the FRG is one of the most active advocates of Portugal joining the EEC as soon as possible."

Passing the next to topics of foreign policy, President Carstens referred to "Ostpolitik," declaring that it is only possible "on the basis of the FRG's unequivocal integration in the Atlantic Alliance and the EEC." With regard to relations with the GDR, he said: "To make relations between the German states more bearable, the basic treaty on FRG-GDR relations was concluded in 1972 and supplemented by a number of subsequent agreements. On the other hand, the FRG has not abandoned national unity. It is the express aim of its policy to act in favor of a peaceful situation in Europe in which the German people can recover their dignity within free self-determination. At the end of last month this aim once again received the explicit backing of the Atlantic Alliance in the communique released following the Ankara conference."

Last, in connection with disarmament and the coming CSCE conference in Madrid, Karl Carstens said that "the disarmament and arms control policy is, we believe, an integral element of a policy of security, and for the FRG a policy of security can only mean a policy within the Atlantic Alliance. In this regard the FRG is committed to a realistic policy of arms limitation and reduction aimed at the goal of achieving a military balance at as low a level of armaments as possible."

With specific reference to the Madrid conference, the German president stressed that from the outset his country "has supported the French proposal of holding a disarmament conference in Europe and will strive, with its allies, to reach agreement in Madrid--as part of a balanced result for that meeting--on a mandate for negotiations on means designed to create trust, on the basis of the French propcsal."

LE MATIN EXAMINES FRENCH NUCLEAR MISSILE DEVELOPMENTS

LD210645 Paris LE MATIN in French 14 Jul 80 pp 2-3

[Pascal Krop article: "The Development of New Nuclear Weapons"]

[Text] Once again it is the conventional forces which will have the place of honor in the 14 July parade this year. In 1979 several commentators had expressed surprise that no nuclear submarine crew took part in the parade and wondered whether the nuclear deterrent still had absolute priority.

This question will not be asked in 1980 because of the statements made by the president of the republic on 26 June. Although not in the parade the new French nuclear weapons absorb most of our spending in the defense sphere. In its latest issue the aerospace industries weekly AIR ET COSMOS reveals details of the French cruise missiles, mobile strategic missiles and air-to-surface medium range [ASMP] and Hades tactical weapons systems programs.

On 26 June, in other words 2 weeks after the 10 June defense council meeting, Valery Giscard d'Estaing announced several decisions concerning the modernization of the French nuclear arsenal. "As from 1992," the head of state explained, "we will face the problem of replacing some elements of our strategic nuclear armaments." By then it will be necessary to remedy the vulnerability of the weapons systems installed on the Albion Plateau in 1980 and 1982 (SSBS-S3), and of the 15 Mirage IV armed with the tactical ASMP missile, the other strategic bombers having been withdrawn from service as from 1985.

"That is why," the president of the republic continued, "it was decided at the last defense council meeting to start plans for a mobile strategic launcher. The technical decisions regarding the characteristics of this launcher may be made before the end of the year."

No other details on this missile's characteristics were given at that press conference--Valery Giscard d'Estaing had, therefore, apparently still not chosen between the SX mobile ground missile and the cruise missiles which could either be deployed on the ground or could be airborne.

It was the National Aerospace Industry Company [SNIAS] which was given the job of making a general study of the SX weapon system as from 1977. Its researchers designed a mobile missile with a range of 4,000 km, mounted on a truck which would escape the enemy's means of detection owing to its great mobility. Various types of deployment have been envisaged ranging from the construction of a very large number of fixed silos to the proposal, which seems to have been accepted, of semipermanent displacement (the launchers and their warheads only being moved in case of crisis and being stored on military bases the rest of the time) on land vehicles. [paragraph continues]

The standardized truck chosen could be the Berliet trailer articulated vehicle of which the army already has more than 1,000. It was hitherto thought that the SX would be a missile with a single nuclear warhead but the French AEC [Atomic Energy Commission] researchers now say they can propose a missile with three warheads thanks to miniaturization.

The study of the French cruise missile (according to AIR ET COSMOS magazine the plan has not, as may have been thought, been abandoned) is being carried out by SNIAS and Matra Industries. The French crusie missile is not very heavy and could be adapted for various forms of deployment on trucks, surface ships, submarines of aircraft. It was in June 1944 that the men at a Royal Observer Corps detection post in Kent saw the first of these "strange little aircraft," which German propaganda made famous under the name V-1, crash. Since then a great deal of progress has been made in the United States thanks mainly to the Tercom and Magcom guidance systems, in other words the trajectory readjustment methods which are rendered particularly complex by the cruise missiles' automatic navigation.

On the basis of these methods French researchers have also designed a cruise missile whose form (fusiform body of small diameter and great length for the equipment) is similar to that of the U.S. cruise missiles and which would use an altimetric navigation device which follows the contours of the ground. The radar altimeter fitted picks up the contours of the ground overflow and the on-board computer compares them with the cards stored in its memory. It is this system which would make it possible to periodically readjust the initial programing and enable the missile to fly at very low altitude. If fired from the surface the French missile would be 6 to 7 meters long, 0.6 to 0.7 meters in diameter and have a 3 to 4 meter span.

In the tactical weapons sphere the ASMP weapon system which is to enter service during the second half of 1985 will be the first airborne tactical nuclear missile produced in France. It is to equip the 15 Mirage IV bombers remaining in service after 1985, the navy's Super-Etendard (replacing the AN-52 tactical nuclear bomb), and some 100 Mirage 2000 designed to carry the ASMP as from 1986. This missile, which weighs less than 1 ton and measures a little more than 5 meters, has a range of over 100 km in all flight profiles. It exceeds mach 3 (3,600 km per hour) at very high altitude, which makes it almost invulnerable given existing air defense systems. The first flight tests of the ASMP system, which was launched in 1978, started a short time ago using models.

INVESTIGATION CONTINUES INTO LIBYAN MIG-23 CRASH IN CALABRIA

[Text] Rome, June 20 (ANSA)--The small military aircraft which crashed against a mountain in Calabria Friday has been identified as a Soviet-made "Mig 23" of the Libyan Airforce, official Italian sources announced here. A Defense Ministry communique reported that the plane, an export version, had no arms or supplentary fuel tank on board and was not equipped with photographic reconaissance instruments. The communique said that the pilot, who died on impact, has not been identified yet because he had no documents on him. His helmet was covered with words in Arabic, which will perhaps help investigators discover his identity.

The plane, which crashed against a mountain at an altitude of 900 meters, did not have much fuel at the moment of the crash. The area of the crash was immediately surrounded by police officers and road blocks were set up for a radius of five kilometers. Investigations are underway by local magistrates and the air force.

AUTHORITIES TO MEET IRANIAN STUDENTS ON EXAMS

AU191615 Rome ANSA in English 1600 GMT 19 Jul 80

[Text] Perugia, July 19 (ANSA)--Representatives of Italy's Foreign and Education Ministries will meet Wednesday with the committee of Iranian students. The committee represents 250 Iranians who have been on a hunger strike in Perugia for the last nine days to protest the fact that they were banned from taking university entrance examinations. The students have been calling for the meeting since the first day of the hunger strike.

PCI'S BERLINGUER MEET WITH MSZMP'S NEMETH

LD210741 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 13 Jul 80 p 15

[Unattributed report: "Hungarian Socialist Workers Party (MSZMP) Leader Received by Berlinguer"]

[Text] Rome--PCI Secretary General Comrade Enrico Berlinguer received Comrade Karoly Nemeth, MSZMP Politburo member and Central Committee secretary, yesterday at PCI directorate headquarters.

During the cordial conversation, which was attended by Hungary's Ambassador to Italy Rezso Palotas and the PCI foreign section chief, Comrade Antonio Rubbi, there was a broad exchange of information and opinions on the situation in Italy and Hungary, on certain aspects of the international situation and on the relations of friendship and cooperation between the PCI and MSZMP.

LEGISATIVE ELECTIONS TO BE HELD 5 OCTOBER

LD171945 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1900 GMT 17 Jul 80

[Text] President of the Republic General Ramalho Eanes today signed a decree setting 5 October as the date for the holding of the legislative elections. According to statements by Lt Col Vitor Alves on his way to today's meeting of the Council of the Revolution, however, this date has been regarded as (?unpropitious) by the council. It will be recalled that the number of deputies to be elected is 250, including 4 representing Portuguese emigrants.

AVANTE REPORTS ON CUNHAL VISIT TO MOZAMBIQUE

LD181143 [Editorial report] Lisbon AVANTE in Portuguese on 26 June publishes on page 12 several items concerning a recent 7-day visit to Mozambique by a PCP delegation headed by Secretary General Alvaro Cunhal.

An unattributed report on the visit reports the holding of talks on 18 June between the PCP delegation and a Mozambique Liberation Front--Frelimo--delegation consisting of President Machel; Jorge Rebelo, member of the Frelimo Standing Political Committee and Central Committee Secretariat; Mario da Graca Machungo, member of the standing political committee and minister of agriculture; and Jose Correia, planning and central committee member. The account also describes visits to the Limpopo region and the Matutuine District, as well as a dinner given in honor of the PCP delegation by President Machel.

In the apparent text of a statement made on his return to Lisbon, Cunhal maintains that the talks with the Frelimo delegation "made possible a broad exchange of information and views on the situation in the two countries and on problems of common interest." He adds: "We believe that the talks between the two parties were useful, fruitful and opportune." He also states that the visit to Mozambique and the talks "constituted a new and important step in strengthening relations of friendship and cooperation between the PCP and Frelimo."

He continues: "The PCP delegation ascertained the existence of immense prospects and potential for developing relations of cooperation (political, cultural, economic, commercial, and so forth) between Portugal and the People's Republic of Mozambique." And he comments: "We ascertained yet again that the Democratic Alliance government's foreign policy is causing Portugal extraordinary harm--in some instances, irreparable harm--in this field, too."

The apparent text of a greetings message from the PCP Central Committee to the Frelimo Central Committee on the fifth anniversary of the proclamation of Mozambique's independence notes that that event "and the Mozambican people's implementation of the task of building Mozambican society have a revolutionary scope and significance and constitute a considerable contribution to the advance of the world revolutionary process." It also expresses "the Portuguese Communists' firm determination to continue to work for even greater strengthening and intensification of the indestructible fraternal ties of friendship and cooperation" created by the two parties, and adds: "We are certain that in this way we will contribute to the development of an atmosphere of trust, friendship and cooperation in relations between the People's Republic of Mozambique and Portugal, in the interest of the two peoples and countries and of the common cause of progress, peace and socialism."

OREJA BRIEFS CABINET ON BOLIVIAN COUP, OFFICIAL NOTE

LD182353 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2200 GMT 18 Jul 80

[Text] During today's meeting of the Council of Ministers the situation in Bolivia was discussed. Foreign Minister Marcelino Oreja briefed the ministers on the events in Bolivia and reported on his talks with the ambassador of that country in Madrid, to whom he conveyed the fact that the Spanish Government deplores the happenings in his country, the interruption of the democratic process and the detention of the president and the members of the government. Marcelino Oreja also reported to the cabinet on the telephone conversation he has been having with the Spanish ambassador in La Paz and the assurances he has been given about the situation of the Spanish residents in Bolivia. A demarche had been initiated with the commander of the Bolivian Armed Forces regarding the detention in a radio station of three Spanish nuns.

An official note says that the Spanish Government is following with great preoccupation the march of events in Bolivia and it expresses its anxiety regarding the lack of guarantees for human rights and fundamental freedoms, since the military coup has cut off the democratic process and the popular will expressed through the suffrage of the people in the 29 June elections.

IRAN'S QOTBZADEH SENDS MESSAGE TO PRIME MINISTER SUAREZ

LD192004 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1800 GMT 19 Jul 80

[Text] Iranian Foreign Minister Sadeq Quotbzadeh, today sent a telegram from Paris to Spanish Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez congratulating him on the attitude of neutrality and solidarity held by his government and country with regard to Iran. The Iranian foreign minister also announced that he is canceling his trip to Nicaragua which he was going to make following a technical stopover in Madrid.

BASQUE PARLIAMENT APPROVES REPORT CONDEMNING VIOLENCE

LD191240 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 0600 GMT 19 Jul 80

[Excerpt] The plenum of the Basque autonomous parliament has approved, with the support of the Basque Nationalist Party [PNV] and the opposition of the remaining groups, the report of the institutional committee which expresses its unequivocal condemnation of all violent actions against life and property.

The report also states: It is necessary to promulgate and adopt whatever measures are needed to lead to a genuine and far-reaching democracy, to strict respect for every single human right, especially the right to life, freedom of expression, legalization of all political parties and guarantees of public freedoms. It is necessary that all citizens accept the political route as the only channel for the legitimate and necessary confrontation of all ideologies and options and renounce any kind of violence and the use of arms. As a result of the above, consideration will be given to whatever measures of clemency may be needed to eradicate the situations and personal problems which have resulted from past conditions to help bring about the necessary and complete reconciliation of all concerned.

We repeat that this report was approved with the support of the PNV. Socialist Deputy Juan Eguiagaray described the approval of the report as regrettable.

SPOKESMAN COMMENTS ON TALKS, SUMMIT AFTER GOBBI MEETING

NC200735 Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 20 Jul 80 p 12

[Text] In answer to a question by journalists, the government spokesman stated yesterday that the 18 July Kiprianou-Gobbi meeting was within the framework of the UN secretary general's efforts to reconvene the talks. He said that the UN secretary general is investigating the possibilities of resuming the talks, but so far nothing has occurred that would create movement on this serious issue. On the contrary, the stalemate continues. Asked if Mr Gobbi has conveyed to President Kiprianou the UN secretary general's views on Libya's initiative for a new Kiprianou-Denktas summit meeting, the government spokesman said that there has not been any development on this issue yet.

Waldheim Opposition to Libyan Talks

NC210705 Nicosia TO THARROS in Greek 21 Jul 80 p 8

[Text] According to certain press reports, the UN secretary general is opposed to Libyan leader Al-Qadhdhafi's mediation for finding a solution to the Cyprus issue and is accelerating his own activities to break the deadlock and have the intercommunal dialogue resume. The UN secretary general believes that the right conditions for a direct Kiprianou-Denktas meeting, as suggested by Al-Qadhdhafi, have not yet been created and bases this view on the report of his envoy in Nicosia, Mr Gobbi, who has ascertained that the Turkish Cypriots are insisting on their intransigent attitude. On the basis of the Gobbi report, Waldheim believes that a Kiprianou-Denktas meeting now would end without achieving any results and would only once again confirm the well-known unbridgeable stands of the two sides.

Meanwhile, according to reports from western sources, the EEC is going to speed up the procedures for Turkey's entry into the Community because it believes that this would make the settlement of Greek-Turkish differences and, of course, of the Cyprus question much easier. Moreover, according to European Community circles, this view is also supported by the Cyprus Government. The intensity of Western interest is increasing, particularly at this time that more use is being made of the bases in Cyprus both by the British forces, which are continuously being strengthened, and the American ones.

KLIRIDHIS DEMANDS KIPRIANOU'S RESIGNATION IN OPEN LETTER

NC191823 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1630 GMT 19 Jul 80

[Text] In an open letter to President Kiprianou today, Democratic Rally Chairman Kliridhis calls on him to resign, maintaining that Kiprianou has lost the people's confidence. In his letter, Kliridhis says that the Democratic Rally, which has withdrawn its tolerance [as heard] and AKEL, which has withdrawn its confidence, represent over 60 percent of the Cypriot people.

Spokesman's Replies

NC191825 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1630 GMT 19 Jul 80

[Text] Referring to Kliridhis' letter, the government spokesman has stated that it is regretable that Kliridhis, in repeating himself once again, follows the road of demagogy in improperly attacking the president on the eve of the anniversary of the Turkish invasion of our island. He said: What he says does not deserve an answer. The spokesman added that tomorrow's anniversary, a day of memory for the tribulations and tragedies of our people does not allow domestic strife and controversies but rather dictates to everyone the duty for unity and accord in the common struggle for the salvation of Cyprus and the survival of Cypriot Hellenism.

AGREEMENT ON NATO PREDICTED FOR SEPTEMBER

AT191425 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 19 Jul 80 pp 1, 3

[By "Contributor" N. Simos]

[Text] Unless unforeseen events intervene, the outstanding issue of Greece's return to the NATO military wing will end in the next few weeks. This is the gist of reports from Brussels, the sources of which let it be understood that a new plan of proposals has already been prepared whose essential points have been accepted by the Greek side. The new plan was formulated by General Rogers' staff, together with two senior Greek military officials, when General Rogers' staff members came to Athens and stayed for several days to take the Greek side's observations into consideration for the first time.

Given these facts, a return to NATO is almost a certainty, the only reservation being the procedures that will have to be followed.

Specifically, the new plan will be submitted for perusal by the Turkish Government; if the Turkish Government does not follow its well-known "veto" tactics, Greece will return to the alliance's military ranks.

Although it is of course difficult for one to prejudge Turkish reaction, one should take into consideration certain reports which, provided they are true, aim at the creation of a more temperate atmosphere in relations between the two countries, which means that there may not be a Turkish "veto" this time.

For instance, reports indicate that Turkey admits that the FIR issue in the Aegean does not constitute a substantive difference between the two countries; instead it concerns the need for certain technical arrangements.

On the other hand, as an indication of good will Greece accepts that priority be given to the solution of differences in the Aegean through dialogue between the two countries; only if Turkey procrastinates in the dialogue or torpedoes it will the differences then be submitted to international arbitration.

What is now known, however, regarding the return to NATO and the new plan which will be submitted in its final form to Athens are the relevant conditions which will govern the return. Provided one takes into consideration the fact that the basic points of the new plan are acceptable to the Greek side, one can speculate that the plan envisages--like the Haig-Davos agreement--first, Greece's return to NATO and then the solution of outstanding problems, that is, when our country becomes a full member.

The issue of defense cooperation between Greece and the United States seems to be developing in parallel since, after all, according to the Greek viewpoint, which U.S. Secretary of State Muskie accepted in Ankara, our country's return to NATO and the operation of U.S. bases in Greece are linked and that the bases can operate in Greece only as NATO bases.

Indeed, some efforts are being made to promote the outstanding problem of the agreement through diplomatic channels. Specifically it is being stated that the Greek ambassador in Washington, Tzounis, has undertaken initiatives in this direction.

Most probably, the agreement which was signed between the two countries in 1977 will constitute the basic structure for the new Greek-U.S. agreement with slight modifications. This means that, in light of some new developments, a new concept has prevailed according to which the U.S.-Turkish agreement need not be followed to the letter for the formulation of a corresponding U.S.-Turkish agreement is not only a defense but, for the first time, an economic agreement also.

In a way this concept confirms certain reports which note that economic issues are being addressed separately in our discussions with the U.S. side, something which is contrary to what happened in the defense-economic agreement between Turkey and the United States.

Thus, according to the same reports, a general economic agreement inprinciple is being promoted with relevant protocols which will determine both the extent of aid to Greece and the form of Greek-U.S. economic cooperation.

Reports from authoritative government circles confirm these developments in the two basic outstanding issues of our foreign policy and specifically the Greek haste for their settlement. Government circles note that in recent days (since the talks in Ankara) an opportunity was given to clarify the NATO issue, mainly with regard to its direct connection with the operation of U.S. bases in Greece.

According to reports from the same circles, the latest development in the NATO issue is that another proposal is expected from General Rogers "which will not cause much of a delay."

On the basis of the new proposals, government circles foresee developments around early September.

More generally, September is considered to be a month for increased activity since, most probably, President of the Republic Karmanlis will go to Romania; Greece will be visited by British Prime Minister Thatcher and the new chairman of the EEC Commission Gaston Thorn; and a meeting will be held between Mitsotakis and his Turkish counterpart Erkmen within the framework of the UN session. Mitsotakis will be in New York between 25 September and 3 October and will also meet with foreign ministers of other countries.

PAPANDREOU RAPS GOVERNMENT HANDLING OF RHODES INCIDENTS

AT181334 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 18 Jul 80 p 12

[Statement by leader of the official opposition and PASOK Chairman Andreas Papandreou on the incidents in Rhodes]

[Text] "We ask the government to immediately find a way out of the explosive problem it has created for itself in Rhodes. This is not the time to again comment on the--at the very least--unusual tourist agreement with Turkey.

"However now, when the anniversary of the Turkish invasion of Cyprus is exciting national popular feeling, it is not nationally acceptable to attempt to implement this agreement following the unacceptable "arrangement" for it by the Greek and Turkish foreign ministers.

"We also stress that the people of Rhodes feel trapped when, on the one hand, they respond to the mayor's call, who is not on friendly terms with the opposition, and to the call of representatives of the working classes and, on the other hand, face riot control police cars and helmeted policemen of the 'mild' New Democracy government.

"The government alone is responsible for the consequence of the clashes between certain elements--spontaneous or not--and directed police organs. It should immediately enter into a dialogue and revise its stance."

GOVERNMENT REFUSES TO RETURN IRANIAN OFFICERS SEEKING ASYLUM

NC210856 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 20 Jul 80 p 7

[Text] Ankara, ANKA--It has been reported that the two Iranian officers who fled from Iran and took refuge in Turkey on 11 July will not be handed back to Iran.

Following the announcement in Iran that an abortive coup had been attempted against Khomeyni, an Iranian lieutenant and a noncommissioned officer, whose names have not been disclosed, were reported to have landed in Agri Province in a helicopter.

The Foreign Ministry has issued no other statement regarding the Iranian officers, but replying to questions Foreign Ministry officials have said that "their case is being investigated."

Last week, however, Iranian Revolution Council spokesman Hasan Habibi stated that Turkey had been asked to return these two officers to Iran.

Political circles in Ankara are of the opinion that the Turkish Government will not return the officers to Iran because the Turks respect the sanctity of a request for asylum. The same circles say that no one who has asked for asylum on political grounds in the past has been returned despite persistent demands from the countries they had fled from. These circles cite the father and the son known as Koreyevos as an example.

FORMER PRIME MINISTER ERIM KILLED; LEADERS COMMENT

TA191020 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 19 Jul 80

[Excerpt] Former Prime Minister Nihat Erim has been killed by terrorists in Dragos in Istanbul, where he was vacationing. Erim's bodyguard Ali Kartal was also killed during the incident. According to information received by TRT correspondents from Kartal District [in Istanbul] Deputy Public Prosecutor Ali Hikmet Alp, the incident occurred as follows:

At 1100 Erim arrived by car at the beach in Dragos accompanied by his bodyguard. Four armed terrorists, who were waiting in a car at an entrance to the beach, attacked Erim as he and his bodyguard left his car. Erim and Kartal were killed by shots fired by the terrorists. Erim's wife, Kamile Erim, who was next to him, was not wounded. The terrorists fled by car from the scene of the incident. Martial law security forces started a widespread operation in the area following the incident.

Following the report on the killing of former Prime Minister Erim, Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel called the Council of Ministers for an extraordinary meeting at 1330. Demirel also canceled all his appointments for today.

Demirel Reaction

TA191310 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1200 GMT 19 Jul 80

[Text] The Council of Ministers met in an extraordinary session at 1330 today following the killing of the former prime minister, Prof Nihat Erim. In a statement to journalists before the meeting, Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel said the murder was a preplanned scheme and that the state is searching for the culprits. Pointing out that murder gangs will not escape the authority of the state, Demirel said the state is waging and will continue to wage a relentless struggle against these gangs and against those persons who wish to shed their brothers' blood.

Demirel noted that persons who attempt to disrupt the state, nation or tranquillity of the Turkish Republic will be confronted by the state. He said: The incident is part of a series of events. The 1974 amnesty has led Turkey to its current situation. Revenge gangs have emerged and we have reached a stage in which murder gangs and terrorists are turning into blackmailers. However, the state will, at all costs, continue to wage this struggle with determination and the lost lives will not be foregotten.

In reply to a question by a journalist on reports that a placard was found at the scene of the incident, Demirel said: I talked with the governor of Istanbul. A declaration was apparently found at the scene of the incident carrying the signature of a [political] faction. It would be misleading to comment in one way or another before a full evaluation of the facts. We will assess all the information currently available to the state during the Council of Ministers meeting. The Council of Ministers meeting was still in session when this report was prepared.

Council of Ministers Statement

TA191319 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1300 GMT 19 Jul 80

[Text] The Council of Ministers, which met at 1330 today following the killing of the former prime minister, Prof Nihat Erim, lasted 1 hour. A written statement issued after the meeting of the Council of Ministers says:

At its meeting held today, the Council of Ministers decided to express its condolences to the families of Prof Nihat Erim and his bodyguard Ali Kartal, who were the victims of a despicable murder in Istanbul, as well as to all the people and to denounce the incident. During its meeting the Council of Ministers reviewed the situation in connection with the deplorable murder.

Political Leaders' Comments

TA191808 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 19 Jul 80

[Summary] In a message on the killing of former Prime Minister Nihat Erim, Acting President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil said: "A handful of internal conspirators, who also receive support from the outside, are continuing their threats and aggressions against the unity of our country and the democratic system. Caglayangil added that the struggle against the enemies of the deomcratic system will continue unabated. He then praised Erim and expressed his belief that the people will not forget his services to the country.

In a statement on the killing of former Prime Minister Erim, RPP leader Bulent Ecevit said: The recent deplorable incidents prove that the time has come or has even passed to unite to establish peace in the country, to enhance our national unity and to strengthen the state. Expressing his great regret over the killing of former Prime Minister Erim, Ecevit recalled the services rendered by Erim and continued: These incidents prove that there are people in our country that want to risk everything to destroy our democracy and our state and to spread unrest. Inhumane methods are being used to this end. A new regretable incident has been added to those that have been happening lately.

The Justice Party's leadership council issued a statement in connection with the killing of Nihat Erim. The statement praised the services rendered by Erim and expressed the sympathies of the party over the killing of Erim. It added that the culprits will soon be brought to justice.

NSP leader Necmettin Erbakan issued a message on the killing of Erim in which he said that it is imperative for the parliament to deal with these killings. Erbakan continued: As proved by the killing of a legislator the other day and the assassination of a former prime minister today, the violent incidents are escalating without regard for human life or values and are creating a grave situation.

Commenting on the same incident, NAP leader Alpaslan Turkes denounced the incidents of terror and called on the people to unite against them on the side of the law and the state. Recalling that Erim served as a prime minister in the period following the 12 March 1971 intervention, Turkes said that it was then that military courts had tried and condemned the communists and divisionists that had brought Turkey to the brink of the precipice. Turkes continued: Released by the amnesty of 1974, those condemned by these courts as well as their supporters are now attacking officers, judges and state officials that served during the aftermath of 12 March in a bid to take their revenge. Nihat Erim has been the latest victim of these attacks. He then expressed his regrets over the killing of Erim.

Continuing Investigation

TA201204 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 20 Jul 80

[Text] The search and investigation in connection with the murder of the former prime minister, Prof Nihat Erim and his bodyguard Ali Kartal by terrorists in Istanbul are continuing.

In a statement to a TRT correspondent Istanbul Governor Nevzat Ayaz noted that the security forces are conducting positive investigations and that the murderers will be apprehended as soon as possible. Ayaz said: Security forces are conducting technical work in connection with the incident. An illegal leftist organization has assumed responsibility for the murder of Erim and his bodyguard. A multifaceted investigation is underway concerning this organization. Security forces have important clues and are on the right path.

Interior Minister Mustafa Gulcugil, who went to Istanbul following the murder of Erim and his bodyguard, Security General Director Ismail Dokuzogulu and the gendarmerie general command staff chief, Maj Gen Mehmet Kiral, are following the work conducted by the security forces.

Security directorate officials reported that numerous suspects were detained during operations conducted by military units and security forces. The drawings of a man and a woman who are believed to be connected with the murder are being circulated. Meanwhile it was announced that the funeral of Erim will be held on 22 July. The funeral ceremony will be held at the Sisli Mosque after the noon prayers, and Erim will be buried in the Zincirlikuyu Cemetery. Ayaz said an announcement regarding the official funeral will be made tomorrow.

DEMIREL REPLIES TO RPP ACCUSATION ON KILLING OF DEPUTY

TA181751 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 18 Jul 80

[Excerpt] Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel replied to journalists' questions at the end of his weekly meeting with Acting President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil today. In reply to a journalist who recalled the RPP claim that the killing of deputy from Istanbul Abdurrahman Koksaldglu is connected with efforts to ensure the survival of the government, Demirel said: Such a statement is not compatible with reason, logic or conscience. If they made such a statement, I am amazed at their thinking. This is an extremely harsh accusation. The accuser should immediately produce evidence. I am also amazed at how such a thing was thought by a normal mind. If someone repeats this statement once more. I will reply very harshly. Let them either produce evidence or stop talking nonsense. If they say it again without producing evidence, it is up to them and I will make them regret it.

GOVERNMENT THREATENS TO STOP DEVELOPMENT AID TO BOLIVIA

[Text] Bonn--The Federal Government has resolutely condemned the military putsch in Bolivia and threatened to stop development aid. The Foreign Ministry spokesman today told the press that for the second time within a short period the beginnings of this country's democratic development have been destroyed. He said that this development is a "setback for democratic forces that were trying to lead Bolivia back to free and pluralistic democracy."

The Federal Government, which especially regrets the loss of human life during the putsch, called on the military government in La Paz to do everything to avoid further bloodshed and not to prevent the establishment of a freely elected government. The spokesman stressed that developments are being carefully observed. The Federal Government will reserve decisions on further cooperation with Bolivia in development policy.

A spokesman for the Federal Ministry for Economic Cooperation stated that at government negotiations last autumn and this spring Bolivia had each time been promised DM30 million in capital aid and a total of DM16 million in technical aid. Up to the autumn of 1979 the Latin American country had received development aid from Bonn in the neighborhood of DM440 million.

ARAB LEAGUE EXECUTIVE MEETS WITH GENSCHER

LD211504 Hamburg DPA in German 1425 GMT 21 Jul 80

[Excerpt] Bonn--The Middle East problem and European-Arab relations were the main topic of a talk lasting more than an hour that Chedli Klibi, secretary general of the Arab League, held here today with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher. Klibi has been on an official visit to the Federal capital since Sunday evening. The visit has gained additional topicality as a result of the recent Middle East statement by the European summit conference and the forthcoming special session of the UN General Assembly on the Palestinian question.

In the morning Klibi had made an excursion to Luxembourg where he met Gaston Thorn, foreign minister and acting EC Council president. The meeting dealt with Thorn's forthcoming visit to the Middle East. On Tuesday Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt will receive the Arab politician for a talk in the guest house of the Hamburg Senate.

During a dinner for the Arab League secretary general, Foreign Minister Genscher said this evening that the PLO must also participate in efforts for a just and lasting peace in the Middle East. Genscher recalled the Middle East declaration of the EEC summit and the appeal it contained to relinquish the use or threat of force. He stated: "The principles which we regard as an indispensable condition for a peaceful solution hold true for all parties involved, including the Palestinian people and the PLO, which must participate in the negotiations."

Europe is prepared to work actively in bringing about a Middle East peace settlement. "We will establish contacts for this purpose with the parties involved," announced the foreign minister. Without mentioning Egypt by name, Genscher expressed regret over the discord "which has arisen over the way and method of bringing about a peace settlement." He added: "We are of the opinion that the unity of the Arab nation represents an essential condition for peace. That is why we refrain from doing anything which could deepen the gulf between our Arab friends still further."

Further Details

[Excerpts] Bonn--Today the secretary general of the Arab League, Chedli Klibi, continued yesterday's talks with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher. This afternoon Klibi will fly to Hamburg for a meeting with Chancellor Helmut Schmidt.

It has been said that Klibi's talks in Bonn have so far brought agreement that the European Community ought to take part in the Middle East peace process with its own initiatives and that the European-Arab dialogue on comprehensive cooperation between the two governments [as received] ought to be resumed with the future inclusion of political topics.

BONN HAS 'NO COMMENT' ON AL-QADHDHAFI'S REPARATION DEMANDS

LD211444 Hamburg DPA in German 1357 GMT 21 Jul 80

[Excerpt] Bonn--The Federal Government today refused to make any statement on the reparations demands made by Libyan revolutionary leader Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi in the latest edition of the news magazine DER SPIEGEL. In the interview Al-Qadhdhafi repeated the demand that the Germans, British and Italians should pay reparations "amounting to billions" for the damage inflicted in World War II. Otherwise, he would have the three countries' possessions in Libya seized.

When asked for Bonn's view, government spokesman Klaus Boelling answered: "No comment." Boelling and Foreign Ministry spokesman Jergen Sudhoff said that the Federal Government has only learned of Al-Qadhdhafi's demands through the media. There has been no official Libyan request.

GENSCHER COMMENTS ON RESULTS OF YUGOSLAV TOUR

DW210950 Frankfurt Hessischer Rundfunk Network in German 1615 GMT 18 Jul 80

[Text] [Question] Why does Bonn consider it important to stress that your visit here was the first visit outside the alliance following your visit to Moscow along with the federal chancellor?

[Answer] By visiting this country we demonstrate that we are interested in living with the nonaligned states in a relationship involving partnership with equal rights. We do not consider the nonaligned states an object of our policy nor an instrument of our policy, and we see our relations with the nonaligned not merely from the point of view of East-West relations. We consider the nonaligned equal partners together with whom we want to contribute to safeguarding peace in the world and to cooperation with equal rights.

[Question] As the FDP chief what did you discuss yesterday with the party official Dolanc?

[Answer] It is quite natural that the political forces in various countries also need to speak to each other. The Federal Government considers it very important that visitors coming to our country speak not only with government representatives, but also with party and parliamentary representatives so as to give the visitors to our country a broad picture of the effective political forces.

Therefore, it is natural that the foreign minister as well as the FDP chairman is interested in meeting personalities who hold government positions and also those who in other ways bring considerable influence to bear on the politics of this country.

[Question] You saw President Mijatovic this morning. What are your impressions of Mijatovic and Dolanc?

[Answer] The most important impression is determination and cohesion, cohesion with regard to following the path they jointly consider the right path, and determination to be persistent in continuing Yugoslavia's policy.

[Question] You have stated repeatedly that the Federal Republic will support the stabilization measures introduced by Yugoslavia. Do any concrete ideas exist in this respect?

[Answer] It is primarily a matter of viewing these stabilization measures and their results with respect. We are aware that a country striving in such an energetic and purposeful way for economic stability is worth our support and is a good partner for economic cooperation. We have stressed this to the European Community; we were the one who facilitated the smooth conclusion of negotiations on the cooperation agreement. This should also apply to other forms of economic cooperation which I will discuss tomorrow in detail with the minister president.

GENSCHER VIEWS FRG-PORTUGUESE RELATIONS, OTHER ISSUES

LD220835 Lisbon EXPRESSO in Portuguese 12 Jul 80 pp 1, 24

[Marcelo Rebelo de Sousa interview with FRG Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher: "Simultaneous entry by Portugal and Spain Into Europe of Nine"--date and place not specified]

[Text] EXPRESSO: Mr Minister, what political significance do you attach to this first visit by an FRG president to Portugal since the establishment of the young Portuguese democracy?

Hans-Dietrich Genscher: The FRG president's [K. Carstens] state visit is the first official visit by a German head of state for 75 years. It is of fundamental political significance. The official visit is a demonstration of the great sympathy with which our country's government and citizens have followed Portugal's path since the beginning of Portuguese democracy, after the revolution. It demonstrates our active interest in the continuation of favorable development of young country, and is an expression of our commitment to support Portugal as far as possible in its progress toward Europe.

I am personally glad about the opportunity to meet again during this important stage in international politics with Prime Minister Dr Francisco Sa Carneiro and Foreign Minister Prof Diogo Freitas do Amaral, so that we can continue the constant, intensive and fruitful exchange of views, following our talks in Lisbon in April this year. The talks between our two governments, held in a spirit of trust and friendship, are an unequivocal demonstration of the excellent relations between our two countries.

EEC: Timetable Should Be Followed

EXPRESSO: As you perhaps know, one of the most controversial issues of the current Portuguese political situation is that concerning the objections raised by certain EEC member states to Portugal's full membership in the Community. I would like you to answer the three questions which I will now ask you about this issue:

--Does the FRG share the same objections and reservations expressed, for instance, by France?

--Does the FRG still accept the timetable previously established, and specifically the possibility of Portuguese membership being realized in 1983?

--Does the FRG believe that Portuguese membership will be prior to, at the same time as, or later than, that of Spain?

Hans-Dietrich Genscher: For convincing political reasons, the FRG Government has declared itself in favor of both Portugal's and Spain's membership in the EC. It hopes that this step will result in a greater consolidation of democracy in the applicant countries and in an increase in Europe's political and economic importance. The FRG Government supports this aim unswervingly and with the utmost resolve.

The need for structural adjustments within the Community was not created by the 30 May 1980 decisions in Brussels on the British budgetary contribution. It merely became more apparent as a result of this decision. Nobody can dispute the interaction between structural adjustments within the Community and the EC's southward enlargement. But political honesty requires that we note that the problems to be resolved stem from the Community's present structure and do not arise now with the entry of new members. The negotiations on membership should not stagnate for this reason but should continue without delays. We will strive to ensure that the negotiations on membership and the structural adjustments within the Community take place simultaneously. Moreover, many aspects of the negotiations will not be affected at all or only indirectly by the structural adjustments in the EC. The FRG Government can see no reason for departing from the established timetable.

So far it has been possible to keep up the pace of the negotiations which was set under the FRG's presidency of the EC. It has been possible to formulate negotiating positions on most aspects. We are determined to continue the negotiations on membership cautiously, without delays and without interruption, with the aim of membership as soon as possible.

In principle, simultaneous entry by Portugal and Spain would be desirable. Otherwise, additional difficulties of adjustment would arise for the Community. However, specific technical problems, whose effects on the progress of the negotiations on membership should be appraised by the Community separately in each instance, are arising during the respective negotiations.

Agriculture, Television and Small and Medium Enterprises

EXPRESSO: Would you care to briefly assess bilateral relations between Portugal and the FRG, specifically in the economic field?

Hans-Dietrich Genscher: Our bilateral relations in the political field are excellent. Our close and manifold economic relations are also in keeping with these. With an approximately 14 percent share of total imports, the FRG was Portugal's most important supplier country, also in 1979. As a purchasing country, the FRG took the second place, after Britain, in 1978 (approximately 13 percent of total Portuguese exports).

Together with trade, economic cooperation between the governments has developed well. Exactly 1 month ago, we concluded a basic agreement on technical cooperation which will facilitate our joint action in the technical field even further. Bilateral cooperation in the sphere of development policy has also been increased considerably. In 1979, the amount of financial cooperation increased by DM70 million per year. At the end of 1979, a total of 21 financial cooperation projects and 18 technical cooperation projects were at the stage of implementation and planning. The principal aspects of cooperation within the framework of development policy are: Agriculture in rural regions and the development of television, as well as the encouragement of small and medium enterprises.

Currently, direct German investments total approximately DM461 million. There is certainly still room for improvements in this field, especially if the agreement on the mutual encouragement of investments, initialled a year ago, could be signed, following a settlement of some outstanding compensation cases satisfactory to all sides.

EXPRESSO: How does the FRG Government view the importance of the traditional relations between Portugal and various Third World countries--especially the Portuguese-speaking countries--for the EEC, with respect to the intensification of dialogue and contacts between the EEC and the countries concerned?

Hans-Dietrich Genscher: The FRG and our EC partners follow a policy of partnership and cooperation with the Third World states. By strengthening these countries' economic and social foundations, we wish to contribute to their political stability, helping them to maintain their independence and autonomy and to follow their own political path, free from undesired external influences.

Within this context, Portugal's manifold traditional relations with the Third World countries, specifically with the Portuguese-speaking states in Africa and Latin America, could constitute a welcome and valuable enrichment of our dialogue with the Third World.

"Important and Respected Partner in NATO"

EXPRESSO: How do you view Portugal's role in NATO?

Hans-Dietrich Genscher: Portugal is an important and respected member within the Atlantic alliance, which guarantees security and a future in freedom for all of us. All the partners are glad that Portugal has resumed its place in the alliance with new determination and intensified commitment to the cause of maintaining peace. The fact that Portugal is also cooperating for the first time in the Nuclear Planning Group, as well as the Portuguese program for building frigates, characterize this process.

Portugal's military role in the alliance concerns in particular the security of the so-called Atlantic approaches. It is a matter of the security of the Portugal-Azores-Madeira triangle, which is of vital strategic importance for sending reinforcements from North America. The massive expansion of the Soviet Navy, as well as the additional involvement of the U.S. naval forces outside the sphere of NATO, as a result of the existing crises, have made this role on the part of Portugal even more important.

EXPRESSO: And what is the state of the Atlantic alliance in light of the Ankara communique?

Hans-Dietrich Genscher: The NATO spring conference in Ankara gave an impressive demonstration of the Alliance's cohesion and determination. This is reflected in the communique on this conference, which contains unambiguous and clear statements on the major problems besetting all of us: developments in Afghanistan, the CSCE meeting in Madrid, the issues of arms control policy and the other conflicts determining the basic external conditions of our alliance.

The communique also demonstrates our determination to adopt the measures necessary for our defense, if the negotiations on medium-range nuclear missiles offered by the alliance achieve no result. This alliance, which is vital for all of us, has always grown with the challenges confronting it.

It will also remain in the future the inalienable basis of our efforts to protect our common values against external threats--through joint defense, as well as through a jointly formulated and implemented realistic policy of detente toward the East bloc.

APEL VIEWS DEFENSE PROBLEMS, MISSILE DEPLOYMENT

DW211211 Stuttgart Sueddeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 1045 GMT 19 Jul 80

[Text] [Question] Preparatory talks are supposed to be held on a limitation agreement on European medium-range armament between the United States and the Soviet Union. What in particular must be considered from a West European point of view, from the Federal Republic's point of view?

[Answer] I think that in any case western Europe must insure that a military balance is reestablished. Also with regard to nuclear arms, it must be desirable if this were possible via arms limitation and arms control; therefore preparatory talks and therefore negotiations as early as possible. We must stand firm in our determination to close the arms gap--which would be the reestablishment of a military balance--through the stationing of American medium-range missiles in Western Europe if these negotiations do not show results, only if we show this firm will can negotiations be successful.

[Question] The federal chancellor pointed out with regard to Belgium and the Netherlands on the occasion of the visit by Luxembourg Prime Minister Werner that the decision to close the arms gap you just mentioned must be implemented. If it turned out that both countries were to reject the stationing of American medium-range missiles, would it not entail a change in the Federal Government's concept?

[Answer] I am not very happy about hypothetical questions, even more so because the Belgian Government stated that it would make a final decision this year. The Netherlands wants to decide in 1981, but I believe that we must recall our starting point: It was our starting point that we as the Federal Republic of Germany do not want to be isolated in Western Europe. In other words, the nuclear arms of the United States must not be stationed only on continental European territory in our country. Italy has unconditionally and in an unlimited way approved the stationing, exactly as we have. This condition has thus been fulfilled.

Our Benelux neighbors must be told clearly that NATO is a body where there is no and will be no membership with different rights and duties. This means that we expect approval from them in due time.

[Question] Do you think that the Soviet Union's demand to include the so-called forward-based American nuclear arms stationed in Europe in the negotiations will aggravate the Western negotiating position?

[Answer] It will certainly complicate negotiations as a whole, because if the Soviet Union wants to include such systems in the negotiations, we will naturally also have to include the USSR's corresponding systems in the negotiations, which will make negotiations more complicated. However, it is not impossible to achieve results within the envisaged time frame. If the political will exists, the ways leading to a limitation agreement will be accessible.

[Question] Does the strong emphasis, which I believe is the first, on German-French cooperation in the field of defense laid down during the most recent consultations a week ago, and the explicit agreement on the part of the Federal Government with regard to the French neutron weapon, which it has within the framework of its national nuclear deterrence potential, does all this mean more independence for the Europeans with regard to defense and to not being so dependent on the Americans?

[Answer] At present there is no decision with regard to the neutron weapon. There is only an announcement that a decision will be possible in 1982-83 when technology will have advanced far enough. We think that the French modernization efforts are good. French deterrence in the field of nuclear arms is significant, but intensified consultations will have to take place in due time on the modalities pertaining to the use of these arms, because these arms will naturally involve Germany. They will not shoot over Germany to the territories of other states. In an emergency they might be used on the territory of the Federal Republic.

[Question] Do you want to take part in the target planning if possible?

[Answer] There will have to be a consultation mechanism similar to the mechanism we have agreed on with the NATO states. I must point out, by the way, that although I am a Cabinet member and the defense minister, these problems will fall mainly into the competence of the French president and the German federal chancellor.

[Question] So you see no efforts aimed at becoming a bit less dependent on the United States?

[Answer] Not at all! One thing remains absolutely certain: For geographical reasons alone Western Europe will be unable to defend itself without the Atlantic partnership. Compared with the enormous land masses of Eurasia, Western Europe is in a certain sense only a small part of Europe. Therefore, any idea about an independent European role--in the field of nuclear forces as well--is foolish and dangerous.

[Question] Does this also pertain to British modernization with the Trident?

[Answer] There is a central difference here with regard to French arms: The British are subordinated to NATO. In other words, they are NATO arms, and if I may say so, they are very close to the American arms with regard to their significance.

[Question] Let me ask you a few questions about the Bundeswehr itself. What is causing your concern? The fact, for example, that you have enough money to buy new aviation systems for the air force, but not enough for new arms systems? How about the prolongation of basic military service time?

[Answer] Let me begin with the second question, because it is a question involving the future. In the late eighties we will certainly have too few young men to maintain the standard of military conscripts at the present level. A number of options will have to be considered at that time: more soldiers with an extended service time, more professional soldiers, a more frequent use of reservists and possibly an extension of the compulsory military service time. But as I said, that will be at the end of this decade, in 6 to 8 years.

Now the first question--we certainly do not have enough money, but mistakes were made in the past. New arms systems were ordered as well as a new and expensive plane. We acted like the song says: "We will discuss love later on," meaning that we would discuss arms later. So now we have a time lag with regard to the introduction of new arms systems; with regard to the simultaneous modernization of arms, guns and ammunition. This cannot be allowed to happen again.

By the way, a shortage of money will be the central problem of our Bundeswehr in this decade. We must therefore set new priorities this year. The spending of every mark must be considered twice, and then one must do what is necessary. There is no longer any place for prestige objects.

COOPERATION MINISTER RETURNS FROM MAPUTO

[Excerpts] Bonn--Rainer Offergeld, federal minister of economic cooperation, returned to Bonn today from his week-long talks in Southern Africa held at government level with a positive impression of the future possibilities for cooperation in Zimbabwe and Mozambique.

Offergeld described his talks with President Samora Machel and his close adviser, Harbors and Transport Minister Luis Maria Alcantara Santos, as encouraging. According to Offergeld, there are "visible indications" that Mozambique wants to free itself from its dependence on the Eastern bloc, which results from the massive Eastern support for the Frelimo liberation movement--today's state party--duing the independent struggle. Offergeld said he had to listen to "very frank" words about the lack of support from Bonn at that time and about its cooperation with the colonial power, Portugal.

Offergeld stressed that Mozambique's striving for genuine nonaligned status was fully supported by the Federal Government. President Machel had been more specific about his announcement to journalists that his country did not rule out the possibility of joining the CEMA when he said that Mozambique had not yet committed itself in any way.

Commenting on the close economic ties between South Africa and Mozambique--an important transit country owing to its ports and railroads--Offergeld said that the Mozambique side had made it clear in the talks that it had no wish to see "economic chaos" in South Africa. [passage indistinct] Offergeld said that the German commitment to the western efforts to install a system in Namibia which involved all political forces also had Maputo's approval. Offergeld, who conveyed a message to President Machel from Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and announced large-scale foodstuffs aid for Mozambique, spoke of a "really cordial atmosphere" at the end of his talks.

BOLIVIA SITUATION CAUSES CONCERN; EMBASSY OCCUPIED

[Excerpts] In Paris, about 50 Bolivians and some members of the Socialist Party occupied the Bolivian Embassy early this afternoon and are still occupying it. They have asked the French police, who have surrounded the embassy, to withdraw.

The French Government has stated that it is concerned by the newly created situation in Bolivia. The French Communist Party has issued a firm protest.

GISCARD AIDE DISCUSSES FRENCH 'TRIALOGUE' PLAN

LD210731 Paris LE MONDE in French 16 Jul 80 p 3

[Gerard Viratelle report: "The French 'Trialogue' Plan intended To Give Political Expression to Solidarity Between Europe, the Arab World and Africa"]

[Text] "Ensuring security by development; introducing an all-embracing and specific approach to North-South relations; giving political expression to the historical, geographical, cultural and economic areas of solidarity which already exist between Europe, the Arab world and Africa." These are the main objectives of the "trialogue" which is not merely, as is sometimes alleged, "European technology plus the Arab oil-producing states' money to exploit the African Continent's resources and satisfy its vast needs." According to assurances given by Henry Jean-Baptiste, technical adviser to the presidency of the republic with particular responsibility for the Euro-Arab-African cooperation plan which he officially presented for the first time to the Euro-African press association in Paris on Thursday 10 July.

A Flexible Framework for Consultation

Since Mr Giscard d'Estaing gave a general outline of this trialogue in Kigali in May 1979 and then in Kuwait in February this year, a working group, comprising senior civil servants, has defined the nature and content of this trialogue--it is to be a flexible framework for consultation and triangular cooperation in the most varied spheres. At the present stage the plan comprises four sections:

Economic--This section is based on the observation that the three areas form a preferential trade zone: Europe, for instance, carries on one-third of its trade with the other potential partners in the trialogue. How will this trialogue fit in with the EEC-African, Carribean and Pacific countries agreements, and the Euro-Arab and Arab-African dialogues? "The aim is not to replace what already exists," Mr Jean-Baptiste explained, "but rather to enrich and expand it." Similarly the trialogue should not replace UN efforts in the sphere of North-South relations (all-embracing negotiations in particular). It could constitute a complementary framework. "The world-scale UN concepts have shown their limitations; the poorest countries, for instance, think that the United Nations does not take enough account of their problems," the architect of the Elysee plan pointed out.

In fact, he admitted, triangular cooperation already exists. This is true notably of the joint financing operations "mounted" by the Central Fund for Economic Cooperation, the European Development Fund, and the World Bank with Arab financial cooperation. It is not funds which are lacking but rather projects--although many have been drawn up and many others are being studied--and the ability to implement them as well as vital guarantees for Arab investments in Africa.

Political--This section is intended to lead to the drafting of a charter of security through development. "The approach we are envisaging is essentially political. It could result in a summit conference attended by top leaders from the countries concerned. It could also take the form of a solemn document--a real charter of solidarity defining rules of conduct among states," Mr Giscard d'Estaing stated at the sixth Franco-African summit in May 1979. However, Mr Jean-Baptiste admitted, the trialogue "will take the form which emerges from consultation among partners."

Cultural--At present this third section is probably the one which should take shape most quickly. "The aim," the spokesman explained, "is to encourage 'recognition' of cultures, to make people aware of each other, in short to ensure the worlds which show little mutual understanding despite their long-standing relations, no longer practice mutual "culture shock" but accept their differences and use them as a source of enrichment." These are concerns dear to [Senegalese President] Senghor. Therefore, several initiatives are being studied "to ensure that cultural factors are also part of international relations": a colloquium "which should not be reserved for an elite," calling for a "dialogue between civilizations," an ideas club, a foundation, publication projects, exhibitions, actions to safeguard national heritages and so forth. "It is difficult to conceive of a model for development--the example of Iran emphasizes this--which disregards cultural factors," Mr Jean-Baptiste continued.

The fourth section envisages a "dialogue among civilizations," a club engaged on "specific projects" which will be known as "trialogue" and a "think tank" as well as a center for analyzing future prospects. The list of projects at present includes: continual training of intermediate cadres, transfers of technology, relations among research centers, mining cooperation and, in the alternative energy sphere, security and improved funds for financial investments.

Reaction From Countries Concerned

This triangular cooperation, of course, still has to be accepted by the various parties concerned. The European partner will not just be the EEC since Mr Giscard d'Estaing spoke of "democratic and liberal Europe" (including the Scandinavian countries). The European Nine have been given an exploratory mandate to study the French proposal in which Norway seems to be extremely interested. Paris seems to think that political and not just economic reasons should lead the Europeans to support the idea...once the South has agreed.

In this connection Mr Jean-Baptiste has already made great effort to win the Arab world and Africa to the cause. At the United Nations he presented the plan to members of the Group of 77--the developing countries--and explained that the aim was not to compete with the search for solutions at world level but to contribute to it. He did likewise at the Franco-African summit in Nice at the beginning of May and again recently to some other heads of state in the corridors of the OAU. However, a draft resolution on the trialogue, notably giving the OAU secretary general a mandate to examine the subject, was referred to the foreign ministers' meeting in Addis Ababa at the beginning of 1981. Will the Arab League be more diligent? It is also due to be informed of the French proposal. The reaction of Middle East leaders during the president's tour, however, seemed "encouraging and positive." This reaction still has to take a practical form. "The Arabs seem concerned about the dnagers hanging over Africa," Mr Jean-Baptiste adeed.

Will triangular cooperation do something to absorb the oil deficits burdening the European countries' economies, back their investment effort in Africa and help it to be extended? Africa needs a "good plan" and France's mission is to innovate, Mr Jean-Baptiste also said.

LE MATIN SAYS CARTER SEES EUROPE MORE AS 'SUBJECT'

LD211527 Paris LE MATIN in French 12-13 Jul 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Carter's Double Talk"]

[Text] The common aspect of the two summits which have taken place on the international scene this week--the Giscard-Schmidt and Carter-Hua Guofeng meetings--is that both have strengthened axes. On the one hand, the Paris-Bonn axis in Europe. On the other hand, the Washington-Beijing-Tokyo axis across the Pacific. Since these efforts to strengthen ties essentially stemmed from the desire to create effective counterbalances to the Kremlin's military and diplomatic offensives, the "doctrine" on which the anti-Soviet front is based could have been expected to be highlighted. However, this was not the case. Quite the reverse: We were able to assess the ambiguities of Jimmy Carter's foreign policy, on the one hand, and the way in which the Franco-German ideas are opposed to the White House options, on the other.

In his anti-Soviet crusade, the U.S. President does not speak the same language to his Western allies as he does to his Chinese and Japanese partners. When he addresses Europe he does not stop at any argument to encourage it to help and fiercely support him. Moreover, he constantly complains about the Europeans' attitude and apparently does not wish to take an obvious fact into account: Europe is very close to the USSR, Hamburg being 40 km from the Red Army divisions for instance. This situation logically makes people think!

On the other hand, when talking to Tokyo, Jimmy Carter curiously enough tries to spare Moscow while condemning Soviet aims in Asia on principle.

Indeed this double talk shows that Washington regards Europe not so much as an "ally" as a "subject" whose job is to align with Uncle Sam. Jimmy Carter, who is increasingly a White House candidate and less and less U.S. President, has chosen to wear the hat of super world leader in face of his adversary Ronald Reagan. He scolds his traditional partners while he merely "warns" his Asian friends.

In face of such an evolution, it is east to understand why Valery Giscard d'Estaing and Helmut Schmidt chose to take a stronger and more independent Europe as the theme of the 36th Franco-German summit. Nonetheless, there is reason to wonder whether the German chancellor's European convictions are dictated by the proximity of the election battle. Helmut Schmidt's intention is probably to counter Franz Josef Strauss' tough speech on "Europe in Danger." From this viewpoint the election battle which is being fought on the other side of the Rhine is very indicative of all the doubts involved in the process of building Europe.

In essence Europe is only an argument in Helmut Schmidt's short-term political battle. For Strauss it is a rampart against communism. For the French head of state, Europe is "a grand design."

GREMETZ CRITICIZES 'BONN-PARIS AXIS,' URGES 'INDEPENDENCE'

LD210827 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 15 Jul 80 pp 1, 5

[Article by PCF Politburo member Maxime Gremetz: "Schmidt-Giscard--the Essential Fact"]

[Text] V. Giscard d'Estaing's trip to the FRG and the content of the statements made are indicative of Giscardian policy's fundamental line.

It is to carry through France's integration into a West European bloc at any cost, to agree to take second place by encouraging the FRG's leadership in Europe through his policy of French decline and submission and to cooperate with the FRG to strengthen Atlanticism and allegiance toward the United States.

The French president's meeting with L. Brezhnev in Warsaw and Chancellor Schmidt's visit to Moscow cannot conceal this essential fact.

As we have stressed several times, the Giscardian government and Schmidt are playing an active part in international tensions.

Their common and reaffirmed desire to act "in keeping with their own methods" to call the existing military balance into question and, if possible, obtain superiority in this sphere for imperialism's benefit, is, fortunately, faced with a situation which they cannot disregard.

The balance of forces at international level is being consolidated in favor of Socialism and the forces of progress and peace. At the same time the capitalist system's crisis aggravated by the reduction in imperialism's sphere of influence and the peoples' struggle is growing worse and is forcing countries like France and the FRG to maintain and extend cooperation with the socialist countries.

The defense of the interests of multinationals with a national parent company--interests which, moreover, by no means coincide--the weight of public opinion and the struggle being waged by communist parties--a different struggle in each country--is forcing them to maneuver, to keep the policy of tension within reasonable limits, and to adopt attitudes which differ at times in implementing imperialism's global strategy.

This contradictory aspect must not be neglected in the struggle. However, it cannot give us any illusions about the real nature of this policy.

The meeting between the French president and the German chancellor, for instance, should give rise to further thought and more clarity among those who endlessly expound on a Europe allegedly independent of U.S. imperialism--a Europe of progress and peace.

As Giscard and Schmidt confirmed, this Europe is the Europe of big capital, austerity and unemployment which should express its solidarity with the U.S. leader at all times in an appropriate form and should "serve as a West European counterbalance to the Soviet Union." While admitting that this decision favors an additional threat potential, their peaceful Europe consists in confirming the common West German and French desire for NATO's decision to deploy new U.S. Euromissiles to go ahead and, as a natural complement, for the neutron bomb to be manufactured for forward battle.

Of course there was no lack of speeches about the need to negotiate to halt the arms race and promote military detente. However, a whole series of excuses and fallacious pretexts have followed the USSR's new constructive proposals which take everybody at his word and state clearly on this occasion: Let us negotiate without delay on all medium-range nuclear weapons on the basis of respect for partiy and guaranteed mutual security. All the indications clearly show that this big capital Europe led by the right and by Social Democracy is a Europe of increased dependence on the United States, a Europe of tension and the arms race.

Claiming that even greater European integration and an even more supranational Europe could be a possible path--a third path to socialism for the European peoples--is merely utopian and a source of setbacks for the working classes and the peoples.

Giscard d'Estaing's haste to push the country onto such a path is revealing. His visit to the FRG marked a new step toward national resignation, European and Atlanticist integration and alignment with the FRG.

The Giscard government is selling off our country's independence to safeguard the interests of a few French-based multinationals. He is following a deliberate policy of French decline, sacrificing whole branches of our economic, agricultural, scientific and cultural potential.

European plans for industry, the calling into question of the agricultural policy's achievements, the Common Market's expansion, accepted and implemented by the government while sacrificing the interests of our country and our people, are increasing the FRG's domination in Europe at the economic, political and also military levels.

The Paris-Bonn axis has been replaced by the Bonn-Paris axis which, with Giscard D'Estaing's blessing, embodies this new and, to say the least, disturbing situation. Such a policy will have serious consequences for our country and our people. It is the policy which, for class reasons, will be pursued by Giscard d'Estaing and the majority parties, including Rally for the Republic, which has jettisoned the Gaullist legacy.

In view of the combativeness shown by the workers, defeating attempts to achieve a social "consensus," in view of the persistent desire for change which is maintaining the balance of political force in France. And above all in view of the failure of the government and Socialist Party [PS] to weaken the PCF, which is faithful to its tradition, the French bourgeoisie is seeking the solution to this problem at European level.

At this level it hopes to achieve the consensus which it cannot obtain at national level and aims to drown the working class party and the revolutionary forces in this West European unit governed by the right and by Social Democracy. This is why Giscard d'Estaing and the PS seem so determined to go full steam ahead toward integration and supranationality.

After the Franco-German meeting in Paris, Giscard d'Estaing' trip is another step along this path.

This is a serious situation for our people, our country, national independence and French sovereignty. At the same time it stresses, in its way, the problems facing the big capital government in going as far as it would like in implementing its policy.

Everything confirms the assessment made by our last Central Committee meeting. On the basis of results already achieved and the areas in which the government has been forced to back down, we must rally all manual and intellectual workers, all democrats and patriots in the struggle in all spheres to take action against the policy of decline and to defend national potential and national independence. We must reject any submission and isolation since this is the precondition for a broad international cooperation and a great independent French policy in Europe and the world, striving for peace, disarmament, a new world economic system and friendship among peoples.

LIBYAN MIG CRASH RAISES SECURITY QUESTIONS

AU220845 Rome ANSA in English 0800 GMT 22 Jul 80

[Text] Rome, July 22 (ANSA)--The crash of a Soviet-built MiG 23 fighter plane with Libyan markings into a Calabrian mountain on Friday raises "disconcerting problems connected to the violation of Italian air space and lack of a quick alarm", according to Rome Senator Carlo Pastorino. The Christian Democrat senator, who is a member of the Senate Defense Commission and the interparliamentary commission for security services, also mentioned "serious political precedents" in his message on the mysterious crash sent over to Defense Minister Lelio Lagorio.

Pastorino asked the defense chief to provide, "within a very short time...highly reserved and precise information on the real assessment of the general situation and on the reasons why the craft was not picked up by radar and intercepted". The senator also sought clarification on any possible "political wrinkles" connected to the case.

After stating his awareness that the issues involved could come under the heading of secrets of state, the senator expressed hopes that, "also by activating the secret service", the minister might be in condition to supply the information requested. Otherwise, Pastorino added in his message, the workings of the interparliamentary commission for secret services will be viewed by him as "inadequate and without any capability of intervention".

After the crash, it was disclosed that two NATO radar stations failed to detect the MiG 23 as it flew low into Italian air space. The pilot of the fighter was killed in the impact and the plane disintegrated.

IRANIAN EMBASSY DENIES KHALKHALI-RED BRIGADES CONTACT

AU211628 Rome ANSA in English 1545 GMT 21 Jul 80

[Text] Rome, July 21 (ANSA)--The Iranian Embassy in Rome today issued a categorical denial of a report in the leading Milanese daily, CORRIERE DELLA SERA, that Ayatollah Sadeq Khalkhali had contacts with the Red Brigades during a visit here two months ago. Denying the report "most categorically as completely without foundation," the embassy stressed that, without entering into the merit of Italy's internal affairs, there is a "total difference of methods and objectives between Italian terrorism and Iran's Islamic popular revolution."

The CORRIERE reported quoted yesterday's edition of LE JOURNAL DU DIMANCHE as saying that "Iranians in Paris" had reported that the Ayatollah "opened up contacts and established ties" with the Red Brigades during his visit. The Red Brigades are Italy's most effective urban guerrilla group and became known worldwide when they kidnapped and killed Christian Democrat Chairman Aldo Moro two years ago.

'PEOPLE'S RALLY' SUPPORTS AID TO AFGHAN RESISTANCE

LD181049 Rome AVANTI in Italian 9 Jul 80 p 7

[Mirella Gallotti report: "Let Us Help the Afghan Resistance"]

[Text] The immediate withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan and the need for active and practical support for the Afghan resistance forces waging the armed struggle against the Soviet invasion troops were the demands put forward by a wide range of political and trade union forces which took part in a people's rally organized by the education and work movement.

The debate, which took place in Rome late on Monday afternoon [7 July], included speakers such as European Parliament Deputies Carlo Ripa Di Meana and Jiri Pelikan.

"The Soviet Union's intention to gradually withdraw the occupation forces from Afghanistan is inadequate." The Italian Socialist Party Foreign Section Chief [Ripa Di Meana] maintained. "The Western governments' efforts," he continued, are entirely concentrated on allowing the USSR to save face now that it has fallen into the Afghan trap."

The Socialist deputy to the European Parliament stressed the Soviet Union's strategy, which is aimed at obtaining military guarantees and at drawing on energy sources present in Afghanistan.

"There are 130,000 Soviet soldiers on Afghan territory and the recent withdrawal of Russian troops is merely troop rotation with fresh contingents trained in antiguerrilla warfare being sent in."

Ripa Di Meana pointed out that the Vietnam war did not upset the international detente process or prevent the signing of the Helsinki agreements while the invasion of Afghanistan has placed world peace in crisis and has highlighted the energy and food crisis affecting the USSR and the Eastern bloc countries.

The Afghan resistance is influencing the Soviet attitude and determining its diplomatic and political actions. In order not to damage the Soviet image wounded soldiers are treated in GDR hospitals.

Jiri Pelikan stated that "there is no possibility of a political solution because the Soviet invasion has caused hatred of the USSR." He said he is convinced that the Soviets will not withdraw from Afghanistan, which is now a base for military adventures against Iran and Pakistan and later in Europe against Yugoslavia. He criticized the PCI, which has merely expressed verbal criticism of the invasion of Afghanistan, as was formerly the case with the invasion of Czechoslovakia. "The USSR is preparing for a vast military offensive after the Olympics aimed at stopping the supply of food from the borders," he concluded. Sorricciolo, from the international section of the Italian Union of Labor, stressed that the Afghan resistance is being waged not only by peasants but also by students, storekeepers, artisans and workers. The strikes and demonstrations staged in Kabul and other Afghan cities show that the revolt involves all classes.

The socialist representatives came out in favor of sending humanitarian aid and arms to the Afghan resistance, stressing the need to strengthen and broaden a movement of democratic public opinion similar to the movement sparked off by the people's struggles in Vietnam and Algeria.

Ripa Di Meana and Christian Democratic Senator Orlando stressed, in conclusion, the need for an alliance between Europe and the Islamic countries--an alliance which would be capable of forcing the USSR to see reason.

MINISTER BLAMES BERLINGUER FOR INCREASING 'SPLIT' IN PCI

LD211325 [Editorial Report] Rome L'ESPRESSO in Italian 13 July 1980 carries on pages 7-9 a 1,500-word Alberto Statera undated interview in Rome with state Holdings Minister Gianni De Michelis. De Michelis claims, among other things, that despite the Communists' harsh opposition to the present government "they are very well aware that it has prompted and still prompts more consensus than any other government in the past 10 years." He asserts that though the PCI "wants a dialogue with a different kind of Socialist Party," "Craxi is strong and will last several years," whereas Berlinguer, by clinging to the "historical compromise" policy, is "aggravating contradictions that threaten to increase the schizophrenic split between the PCI's leadership and grass roots."

SPOKESMAN NOTES NO REPLY FROM WALDHEIM ON LIBYAN TALKS

NC220702 Nicosia ELEVTHERI KIPROS in Greek 22 Jul 80 p 8

[Text] "There is no change in President Kiprianou's line regarding the question of Libya's mediation in the Cyprus issue." This was declared yesterday by the government spokesman who was denying Sunday's report in the newspaper I SIMERINI which, attributing its information to an allegedly authoritative source, had claimed that "President Kiprianou has now decided that he will not go to Tripoli to meet with the Turkish Cypriot leader, Mr Denktas, under the auspices," as the paper wrote, "of Colonel al-Qadhdhafi."

After referring to the president's statement that was made after his second meeting with Libyan Foreign Secretary At-Turayki at the presidential palace, the spokesman added that no reply from the UN Secretary General has so far been conveyed to the government on the question of a Kiprianou-Denktas meeting in Tripoli.

The above also served as a reply to a report in a weekly newspaper that had maintained that Dr Waldheim is "opposed" to Libyan leader Colonel Al-Qadhdhafi's mediation for finding a solution to the Cyprus question.

NICOSIA RALLIES MARK 1974 COUP, INVASION ANNIVERSARIES

Kiprianou Address

NC212203 [Editorial report] Nicosia Domestic Service and Domestic Television Service in Greek at 1733 GMT on 21 July 1980 carry a 95-minute live relay of the pan-Cypriot mass rally held at Elevtheria Square in Nicosia to mark the 6th anniversary of the 1974 coup and Turkish invasion of Cyprus. Cyprus President Kiprianou is the last and main speaker at the rally. Kiprianou opens his speech by outlining the importance and purpose of holding such a rally for once again demonstrating the Cypriot people's condemnation of the abhorent double crime committed by dark forces. President Kiprianou then goes on to welcome the Greek officials attending the rally and to reiterate the Cypriot people's gratitude and appreciation for the unreserved support and solidarity of both the Greek Government and the Greek political circles.

Referring to the continuing tribulations of the Greek Cypriots, Kiprianou denounces the Turkish attitude toward the humanitarian issue of missing persons, stressing that "it is inconceivable that, in the face of this drama, mankind and the mighty on earth have not been moved at least to the extent they should so as to demand that Turkey solve the tragic problem. They move heaven and earth when human rights are violated or hostages are taken in other cases, but in this case they have not shown the least interest they should have shown." President Kiprianou goes on to review the various phases of the political aspect of the Cyprus issue, throwing full blame on Turkey's arrogance and defiance of UN resolutions for the lack of any progress toward a solution. He says: "They want us to accept the principle of partition or of two states, as they themselves have disclosed by their interpretation of the term bizonal, and then to discuss the details of partition. I wish to stress categorically that we shall never accept faits accomplis nor shall we directly or indirectly legalize them. We shall not accept partitionist solutions of any kind, whatever they may be called. As long as the Turkish side does not abandon its expansionist and partitionist plans, there can be no hope for progress toward a Cyprus solution.

"On our part, we are always ready for an honorable dialogue without unacceptable advance commitments. At the same time, however, we are determined not to fall into traps or accept anything that would result in the final destruction of Cyprus with mathematical precision. We shall not bless the crime.

"We shall continue the struggle, no matter how hard it may be, until the world community fully realizes the need to exert pressure on Turkey to abandon its expansionist policy and until those who are in a position to pressure Turkey do so--those who recommend mutual concessions but gave arms to Turkey to invade Cyprus." President Kiprianou declares that if no progress is made in resuming the intercommunal talks we shall appeal again to the forthcoming UN General Assembly. He stresses that "within the framework of internationalization and the United Nations, we support the convention of an international conference on the Cyprus problem even if this clashes with the negative stand of Turkey and some others."

President Kiprianou then stresses the significance of unity and notes that "it is with deep sorrow that I say today that the necessary unity doesnot exist. Our people's faith in the struggle has been shaken by party disputes and there is no unity among the masses of our people. However, an end must be put to party squabbling as well as to the undermining of Cyprus' entity as a state and its leadership, which constitute assets recognized internationally and which should be continuously strengthened rather than undermined. In the name of the thousands of our dead, in the name of our historic responsibility and in the name of the Cypriot people struggling for freedom, I invite all the parties to a patriotic dialogue for the full restoration of unity in our domestic front." He continues: "We have unshakable evidence that the Turkish side is hoping for new disturbances and discord among the Greeks in order to deal the final blow of destruction to the whole of Cyprus." He concludes by saying: "Indomitable Cypriot people: I personally give you once again my irrevocable promise that I will never abandon the bastions. I shall continue the struggle for the office you have entrusted to me and for as long as you want me to, until this country rids itself of the invasion and your inalienable rights are restored."

KHARAVYI Criticism

NC220935 Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 22 Jul 80 pp 1, 7

[Excerpt] Despite all his ambitious attempts to appear "above parties" at last night's rally in Elevtheria Square, President of the Republic Kiprianou repeated his personal views on the Cyprus question, avoiding even a mere reference to the line and tactics charted by Archbishop Makarios and adopted by the National and Ministerial Councils during March 1977.

Mr Kiprianou moreover tried to tamper with the Makarios line, mobilizing isolated excerpts from the late president's [1977] anniversary speech while totally ignoring the positions Makarios had repeatedly supported in the higher state and other official bodies and which he institutionalized with his 1977 proposals. It should be noted that EDEK also frequently invokes the same excerpts from Makarios' anniversary speech in order to justify, insofar as this is possible, its adventurist policy.

Mr Kiprianou described the past and the prospects of the intercommunal talks in the darkest terms, using the intransigence of the Turkish side as an excuse, to the point of nullifying the importance of the talks as the only correct way of settling the problem. Yet he said nothing about what initiatives his government is prepared to undertake or support for the production of the dialogue. He merely repeated the well-known "we are always ready for an honorable dialogue but we are, at the same time, determined not to fall into any traps."

To say the least Mr Kiprianou put forth a naive argument as an alternative to the inter-communal talks. "Turkey cannot indefinitely ignore, and scoff at, everything and everyone without unpleasant repercussions. Under pressure of international public opinion it will some day realize that keeping the Cyprus question pending does not serve Turkish interests either, simply because we shall never allow that plans to impose a partitionist solution materialize. And the sooner it abandons these plans, the better it will be for Turkey."

Developing this argument further and ignoring the explosive dangers inherent in a pending state and the deadlock for the perpetuation or even the worsening of the present situation in Cyprus, Mr Kiprianou put forward the long-term struggle that will be continued, as he put it ambiguously: "until a just and nationally acceptable solution to the Cyprus problem is secured."

DISI Statement

NC191125 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 19 Jul 80

[Text] In a statement on the anniversary of the Turkish invasion, the Democratic Rally [DISI] refers to the hardships that have been piled on Cyprus and to the deadly dangers that threaten its future. At the same time it points out that the deadlock in the inter-communal talks is due to the Turkish stand and intransigence and that bending this should have been, and must be, one of the government's basic concerns.

DISI reiterates its position for a strong government and stresses the need to abandon bigotry and to forge the general mental unity of the people so that better days may come.

Denktas Speech to Turkish Cypriots

TA201122 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 0630 GMT 20 Jul 80

[Speech by Rauf Denktas, president of the Turkish Federated State if Cyprus, during ceremony on the anniversary of the 20 July 1974 operation--live]

[Summary] We are celebrating a happy anniversary. However, we are saddened by the treacherous murder of former Turkish Prime Minister Nihat Erim in Istanbul yesterday.

External forces have, for years, attempted to create strife within the Turkish Cypriot community and annihilate us. The Turkish Cypriots constitute an indivisible part of the Turkish Nation and these attempts were thwarted through the peace operation launched on 20 July 1974.

Our main duties consist of acting with the knowledge of our cause, of serving the people by maintaining our democratic institutions and preserving our unity and solidarity, of knowing how to defend our soil, of expressing our gratitude to the defenders of our borders and of further developing our economy.

"As always, I would now like to call on the other side. When we say that we consent to a bizonal federal system and try to explain what we mean by bizonal, they [the Greek Cypriots] wage a worldwide slander campaign against us by claiming that we are setting preconditions for the talks. These (?usurpers) who seized through the use of arms our rights in the legitimate government are using this right, which they obtained by (?usurping), against us at international forums. We do not set any preconditions for the resumption of the talks. We are announcing that we are ready for talks in order to reach a result, on which the sides have agreed.

The result on which the two sides have agreed consists of a bizonal, bicommunal, federal independent and nonaligned republic and guarantees by Turkey and Greece are inevitable and necessary if this republic is to be a lasting one. We have agreed with them on these [principles]. However, they are continuing with their propaganda in a bid to deceive the world which is not aware of this fact. We see and realize, during our visits abroad, that this propaganda has become established and credible in certain places. The condition that we are really setting preconditions and demanding something that is not our right exists in certain countries. It is our duty to advise and enlighten these countries. The Turkish Cypriots have never demanded or taken something beyond their right. They will never make a concession on their rights and status, which were obtained at the cost of lives and on their equality of cofounder status and they will never renounce Turkey's guarantee. It is very beneficial that these facts be known from the viewpoint of shortening the duration of the talks and providing a shortcut to peace.

"Today, the missing persons issue was again discussed by the other side and there is an outcry about it. This is also part of the propaganda. If there is a side that should ask questions about missing persons it is the Turkish Cypriot side because our missing persons consist of Turkish Cypriots who have been taken away and eliminated by Greek Cypriot authorities, who pretended to be policemen or members of the security forces, from the streets and from their jobs and not during a battle. Holding us responsible for the thousands of Greek Cypriots who were killed by Samson during their internal coup and using as a reason a few hundred Greek Cypriots who died during battle might be considered Byzantine shrewdness, but it does not lead anywhere and it would not solve the missing persons issue."

My brothers, I call on you to protect your country, flag and land, remain loyal to the motherland and thus insure a bright future. The trend of history started on 20 July 1974 will not be reversed. I say this by relying on you and on the motherland.

I greet the Turkish officials who are present here with love and respect and ask them to convey the Turkish Cypriot community's feelings of gratitude and loyality to the motherland.

Denktas Messages to Turkish Leaders

TA191148 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 19 Jul 80

[Text] On the occasion of the 6th anniversary of the 20th of July Peace and Freedom Day, the president of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus, Mr Denktas, has sent messages of affection and loyalty to the acting Turkish president, Mr Caglayangil, the acting president of the Senate, Mr Unaldi, the president of the National Assembly, Mr Karakas, the prime minister, Mr Demirel, the leader of the main opposition party, Mr Ecevit and other political and military leaders expressing his gratitude to the motherland for the Turkish peace operation in Cyprus.

In his messages, Mr Denktas stated that the Turkish community, despite pressure and terror, attained the freedom it had longed for through the strength it derived from the motherland. He said that the Turkish community, with the consciousness of these great sacrifices, was doing its upmost in economic and other fields to preserve what has been won and was looking forward to its future with hope.

SPOKESMAN CLAIMS 'NO INFORMATION' ON U-2'S USE OF UK BASES

NC220600 Nicosia ELEVTHERI KIPROS in Greek 22 Jul 80 p 1

[Text] The government has no information whatsoever about the use of the British bases in Cyprus by American forces. This was repeated yesterday by the government spokesman with reference to allegations in a section of the press that American U-2 spy planes set off from Akrotiri daily towards the Soviet border.

An afternoon daily had even maintained that "the bases are being used by the United States with the government's tolerance."

TURKISH-TURKISH CYPRIOT COMMISSION SIGNS ECONOMIC PROTOCOL

Opening Comments

TA181708 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1630 GMT 18 Jul 80

[Text] The mixed economic commission of Turkey and the federated state began a meeting in Nicosia today. The delegation of the federated state is led by the minister of commerce and industry, Mr Atasayan, and the Turkish delegation by the minister of commerce, Mr Basol. Opening the meeting, Mr Atasayan said that although the Turkish Cypriot community was small its problems were big. He said the meeting, while discussing issues which will make a greater contribution to the development of the Turkish Cypriot economy, would take into account the interest of Turkey.

The Turkish minister of commerce, Mr Basol, told the meeting that he had observed progress in the federated state. He said that although progress in the agricultural field was almost complete, intensive efforts were still needed in the fields of tourism, transport and communications. He added that not only the federated state but many other countries were faced with economic difficulties.

Signing Ceremony

[Text] Turkey and the federated state today signed a new economic protocol at the end of talks held in Nicosia. The talks were held at a meeting of the mixed economic commission which began last Friday. Turkey's minister of commerce, Mr Basol, signed for his country and the minister of commerce and industry, Mr Atasayan, signed for the federated state.

Speaking at the signing ceremony, Mr Basol gave an explanation about the protocol and said it had been agreed that in the federated state exports and the transit trade should be encouraged further, the free port and trade area at Famagusta should be put into full service as soon as possible, efforts should be intensified for buying an aircraft for the Turkish Cypriot airlines and for the development of the cooperative movement. He added that the necessary measures should be taken for reexporting of Turkish industrial goods with a view to enabling the federated state to earn foreign exchange and for obtaining the highest price for the tobacco produced in the Karpas area.

Mr Atasayan, also speaking at the ceremony, said that protocols signed so far with Turkey had made an undeniable contribution to the economic development of the federated state as a result of the statistical data provided.

U.S. REPORTEDLY REDEFINING ROLE OF BASES IN GREECE

AT191348 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 19 Jul 80 p 1

[By correspondent St. Evstathiadhis]

[Text] New York, 18 July--The United States is interested in "expanding and reforming" the role and mission of its bases in Greece so that they can provide "maximum facilities" for U.S. Armed Forces and respond to the current duties that have been given to these armed forces within the framework of the new Pentagon plan and strategy for the Middle East.

Specifically, those responsible for the definition and "charting of the Pentagon's defense policy" seek to "reform and modernize" the role of at least two U.S. bases in Greece so that these can be used "under any (military) conditions" by the branches of the U.S. Armed Forces.

Naturally, the intentions and military specifications of U.S. military men are concerned here; TO VIMA does not know whether these have been finalized and formalized by the U.S. Government to serve as a draft plan of articles and conditions contained within a new Greek-U.S. bases agreement, the signing of which the U.S. government has shown special interest in, at least since last May.

In any case, facts known to TO VIMA, including a "May 1980" report by a high U.S. military organ to Congress and "briefings" by officials of the Carter Administration with members of the relevant Senate Committee last February and April, lead to the following conclusions regarding the Pentagon's "interests and intentions" on the bases in Greece:

First, the geographical position of the U.S. bases in "Crete and Greece" is deemed to be especially significant for U.S. plans in the broader area of the eastern Mediterranean.

Second, the U.S. bases in Greece must be technologically modernized in order to respond to the "new duties" the U.S. Navy and Air Force have undertaken in the Middle East within the more general "NATO guidelines."

Third, the bases in "Crete and Greece" must become independent of similar U.S. bases in the area (that is, in Turkey and in the Middle East) with regard to their operation and role. (According to the opinion of one informed source in Washington, this means a deviation from an established Pentagon tactic: that the bases in Greece are a kind of supplement or extension of U.S. bases in Turkey and Italy.)

PAPANDREOU STATEMENT ON CYPRUS COUP, TURKISH INVASION

AT191237 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 19 Jul 80 p 12

[Text] PASOK Chairman Andreas Papandreou has made the following statement:

"While 6 years have passed since the coup and the invasion, the suffering people of Cyprus continue to be under the threat of Attila and the increasingly intensifying efforts of the United States and Nato for imposition of a solution outside the framework of the UN resolutions.

"On this black anniversary we address ourselves to the people of Cyprus and send a brotherly, militant message assuring them that PASOK and all Greeks actively support their struggles so that the road which leads to having Cyprus belong to its own people can be opened."

POLL CONCLUDES PUBLIC WANTS ELECTIONS IN 1980

AT171258 Athens TAKIDHROMOS in Greek 17 Jul 80 p 15

[Text] The people want parliamentary elections to be held this year, that is, in line with what the parties of the opposition are asking and not next year as the government wishes.

This is the conclusion of an opinion poll made for our account by ICAP Company Hellas Ltd which asked 1700 men and women, aged 15 and over, in Greece's 10 largest cities (Athens, Thessaloniki, Patrai, Volos, Larisa, Iraklion, Kavala, Ioannina, Lamia and Tripolis).

Almost half (47 percent) the country's residents live in these cities. The choice of the people polled was made so that they constituted a representative sample of those cities' populations.

Specifically, on the question of when do they think that parliamentary elections should be held, 5 out of 10 (49 percent) answered this year, 1980. Four out of 10 (38 percent) answered when the current parliament's term expires in 1981. A little more than 1 out of 10 (10 percent) answered either that they do not know or do not care about the issue. Those who most want elections to be held this year are: Young people from ages 20-29--6 out of 10 or 58 percent; people from smaller cities (Kavala, Ioannina, Lamia, Tripolis)--55 percent; men--54 percent; and classes of people who are socially and economically richer--53 percent. Only two categories of people want elections to be held next year: Residents of cities with populations 70-120,000 (Patrai, Volos, Larisa, Iraklion)--54 percent of whom want elections next year, with only 36 percent who want elections this year; and people aged 50 and over--44 percent of whom want elections next year and 40 percent this year.

The percentage of people who did not reply to our questions fluctuates within normal limits except for the 29 percent recorded in the area of Thessaloniki. This public opinion poll was conducted between 23 May and 20 June. The interviews were taken by 25 researchers and their work was checked by 3 inspectors.

EXPORTS OF PHOSPHATE FERTILIZERS TO PRC BEGINS

AT141855 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1830 GMT 14 Jul 80

[Text] More than 300,000 tons of phosphate fertilizers will be exported to the People's Republic of China by the phosphate fertilizer plant of Nea Karvali, near Kavalla. Loading of the first consignment of 11,000 tons is due to start in a few days. Agreements were concluded between the Greek Ministry of Trade and senior officials of the Government of the People's Republic of China who visited the plant.

INTERIOR MINISTER RESIGNS AFTER RPP SUBMITS INTERPELLATION

Interpellation Announcement

TA181831 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 18 Jul 80

[Text] An interpellation has been submitted about Interior Minister Mustafa Gulcugil. The interpellation, submitted today to the National Assembly chairmanship by RPP Izmir Deputy Coskun Karagozoglu and his colleagues, says that terror in Turkey is gradually gaining the dimensions of a civil war and that the officials are remaining spectators to the situation.

The interpellation, which was announced to the press, says that the Corum incidents turned into a mass massacre because the necessary measures had not been taken and because the officials were not impartial. The motion states that the interior minister had admitted his guilt by saying: A mistake was made in Corum. The incidents could have been prevented before having reached such dimensions.

Noting that Prime Minister Demirel was making the RPP his target by accusing it of secessionism and of being involved in all the incidents, the interpellation adds: As a matter of fact, many party members, the RPP district and provincial leaders, the RPP mayors and RPP Deputy from Istanbul Koksaloglu, become the targets and victims of terror. The interpellation further states: The interior minister, following in the footsteps of the prime minister, has said: The Corum incidents are a plot designed by the left. It is one of the actions undertaken by the left aimed at destroying the state. A rightist group supporting the state has confronted them.

With this statement the interior minister was caught red-handed. In this way the interior minister has admitted that he considers various rightist terrorists, whose offenses have been confirmed in court, and criminals and bandits as the supporters of the state. He has admitted that he depends on them. The interpellation also expresses the view that the prime minister wishes to govern with the support of a section of terrorists and anarchists and that he is trying to pursue this policy through the interior minister.

Gulcugil Resignation

TA211506 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 21 Jul 80

[Text] Interior Minister Mustafa Gulcugil has resigned. According to a statement issued by the Prime Ministry Press Secretariat, Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel has accepted Gulcugil's resignation and thanked him for his services. Minister of State Orhan Eren will be acting interior minister until a new interior minister is appointed. The presidency has been informed that the interior minister has resigned and that Eren will be acting interior minister.

Demirel Statement

TA212030 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 21 Jul 80

[Excerpts] With his resignation, the interpellation against Interior Minister Gulcugil has been dropped. On leaving his office this evening, Prime Minister Demirel replied to questions about Gulcugil's resignation. Demirel said that his government was the government of a party. He added: A resignation is a resignation. Do you need a reason for every resignation? Our colleagues may resign or they may assume duties. There is no difference between taking an office or leaving it. Our colleagues work hard. We are struggling for our cause. We are waging a struggle; serving the country is our motto. Being a minister is not a very important thing from the viewpoint of our party mentality. Deputies become ministers, ministers become deputies. This has happened in the past.

GENERAL EVREN PROMISES 'STRUGGLE' AGAINST INTERNAL CONSPIRATORS

TA201851 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1800 GMT 20 Jul 80

[Text] Chief of Staff Gen Kenan Evren today unveiled a monument erected in Kayseri to the memory of 76 paratroopers from the Turkish paratroop brigade who were martyred during the Cypriot peace operation. In a statement during a ceremony held on this occasion at the paratroop brigade, General Evren said: It is with regret that I must declare that we are now struggling against conspirators within the country. However, as in the past, our armed forces will emerge victorious from this struggle. Let no one doubt this.

Recalling that the success of the paratroop brigade in the Cyprus peace operation would be engraved in the history of the brigade with golden letters, General Evren added that the bust of Ataturk erected to commemorate this success carried great significance. General Evren continued: Unfortunately, today, there are those who are reluctant to speak about Ataturk. There are others who are deviating from Ataturk's path, deceiving others by proclaiming that they are the real followers of Ataturk. Let me point out before this gathering as the chief of the armed forces that we shall not permit anyone to trample upon this country and these achievements entrusted to us by Ataturk. We shall not quit our task until we can cleanly and neatly deliver all these achievements to those that will replace us. These conspirators will soon be punished.

DEMIREL URGES PARTY LEADERS TO HELP RATIFY ANTIANARCHY BILLS

The murderers escaped after the incident. NAP leader Alpaslan Turkes sent a message of condolences to Kaya's family.

LEADERS SEND MESSAGES TO TURKISH CYPRIOTS ON 6th ANNIVERSARY

Demirel's Congratulations

TA201231 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 20 Jul 80

[Text] Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel sent a congratulatory message to Turkish Federated State of Cyprus President Rauf Denktas on the occasion of the 6th anniversary of the Cyprus peace operation. In his message, Demirel said that the peace operation launched by the Turkish Armed Forces brought freedom, peace and tranquillity to the Turkish Cypriots and made it possible for them to live together. Demirel noted that the Turkish Cypriots are in favor of the establishment of a bizonal, bicommunal, independent and nonaligned federal state based on the principle of equality of the two national communities.

He said: We believe that the establishment of this new state can be realized through a realistic approach and talks to be conducted between the two communities and, as always, we support the Turkish Cypriot community in its peaceful efforts.

Expressing the belief that the Turkish Cypriot community will, in a short time, reach successful results in its economic development struggle, Demirel said that the economic aid and support extended to the federated state by Turkish governments will be continued.

Acting President's Message

TA201152 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 0900 GMT 20 Jul 80

[Text] Turkish Acting President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil has said that he is pleased to say that the Turkish nation is at the side of the Turkish Cypriot community, which has waged an exemplary struggle to attain its freedom, and that Turkey will always support the Turkish Cypriots by sharing their difficulties and happiness.

Caglayangil sent a message to President Rauf Denktas on the 6th anniversary of the 20 July peace operation. In his message, Caglayangil noted that the Turkish Cypriot community arrived at its present condition through brave resistance against atrocities which lasted for years and finally attained the peace and freedom it deserved and longed for through the peace operation launched by the courageous Turkish Armed Forces.

VISITING TURKISH CYPRIOT DELEGATION CONFERS WITH LEADERS

TA171730 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 17 Jul 80

[Text] The Turkish Cypriot Legislative Assembly, which is currently visiting Turkey at the invitation of National Assembly President Cahit Karakas, is continuing its contacts in Ankara.

The delegation headed by Turkish Cypriot Legislative Assembly Deputy President Semsi Kazim was received by Acting President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil at 1600 today. Earlier at 1500 the delegation met with RPP leader Bulent Ecevit. In an address to the meeting, Ecevit expressed the hope that the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus would overcome its difficulties and problems within the framework of a free democracy. In his reply, Kazim said that the Turkish Cypriot community has had to experience enormous difficulties before arriving at its present condition.

The parliamentary delegation was also received by Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel at 1630. In a speech during the meeting, Demirel said that the Turkish Cypriots are governing themselves even though a final solution has not been reached in Cyprus. Stating that it is not possible to return to pre-1974 conditions, Demirel said that a bizonal federal system constitutes the most appropriate solution. In his reply, Kazim noted that the federated state is ready to hold talks without any preconditions in order to solve the Cyprus problem. Kazim added that the federated state has been receiving great support and assistance in dealing with the problems facing it.

The Turkish Cypriot parliamentary delegation also visited the deputy chief of staff, Gen Haydar Saltik, State and Acting Foreign Minister Orhan Eren, the NAP Assembly Group, and Republican Reliance Party leader Turhan Feyzioglu.

MILLIYET PRAISES LIBYAN EFFORTS AT CYPRUS TALKS

NC180715 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 17 Jul 80 p 2

[Excerpts] Following the efforts of Libyan Foreign Affairs Secretary At-Turayki, a statement has been issued that TFSC President Rauf Denktas and President of the Greek Cypriot Administration Spiros Kiprianou have agreed to meet in Tripoli. This is the most hopeful piece of news received from Cyprus for months.

The efforts of the Libyan government to bring the two leaders together at a "Tripoli summit" is a significant development. An early meeting between Denktas and Kiprianou, who have accepted an invitation from At-Turayki, will help to relaunch the dialogue which has been so difficult to revive so far. This summit meeting may also enable the intercommunal talks to take a new direction and a new method.

It is known that the desire for such a meeting was first expressed by Denktas.

Now there are two points which disturb the Greek Cypriot side. The first is that the "summit" to be held in Libya may end in a fiasco, since no preparations have been made. The second point that worries the Greek Cypriot side is the fear that the "Libya summit" may push aside the UN "umbrella" and resolutions. Experience in recent months has shown that contacts at a technical level and the discussions over procedure have proved to be of no avail. Consequently, trying a quiet "summit" outside the island may prove very useful.

Such an initiative should not be taken to mean that the United Nations is being bypassed or ignored.

So far Kiprianou has exerted very possible effort to have last year's unacceptable UN resolutions imposed on the Turkish Cypriots. The Greek Cypriot leader still insists on a settlement "within the framework of the UN resolutions." That is why some circles in the Greek Cypriot sector look worriedly upon the "Triplli summit" as a kind of Camp David conference. But Kiprianou must realize by now that his obstinacy has won nothing either for this cause or for his community. Nor does it hold out any hope for the future.

JOINT COMMUNIQUE ISSUED; ERKMEN RETURNS FROM ROMANIA

TA181152 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 18 Jul 80

[Text] Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen returned to Turkey today after concluding his official visit to Romania. The Turkish-Romanian joint communique has also been issued.

The joint communique noted that during the talks held in Romania the trade between the two countries was reviewed and the two sides submitted their requests on diversifying the goods to be traded and balancing the trade. According to the communique, the foreign ministers also decided to accelerate the implementation of the joint investments envisaged between Turkey and Romania. The two ministers discussed the possibilities of developing the cooperation between the two countries in the fields of education, science, culture and particularly maritime transportation.

The joint communique stated that the two foreign ministers stressed that detente is an indivisible concept and that it cannot be monopolized in certain countries or regions. The communique added: Strongly emphasizing that, especially these days, the principles of full equality of rights, respect for independence and sovereignty, noninterference in each other's internal affairs and not resorting to use of force should constitute the basis for the relations among all countries. The two ministers noted the importance they attach to the maintenance of peace and stability in southwest Asia due to the recent incidents in this region and expressed the necessity of exerting every effort in a bid to reach a just and lasting political solution for the Afghan problem without any delay.

The two sides also announced that they are in favor of a just and lasting solution to the Cyprus problem based on the principle of respect for independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity and in accordance with the legal rights and interests of the two communities on the island. They also noted that they will continue to support the efforts of the UN secretary general to insure the resumption of the intercommunal talks in Cyprus.

CULTURE MINISTER KORALTAN RETURNS FROM VISIT TO GREECE

[Text] Culture Minister Tevfik Koraltan, who went to Greece as the guest of Greek Culture and Science Minister Andreas Andrianopoulos, has returned to Turkey. Koraltan attended the opening ceremoney of the Alexander the Great exhibition in Thessalonica. An announcement by the Culture Ministry Press Bureau reported that Koraltan held talks with the Greek officials on the cultural relations between the two countries. He also visited the house in which Ataturk was born in Thessalonica.

TOURISM MINISTER, NEWSPAPER COMMENTS ON RHODES INCIDENTS

Minister Kuntay's Statements

TA191625 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 19 Jul 80

[Text] Tourism and Information Minister Barlas Kuntay has said that the Greek people could not be blamed for the attacks against the Gemlik on Rhodes. In a news conference in Mersin, Kuntay recalled that good relations between Turkey and Greece--two neighboring tourism countries in the Balkans and the Mediterranean, which are members of NATO--were to the benefit of both countries. Kuntay said that it was only those who were concerned with the promotion of good relations between Turkey and Greece who had caused the incidents on the arrival of the Turkish ship in Rhodes.

HURRIYET Editorial

NC210943 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 19 Jul 80 p 3

[Editorial by Oktay Eksi: "Peace Disturbers Are the Same Everywhere"]

[Excerpts] In the desire to improve their relations the Turkish and Greek Governments have, as is known, abandoned their stubbornness which impeded the resumption of direct flights between the two countries. Then the Turkish and Greek Foreign ministers met in Ankara and made speeches which gave us the impression that they were determined to sincerely try to improve relations between the two countries and to resolve the outstanding issues between them. This followed the resumption of direct flights, and ships began to ply the route between Marmaris and Rhodes.

But, unfortunately those circles whose interests are better served when there is enmity between Turkey and Greece lost no time in exploiting the arrival of a Turkish ship at Rhodes. They resorted to every possible ploy in order to prevent the ship Gemlik from entering the harbor with its passengers from Marmaris. The reason given is that "the arrival of the ship Gemlik in Rhodes is proof of Turkey's expansionist aspirations." The presence of a Turkish ship in Rhodes on 15 July is said to have injured the national pride of the Greeks in Rhodes.

But the most important thing is to know who are so unhappy about the improvement of relations between Turkey and Greece and who are using the people of Rhodes as instruments.

We believe that the improvement of relations between Turkey and Greece harms the interests of some Greek politicians and of some separatist elements who are based in Athens with plans to cause unrest in Turkey. What we mean by the words "separatist elements" is quite clear. Taking advantage of the Greek Government's connivance, certain Armenian and Kurdish underground organizations in Athens are engaged in intensive "anti-Turkey" activities. They fear that as a result of Turkey's pressure, the Greek Government may molest them.

On the other hand some elements in Greek domestic politics such as the rightist EDIK party and PASOK leader Andreas Papandreou, who thrives on Turkish animosity, seem to be very worried. For if Greece and Turkey get along well, there will be nothing left to exploit. To put it briefly, a peace disturber is a peace disturber everywhere. What is important is to render them ineffective and to reach the goal.

ECEVIT CITES RELATIONS WITH GREECE IN INTERVIEW

AT191501 Athens MESIMVRINI in Greek 19 Jul 80 p 5

["Exclusive interview" by MESIMVRINI correspondent in Ankara, G. Leonardhos, with Republican People's Party Chairman Bulent Ecevit in the party's offices in Ankara sometime in July]

[Excerpt] MESIMVRINI: How do you assess the current level of Greek-Turkish relations? Do you believe that military, naval and air exercises influence these relations and, if so, why aren't the necessary preventive measures being taken so that tension can be avoided every time exercises are held?

Ecevit: Relations between Greece and Turkey are passing through a phase of stagnation. Negotiations and talks between the two countries on important issues have basically been suspended although, during my government and specifically during my meeting with Karamanlis, a lot of basic work was implemented at the level of Directors General of the ministries. When I refer to the term "basic work" I mean that issues between the two countries were very clearly defined and that even alternative solutions were found in such a way that the governments of the two countries could choose solutions or find ways to compromise. Unfortunately this "basic work" has been neglected and a quick rapprochement between Greece and Turkey has not become possible. Regarding the military exercises, we consider the Greek reaction to this normal event to be very annoying. Turkey holds these exercises not only for its own security but within the framework of its contribution to the alliance. Thus we think it's unfortunate that Greece is trying to obstruct them.

Unification of the Two Communities

MESIMVRINI: It is a fact that the Cyprus issue influences relations between Greece and Turkey. To what extent can the Turkish side influence the Turkish Cypriot side so that a peaceful solution can be found through dialogue?

Ecevit: Although Turkey is constantly being called to intervene toward the Turkish Cypriot side, something it does in order to find a solution, Greece seems to avoid official involvement in the problem. As you mentioned in your question, the Cyprus problem influences relations between the two countries. Therefore, without the simultaneous and harmonious encouragement of both Turkey and Greece it will not be easy for the two communities to reach a final solution. In the proposals Denktas made early in 1978 a gradual procedure was envisaged for the unification of the two communities. If we force them to do this immediately the consequences will be tragic. Makarios' rapprochement shortly before his death was very realistic--I mean the four-point agreement with Denktas which is based on existing reality. I think Dentas is trying to create conditions so that this agreement can be reviewed but the current leadership of the Greek Cypriots does not seem to have the same self-confidence as Makarios, and this is understandable. Thus the Greek Cypriot leadership seems to be trying to avoid the basis of that agreement.

Return to NATO

MESIMVRINI: The international press has repeatedly reported that Turkey opposes Greece's return to the NATO military wing. Is this true and to what extent, since as a member of the alliance your country should be more interested in Greece's participation in it?

Ecevit: We do not oppose Greece's return to NATO. On the contrary, we believe that the NATO southeastern flank cannot exist without the participation of both countries in the alliance's military wing. The problem and difficulties are caused by Greece's insistence on reviving conditions which existed before its withdrawal from the NATO military wing in 1974. Those conditions were contrary to NATO provisions. They were in a way "de facto" conditions and this was recognized by the alliance's responsible committees. A movement for the revision of these conditions already existed before the Cyprus "affair" in 1974. Currently Greece insists on the reinstatement of the "status quo" in the Aegean. Certain circles tell us that we must accept this and, as soon as Greece returns, discuss the situation. Nevertheless we know that as soon as Greece returns to NATO it will be impossible to revise these conditions. Turkey responded to General Haig's proposals when he was the supreme military commander in Europe. Greece did not respond....

MESIMVRINI: I think that the exact opposite of what you are saying happened.

Ecevit: I do not remember well.... I do not know what happened after we lost power.

The Rekindling of Relations

MESIMVRINI: Do you believe that a general smoothing out of Turkey's relations with Greece and broader cooperation would help to rekindle Turkey's economy, especially after Greece's accession to the EEC?

Ecevit: When we were in power we repeatedly declared that we did not oppose Greece's efforts to become an equal member of the EEC because we considered the issue of Greece's accession to the EEC to be solely a Greek issue. However, we hope that Greece's complete equality with the other EEC member states will not become an object for exploitation. That is, that our Western allies will not be misguided so that our bilateral relations will be influenced, something that would ultimately make Greek-Turkish problems literally insoluble.

MESIMVRINI: Do you believe that there can be cooperation on the issue of fishing between the Greek islands and the Turkish coast so that the requent incidents which disturb relations between the two countries can be eliminated?

Ecevit: I believe that we must cooperate in the direction of total cooperation in the Aegean. "Partial" cooperation is not possible. I mean that it is not possible to cooperate in certain fields and, on the other hand, not to specify the limits of cooperation by each of our countries in the Aegean. We clearly support complete cooperation in this area.

OFFICIAL SAYS OECD MAY DEFER DEBT REPAYMENT AT PARIS MEETING

TA201237 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 20 Jul 80

[Text] Turgut Ozal, prime ministry under secretary and state planning organization deputy under secretary, has said that the repayment of Turkey's debts to OECD countries, which amount to about $3 billion, may be deferred. The issue will be discussed during a meeting in Paris on 22 July with OECD member countries. In a statement to a TRT correspondent at Istanbul's Yesilkoy Airport today before his departure for Paris, Ozal said the final stage of the talks on the deferral of Turkey's debts will be completed during the meeting and that it is possible that Turkey's debts of about $3 billion will be rescheduled. Pointing out that Turkey's relations with commercial banks will be dealt with at the end of the debt deferral talks in Paris, Ozal noted that the implementing of the last portion of the 1980 credit will also be determined. He stated that the rescheduling of the debts will eliminate Turkey's foreign currency problem for 1980 and that there will not be any fuel shortages.

BELGIUM SIGNS LOAN AGREEMENT FOR $10 MILLION

TA191151 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 19 Jul 80

[Text] A loan agreement for about $10 million to be extended to Turkey by Belgium within the framework of the OECD 1980 special aid program was signed in Ankara today. The secretary general of the Finance Ministry Treasury Directorate General and of the International Commercial Cooperation Organization, Nazif Kocayusufpasaoglu, and Belgium Ambassador to Ankara Pierre Marchal signed the agreement. According to the agreement, the loan will be extended for a period of 30 years with a 10-year period of grace and at a 2 percent rate of interest.

COMMON MARKET TO SEND PEACE MISSION TO MIDDLE EAST

[Alan Osborn dispatch: "EEC Launch Peace Mission To Help Middle East"]

[Text] Brussels--The Common Market yesterday formally launched a peace mission to Israel and seven Arab countries and could pave the way for a major Middle East political initiative by the Nine later this year.

The first step will be a Middle East tour by Mr Gaston Thorn, Luxembourg prime minister and EEC Council president.

He will start in Israel and go on to Jordan, Syria, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Egypt and Iraq. He will also meet Palestinian representatives, probably in Tunis.

The Thorn tour, which is likely to begin in about three weeks, follows the decision by EEC leaders in Venice last month to involve the Common Market in the search for Middle East peace.

Although Lord Carrington, foreign secretary, stressed yesterday that the move was intended to be complementary to American peace efforts, the early impression in Brussels is that, in fact, it could take a sharply different form.

The most provocative element taken by the Nine in Venice was their recognition of the PLO as a negotiation. [as published] This runs counter to the U.S.-Israel position and there is no guarantee that Mr Thorn will even be received by the Israeli Government.

But at the same time the EEC's "even-handed approach," to quote Lord Carrington, does suggest that its mission could find some favor in Arab capitals. Jordan has already publicly welcomed the idea of a European peace initiative.

Before beginning his tour Mr Thorn will fly to New York to address a special General Assembly session on the Middle East. But he is expected to say little more than repeat the Venice statement.

In short a German proposal that the Nine should put up a new resolution specifically embodying the de facto recognition of the PLO agreed at Venice was turned down by other countries.

The majority view was that such a resolution would do little good at best and at worst could seriously compromise the Thorn mission before it even began.

The Thorn tour itself is seen as an opportunity for the Nine to probe the genuine attitudes of the Middle East principals to the extent that these differ from positions they have taken in public.

There is no specific mandate and Mr Thorn will be allowed a wide range of manoeuvre though he is expected to observe the twin themes of the Venice declaration--Israeli security and Palestinian homeland rights.

DEMONSTRATORS OCCUPY BOLIVIAN EMBASSY IN BONN

LD230914 Hamburg DPA in German 0852 GMT 23 Jul 80

[Text] Bonn--In protest against the military putsch in Bolivia, about 50 demonstrators occupied the Bolivian Embassy in Bonn today. According to the police, the demonstrators behaved peacefully. No intervention by the police had been demanded by the embassy.

The demonstrators, members of a "Bolivian Solidarity Committee" based in Berlin, are calling for the release of all political prisoners in Bolivia and demanding that the Federal Government break off diplomatic relations with the military junta and stop all financial support.

TALKS WITH SOVIETS ON SIBERIAN GAS OPEN IN ESSEN

LD221117 Hamburg DPA in German 1030 GMT 22 Jul 80

[Excerpt] Essen--First negotiations on a new natural gas deal with the Soviet Union began this morning between the Ruhrgas Company in Essen and a Soviet delegation. According to the Ruhrgas Company, a delegation from Moscow, led by Soviet Deputy Foreign Trade Minister Nikolay Osipov, will join the first round this week.

The preliminary negotiations, for which Chancellor Schmidt's visit to Moscow brought the green light, concern the supply of 40 billion cubic meters of Siberian natural gas a year to West Europe. The USSR will produce 50 billion cubic meters of gas a year from the field, of which 10 billion cubic meters will to the East bloc. Twelve billion cubic meters are under consideration for the Federal Republic, and Franch, Belgium, Austria and Italy are regarded as other possible customers.

ARAB LEAGUE SECRETARY KLIBI MEETS SCHMIDT

LD221537 Hamburg DPA in German 1445 GMT 22 Jul 80

[Excerpt] Bonn--Against the background of new intensive Middle East consultations, the secretary general of the Arab League, Chedli Klibi, met with Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Hamburg this afternoon for a detailed exchange of views.

Klibi also had a short meeting with Gaston Thorn, the president of the EC Commission and Luxembourg foreign minister, who is shortly to make a trip to the Middle East on behalf of the EC.

In his talk with Klibi today, Genscher also underlined the great interest of Bonn and the EC in the strengthening of Lebanon's independence. A further topic was the developments in Afghanistan, where Genscher and Klibi support a political solution. The chairman of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, Werner Nachmann, today criticized the fact that Klibi has not responded to the call by Bonn and the EC for a renunciation of violence and terror.

Schmidt Comments

LD221706 Hamburg DPA in German 1623 GMT 22 Jul 80

[Excerpts] Hamburg--The European states have a great interest in a comprehensive peace settlement in the Middle East based on the rejection of force.

This was stated by Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt today after a 2 and 1/2 hour meeting with Chedli Klibi, secretary general of the Arab League.

Federal Chancellor Schmidt stressed after the meeting with Klibi that in the broad and trustful exchange of views there had been agreement on many points. The chancellor underscored the good and friendly relations maintained by the Federal Republic with the Arab states, and emphasized the Europeans' interest in a large unity of the Arab states. He came out in favor of resuming the European-Arab dialogue, which, however, is a matter for the European Community.

Klibi Interview

DW231045 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 1500 GMT 22 Jul 80

[Excerpts from unidentified correspondent interview with Chedli Klibi, secretary general of the Arab League, in Bonn--recorded in French with German translation superimposed]

[Text] [Question] Do you see any chance of an expansion of economic relations, specifically with the European Community?

[Answer] The very purpose of the European-Arab dialogue is to define the objectives which are to be attained in the organization of cooperation between the two communities, the Arab and European, and simultaneously to delineate the ways and means for achieving these objectives. We must state that this dialogue was interrupted for over a year, but now it seems as though all conditions exist for a resumption under better conditions and soon.

[Question] The Arab League member countries demand time and again that oil be used as a weapon even more than heretofore. Isn't it possible that this could backfire some day?

[Answer] It is normal for Arab countries cooperating with other countries or states to try to make use of the wealth they own, just as it is natural for the Europeans to sell their commodities, their industrial products, at top prices. You will admit that oil was underrated for quite some time, and the development of the Arab world suffered as a result.

It is correct that the oil countries will try to put the right price on this very rare commodity. I do not believe that the oil price increase is really exaggerated if we take into consideration the continuous drop in the dollar's value. You are hinting at a problem which is on the borderline between economy and politics. It is normal for the producing countries--particularly the Arab countries--to try to use this wealth for their economic and political interests. I do not believe that one can really speak of exploitation. Oil is a commodity for trade and exchange, a means for negotiations, which should not be underrated in economic or political negotiations between states.

[Question] What political possibilities do you see at present for a European initiative in Middle East politics?

[Answer] The European Community communique contains some positive aspects. But one must also say that the communique has not really taken into consideration the Arab countries which expected a real initiative from their European friends on the international level or in the United Nations. This disappointment is natural, but it means that the Arab countries still hope that very soon the Europeans will have an opportunity to take the political initiative for establishing peace in the Middle East.

EC-Arab League Meeting

LD231046 Hamburg DPA in German 1025 GMT 23 Jul 80

[Text] Bonn--The member states of the Arab League and the European Community will probably hold a joint foreign ministers conference before the end of this year. This was announced to journalists today by Arab League Secretary General Chedli Klibi following 3 days of talks in Bonn. The details of the conference will be established during further contacts.

Klibi stated that the European-Arab dialogue will not be jeopardized by the suspension of Egypt's membership from the league but will have to be held in Cairo's absence. The resumption of the dialogue between Europeans and Arabs was one of the main topics of Klibi's talks with Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and Deputy SPD Chairman Hans-Juergen Wischnewski.

DER SPIEGEL INTERVIEWS CDU/CSU SHADOW FOREIGN MINISTER

DW220851 Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German 21 Jul 80 pp 24-28

[Undated interview in Hannover by editors Dirk Koch and Richard Kiessler with Walther Leisler Kiep, Lower Saxony finance minister and CDU/CSU shadow foreign minister]

[Text] SPIEGEL: Mr Kiep, the voters know that you would be foreign minister with Franz Josef Strauss as Chancellor. But the voters do not really know as yet what foreign policy a CDU/CSU government would pursue. Isn't it about time to provide more clarity in this respect, if that is possible at all?

Kiep: To begin with, I cannot remember individual cabinet members of a CDU/CSU government having been named with the certainty you expressed. But...

SPIEGEL: Right, not even that is clear.

Kiep: Well, incidentally, asked by journalists about my role in his government team, Franz Josef Strauss mentioned the fields of economics and foreign policy.

SPIEGEL: What would you prefer?

Kiep: My liking for foreign policy is generally known. By the way, I contest that the priorities of a CDU/CSU foreign policy are not clearly recognizable. Various spokesmen of the union, including myself, have stressed time and again that in the phase of world politics that lies ahead the security of Europe and the Federal Republic will continue to be guaranteed by the alliance and that therefore the strengthening of the alliance as well as the restoration of the balance within the alliance, which has been lost, will be given priority.

SPIEGEL: The union's chain of contradictory statements on foreign policy is long. It happens almost regularly that you have trouble with your own people whenever you state your position as union foreign minister-designate. The last time this happened it was because of your assessment of Schmidt's Moscow visit, which you seemed to view much more positively when you were in the United States than others in the union.

Kiep: I said in Washington and reiterated in Bonn that one of the results of Schmidt's Moscow visit is the fact that the Soviet Union has gotten out of the vicious circle of the consequences of its invasion of Afghanistan without having made any concessions in Afghanistan in the direction of a political solution of this conflict. This statement, meaning the statement on the vicious circle, was adopted verbatim by Mr Strauss as well as by Mr Kohl, if I am correctly informed...

SPIEGEL: ...after you corrected your statement.

Kiep: I had 1 minute of time for the ZDF [Second German Television] in Washington to summarize the impressions of my visit, and in Bonn I naturally had an opportunity to elaborate on it before the press.

SPIEGEL: Mr Kiep, what you are demostrating now also happens almost regularly. You make a daring statement, clash with our party and then, with a wink, draw in your horns, saying that you were misunderstood. The time for the interview had been too short. This does not serve clarity about the course of the union.

Kiep: I am moved by your sympathetic research. May I remind you that at no time, since I have been in the Federal Republic, have I been afraid to voice my opinion in Washington or the Federal Republic on situations as I see them and in a way that I consider responsible.

SPIEGEL: To the annoyance of many of your fellow party members. You were, for instance, against economic sanctions against the GDR, which have been demanded time and again by CDU Deputies Abelein and Von Wrangel. The CDU objected when you met Mr Haeber, SED Central Committee member, in the GDR. You were criticized for your modified approval of the CSCE. Unlike Strauss, you reject the Federal Republic being the only country where medium-range weapons are to be stationed. Contrary to the general line of the union you contributed decisevely to the conclusion of the agreements with Poland. You agreed to the basic treaty. You recognized the Oder-Neisse line.

Kiep: To begin with, I do not agree when you say that this chain of opinions and political acts by me mirrors contradictions within the union. I ask you to take notice of the fact that these were statements I made in past years on important points of German foreign policy and our Germany policy and that, being a member of the CDU, I have the absolute right not only to have such views but also to voice them.

I have done so in past years and I will also do so in the future. The only thing which guides me is what serves the foreign policy of our country, what is necessary.

SPIEGEL: Okay, but in election times such a diversity of views naturally irritates the voters.

Kiep: I don't think that it irritates the voters. I think the voters expect a people's party advocating pluralism to make statements on all sorts of current political problems which reflect the spectrum of this party. Rather, they would be much more bewildered if they were to see that a party with a spectrum ranging from Norbert Bluem to Franz Josef Strauss had a standard answer ready, by pressing a button as it were, for every extremely difficult problem of German domestic and foreign policy.

SPIEGEL: But the spectrum is overexpanded, isn't it, if you say yes and the rest of the union says no.

Kiep: But why? The way you assess foreign policy treaties is quite similar to the way you look at a glass, as Gerhard Schroeder once said: Is it half full or is it half empty? Do the positive aspects prevail and thus make me agree? Or do the negative aspects prevail and thus make me disagree?

SPIEGEL: What will be valid if and when the union takes over the government? Because of the Federal Republic's geographical location at the interface between East and West, Kiep advocates "as good a state as possible" with regard to German-Soviet relations. Strauss advocates a policy of strength toward the Kremlin which essentially pursues nothing less than the neutralization of the Federal Republic.

Kiep: The value of German-Soviet relations and their significance is undisputed in the CDU/CSU. It is just as undisputed that in the present phase of relations it is our task to organize future relations on the basis of a restored balance of forces. And this is something with which Helmut Schmidt also agrees in private. By necessity this includes the fact that our readiness to do something extra within the scope of the NATO decision on the closure of the arms gap is required.

SPIEGEL: You claim for yourself the right to state openly, and act accordingly, your judgment on foreign policy without regard for the party line. Suppose you are in foreign minister in a Strauss cabinet and Strauss determines the guidelines of policies. Do you seriously believe that you could go on doing this?

Kiep: It makes a great difference, of course, whether you are in a party or a member of a party faction, and one in the opposition to boot, and state your views about domestic and foreign policy topics or whether you are part of a cabinet. Cabinet discipline, the fact that it is within the chancellor's competence to determine policy guidelines naturally constitute a reality. Therefore, the foreign policy of a CDU/CSU government with Franz Josef Strauss as chancellor would naturally be pursued on the basis of a jointly agreed on foreign policy, a joint foreign policy line.

SPIEGEL: Have you discussed this with Strauss already?

Kiep: Many discussions have been held on this and there is far-reaching accord in this respect. I have personally talked with Franz Josef Strauss about foreign policy issues for several hours in private since January, since the CSU meeting in Kreuth. I did not find any significant divergent assessment on basic issues of foreign policy with regard to the present situation.

SPIEGEL: This is hard to believe when one recalls the views you have stated in the past and what Strauss is saying and what he has done.

Kiep: In our dialogue I have not even ventured the ghost of an attempt to withhold the fact that considerable differences of opinion prevailed in the past. My remark about accord on the basic questions relates to what is ahead of us. And this seems to be decisive as far as I am concerned. We will not gain anything by waging the battles of the past all over again.

SPIEGEL: We have the impression that many people in the union, above all Strauss, in dealing with foreign policy issues resort to the instruments of the fifties and then have a hard time seeking options for solutions to new problems which can no longer be tackled through East-West controversy.

Kiep: What I consider the difficulty for an opposition in assessing the foreign policy of a government is to avoid missing the proper time to switch from criticizing the content of this foreign policy, which takes place until a treaty is concluded and ratified, and go over to criticizing the implementation of a treaty that has been enacted and become valid under international law. Sometimes this may have been hard for some people in the union to do.

SPIEGEL: This is why the union missed the boat in connection with Ostpolitik and to this day does not seem to be abreast of developments.

Kiep: I share your view that we are facing a multitude of problems in foreign policy which cannot be attributed solely to the East-West confrontation, and this is what constitutes the special difficulty of the eighties. We must adapt to a phenomenon which I would like to call the phenomenon of autonomous revolution, autonomous changes not caused by the East-West controversy but caused by the developments taking place in these countries, developments which reach the point of explosion.

Herein lie new dangers to world peace. As an example, let me cite political Islam. This contains phenomena that are directed against both East and West, even though at times they appear to be pro-Western and anti-Eastern.

SPIEGEL: You are all alone with your findings about the importance of autonomous revolutions which are often supported in these countries by forces called mere "terrorists" and "murderers" in Strauss work. Strauss is the man who for years placed his bets on the White racists in Rhodesia and still does so in South Africa. Do you propose to convince your candidate for chancellor that he is pursuing an incorrect policy there?

Kiep: May I remind you of the CDU development policy congress which we held in Bonn? May I remind you of the resolution and the program adopted there. In my opinion this program is congruent with the considerations I have advanced here. But if we narrow our discussion of the policy of the next 20 years down to a discussion of past remarks by Franz Josef Strauss and their interpretation, and conclude from them that owing to these past remarks the policy of the future cannot be as I describe it here, then this decision naturally leads us around in a circle and does not get us anywhere.

SPIEGEL: Do you believe, as Strauss does, that Helmut Schmidt's policy is aimed at "psychologically, and in the near future also in practical terms, dismantling the great peace order of Konrad Adenauer, namely, the Federal Republic's link with the West?"

Kiep: There is definitely no planned dismantling, but important acts, which I would have desired for the sake of consolidating the FRG's Western ties, have been omitted, especially in the past several months since Afghanistan. Why Helmut Schmidt neglects to do so many things that might serve our ties with the West is an entirely different question. It is a different question whether he does so out of his own conviction or is yielding to forces in the SPD for which the leadership strength of the United States has lost all meaning because in the view of these quarters, the United States no longer seems to be capable of continuing the East-West dialogue in a manner that would promise success.

Despite all understanding for weaknesses in the Americans' consultation process with us, I would have wished that in this difficult phase, in this really difficult phase, the chancellor had been more aggressive in seeking consultations and had in good time declared to the United States what we can jointly do and what we cannot, where our special interests are and where our special interests make it hard for us to go along. I would have liked to have seen this done in January and not just in March.

SPIEGEL: So all you criticize is that he went to Washington 8 weeks too late?

Kiep: He didn't go until March. And in the interim sitting in Bonn with a sort of Weltschmerz following many consultations with Giscard d'Estaing, he actually viewed, assessed and rejected all U.S. proposals concerning the management of the crisis. It is a different question whether the FRG chancellor, with the special situation of a divided country at the interface between East and West, should assume a leading role or even a mediator role. I do not think this is good.

SPIEGEL: Still, Schmidt dissuaded the Americans from doing any mischief. After all, Carter in part had made nonsensical proposals, for example, concerning the Persian Gulf.

Kiep: It was the chancellor's duty to seek a dialogue with Washington immediately in order to both prevent and promote, especially since the U.S. Government was forced to do something owing to the pressure of the hostage affair, to the pressure to reply to the Afghanistan situation--they are having an election year over there, too. This would have given him an opportunity to work toward having the United States, for example in its relationship with China, refrain from doing anything that might trigger a panic action on the Soviet side, which in turn would have its effect on us and aggravate tensions in Europe.

SPIEGEL: There are other points where we doubt that agreement exists between you and Strauss. What do you think of the suggestions to redefine NATO's defense mission, as Strauss demands, and to extend the North Atlantic pact's field of responsibility to the South Atlantic and the Indian Ocean, as demanded by Strauss' man Alfred Dregger?

Kiep: I cannot recall Strauss urging that a process with the aim of extending the geographic area of the alliance's responsibility be initiated. I can only recall, and I agree, that Franz Josef Strauss said that the North Atlantic alliance must realize that events in past months have created a situation where interests of the alliance exist outside the geographic field of the alliance's responsibility, which would possibly necessitate action by the NATO alliance.

In this connection it has been said in detail that such action by the alliance outside the NATO sphere could be made possible by the FRG facilitating the action of such alliance partners as France, Great Britain and the United States outside the sphere of the alliance by taking over some of the commitments in these three partners in the alliance.

We discussed this issue at length in Washington in connection with setting up armed forces in the Persian Gulf. But I have not heard Franz Josef Strauss say at any time that, to put it plainly, German soldiers should be sent to the Persian Gulf.

SPIEGEL: Would you be against it?

Kiep: I do not consider it advisable in view of the general situation we are in.

SPIEGEL: And you do not think much of extending the North Atlantic pact's field of responsibility to the South Atlantic, as Dregger suggested?

Kiep: I think you must differentiate between field of responsibility and extension. Field of responsibility is basically another expression of the question: Are interests being threatened? When I think of the role played by the shipping route around the Cape of Good Hope in maintaining Europe's lifelines, as a European I cannot deny that we have interests there which under extreme circumstances ought to include the preparedness of the allies together with the FRG to maintain their interests accordingly.

SPIEGEL: How? Militarily?

Kiep: In an extreme case this can also mean that, together with our allies, we must become involved in safeguarding the security of naval routes for which we are responsible in the North Atlantic--our field of responsibility has recently been extended up to the northern Arctic Ocean--and that we will take over such responsibility within the framework of the alliance, particularly with regard to safeguarding supply lines. But the material prerequisites must be created which today probably do not exist at all.

SPIEGEL: That means no difference of opinion with Mr Dregger?

Kiep: If problems pertaining to European interests and interests of the FRG are involved which go beyond the geographic area of responsibility of the alliance, we have no difference of opinion whatsoever that, in an extreme case, these interests must contain the preparedness...

SPIEGEL: ...in other words: sending German soldiers to the Cape.

Kiep: It means German naval units in the North Atlantic. It can also mean German naval units in the Middle Atlantic, the South Atlantic or off the Cape, but only in extreme situations.

SPIEGEL: Would you like to see the Federal Navy cruise in the Gulf?

Kiep: I believe that the existing presence of the United States in the Gulf is so strong that an additional German presence there would not achieve anything. But on principle, Europe and the FRG must be prepared to safeguard their lifelines in extreme cases. In this respect there are no differences of opinion among us. I see the necessity of naval units acting outside the geographical sphere of the alliance if Europe's and the FRG's lifelines are endangered. I say explicitly only naval units. I do not think that anybody has mentioned that we should send Bundeswehr divisions to the Cape of Good Hope.

SPIEGEL: That could still come. First of all, we are supposed to pay more. During your last visit to the United States, you pointed out very clearly that Bonn must pay more for arms in order to strengthen German-American relations. So in an extreme situation you, together with your fellow party member Dregger, not only want to send the Federal Navy to the South Atlantic...

Kiep: ...under extreme circumstances...

SPIEGEL:...but you want to spend considerably more money on defense. How much actually?

Kiep: Expenditures are individually concentrated on a few fields. First of all there is the program for improving U.S. naval bases in Europe. There is the entire problem of Bundeswehr supplies, ammunition and so on, and third, there is the problem of strengthening our navy with regard to the aforementioned safeguarding of lifelines and supply routes. All these measures cost money.

The Federal Government will know how much money this will cost. I cannot name an amount now. I can only say one thing: We will certainly not be able to maintain our commitments and thus our interests if we continually go over the same ground of 3 percent increases in defense budgets. This has to be sold successfully over and over again even though it was decided on long before Afghanistan took place.

SPIEGEL: In other words, a CDU government will certainly spend considerably more on defense and armament.

//

Kiep: I am convinced that our vital interests demand that we spend more defense than has been announced by the government. For me this task, along with other important tasks, has a decisive finance policy priority.

SPIEGEL: Could you possibly indicate where you want to make cuts?

Kiep: We would first announce a moratorium. For the time being we would neither pass nor implement any more laws entailing the spending of money without first making an inventory, without checking the balance and setting priorities for the eighties.

SPIEGEL: Would a CDU government possibly increase taxes to safeguard our vital interests, as you call them, through considerably higher armament expenditures?

Kiep: I think that if we were to do without some of the laws planned by the Federal Government, laws involving the spending of additional money, we would have a good chance of financing this or that additional expenditures, but I do not want to rule out having existing laws--above and beyond these planned laws which will have a financial effect but which are not yet in force--examined and their financial implications curtailed.

Particularly I have in mind the whole field of expenditures by the Federal Government and the laender in the framework of common financing. I do not think we can maintain these expenditures at their current levels.

SPIEGEL: If one looks at the core of your statement such as considerably more expenditures for arms, German ships off the Cape...

Kiep: ...only in extreme cases...

SPIEGEL: ...nothing much remains of the picture of a liberal Kiep. He is now marching in step with Dregger and Franz Josef Strauss. That has come all of a sudden.

Kiep: I am moved by your concern for the fate of the union. Our credibility is involved. One can even ask the question whether we will really win votes by what we say with regard to the alliance or with regard to what I have been telling you here today. I assume that the Federal Government's successful distribution of foreign policy sedatives in recent months would rather win votes for it than our reminders and warnings will for us.

SPIEGEL: In other words, if you were ever convinced you could win the elections on 5 October, your expectations will continue to shrink if foreign policy remains the dominating issue in the election campaign?

Kiep: An opposition party and every party that is worth the name cannot ignore decisive problems and cannot rule them out because they are inopportune for an election campaign.

SPIEGEL: Mr Kiep, we thank you for this interview.

DIE WELT COMMENTARIES VIEW MBFR PROPOSALS

DW221000 Bonn DIE WELT in German 22 Jul 80 p 1

[Bernt Conrad article: "Brezhnev Failed To Tell Schmidt Part of His Disarmament Plans. It Applies to the Bundeswehr"]

[Text] Bonn--To date the Soviet Union has withheld an important part of its latest proposal concerning a troop reduction in central Europe (MBFR) from the public.

This consists of the demand that no state maintain more than 50 percent of the armed forces of their alliance in the reduction area.

This wish by Moscow, which had already been advanced earlier, is aimed at the Bundeswehr. It it were implemented, the following absurd development would be conceivable, Bonn experts feel: In a situation of acute crisis the Americans might find themselves compelled to relocate some of their troops stationed in Germany to the Middle East, for example.

In this case the strength of the Bundeswehr could exceed the ceiling of 50 percent of the total strength of the NATO troops in central Europe. Instead of filling American gaps, under the Russian concept the Bundeswehr would even have to reduce its strength to return to below 50 percent.

Brezhnev failed to tell the chancellor and the federal foreign minister during their Moscow visit on 30 June and 1 July that such an idea would be included in the latest Soviet MBFR negotiations the Russians planned to declare their readiness to withdraw another 20,000 soldiers from central Europe in addition to the 20,000 soldiers and 10,000 [as published] tanks from the "GDR". The Americans, in turn, are expected to withdraw 13,000 soldiers stationed in Europe. It is not know why Brezhnev's announcement was so incomplete and why Moscow's complete MBFR proposal has so far been withheld from the public.

A particularly piquant aspect is that the ticklish part of the Russian move is in accordance with the demand of the December 1979 Berlin SPD Bundestag congress. The request of the party Executive Board reads: "The application of such principles as collectiveness and parity is to be facilitated in an initial MBFR agreement in the interest of forming confidence building and security policy stability by the fact that no participating state will maintain more than half of the numerical strength of the troops on its side of the alliances' reduction area." In November 1979 Federal Chancellor Schmidt made a similar suggestion to the SPD Bundestag faction.

At that time FDP politicians considered the suggestion very doubtful because it would give the Soviets an instrument for limiting the strength of the Bundeswehr. Nothing was changed to this day with regard to these reservations.

'Traps' in Soviet Proposal

DW221012 Bonn DIE WELT in German 22 Jul 80 p 6

[Commentary signed RMC: "Interference Right"]

[Text] The recent Soviet MBFR demands demonstrate again how Moscow wants to exploit Western disagreement. In Vienna the Soviets demand that the result of troop reductions not permit one army to have more than 50 percent of the overall strength possessed by its alliance system. Brezhnev kept this plan from Schmidt and Genscher, the two Kremlin visitors, in the talk that was "frank."

There are quite a number of traps to the Moscow demand. If NATO accepted it, it would mean that the Soviet Union could indirectly bring influence to bear on the size of the Bundeswehr. The SPD demanded that the Bundeswehr not be greater than half the entire European NATO force. From Moscow's point of view it is understandable that it will take that idea up immediately, but it is hardly possible that within the framework of arms control NATO will tie down not only its overall strength but also the strength of national contingents. Genscher seems to realize more clearly what kind of a lever that would be in the hands of the Soviets, more clearly than Schmidt can see it with his leftist rear guard dreaming of detente.

ISLAMIC CONFERENCE SECRETARY CHATTI ENDS PARIS TALKS

[Maurice Delarue report: "France Is Not In Favor of Convening a UN Session on Palestine"]

[Text] Afghanistan and the plan for a special UN Assembly session on Palestine (starting 22 July) were the subjects of the talks which President Giscard d'Estaing and Foreign Minister Francois-Poncet had with Islamic Conference Secretary General Chatti on Tuesday, 15 July. The same subjects were probably also raised during the audience which the president of the republic granted to Saudi Ambassador al-Hujaylan. Recalling that the "Kabul regime's representatives' had not attended the meeting with the Afghan resistance representatives organized by the Islamic Conference in Geneva, Mr Chatti stated on leaving the Elysee: "We have not given up hope of meeting with the Kabul regime's representatives. We are still trying to establish contacts with them, since they are one of the political groups concerned in the conflict."

With regard to the UN Assembly meeting on Palestine, Mr Giscard d'Estaing probably expressed France's legal reservations on the procedure chosen and its skepticism about its efficacy. The convening of a special session was requested by Senegal as chairman of the UN committee "on implementation of the Palestinian people's inalienable rights," following the U.S. veto on 30 April against a resolution providing for the "establishment of an independent Palestinian state."

Senegal is invoking the assembly resolution known as United for Peace, adopted on 3 November 1950 after the outbreak of the Korean war and sponsored by the United States in order to "short-circuit" the Security Council. Contrary to the spirit of the UN Charter, this resolution authorizes the assembly, in the event of a Security Council veto, to make "the appropriate recommendations," "including the use of force" on a question in dispute. The Senegalese request will probably secure the majority required to convene the assembly "within 24 hours" despite the hostility shown by the United States, which is seeing the procedure it invented being turned against it.

France, which is anxious to maintain the Security Council's preponderance (out of realism and because it has the right of veto in the council), is not in favor of this procedure either. Although it is not officially opposed to the special meeting, with regard to the basic issue, France mainly regrets that the Arabs are preparing to present a resolution which is much too radical and which will demand the evacuation of the territories occupied by Israel "before 15 November" on pain of sanctions. Such a resolution has no chance of producing any results. France, on the other hand, hopes to pass a resolution with the other Europeans advocating, in keeping with the European Council statement in Venice, the simultaneous recognition of the Palestinians' right to self-determination and Israel's right to security.

LE MONDE REPORTS ON FRENCH-IRANIAN TRADE

LD221441 Paris LE MONDE in French 22 Jul 80 p 5

["J.-M.Q." report: "French-Iranian Trade Was Increasing Markedly until the Embargo Decision"]

[Text] French-Iranian trade has increased considerably since the beginning of the year. In the first 5 months of 1980 (January to May) France exported goods worth Fr1.47 billion as against Fr531 million for the corresponding period in 1979.

At the same time Iranian sales to France rose to Fr2 billion as against Fr1.24 billion in the first 5 months of 1979.

On the face of it this increase in trade between the two countries might seem surprising. However, the gross figures must be viewed in the light of several factors. Trade had been reduced to an exceptionally low level at the beginning of 1979, since the Iranian economy and its commercial structures were completely paralyzed.

During the first few months of 1980 Paris had hoped that the situation would ease somewhat. French enterprises had reestablished some ties and increased their presence in Iran so as to be on the spot should the situation in the country normalize. The abortive U.S. raid put an end--for the moment--to these hopes, and since then a new "cooling" in relations between the two countries has been noted.

This has been particularly evident since France joined in the sanctions decreed by the Nine following the EEC foreign ministers' decisions. Therefore, the French Government passed a decree on 21 May banning the export and reexport of goods to Iran. The impact of this decision will only be possible to assess from foreign trade statistics for the second half of the year.

Nonetheless, French economic circles did not expect--unless there was another serious deterioration in relations between Paris and Tehran--this embargo to produce an abrupt fall in French sales. Indeed, the embargo does not affect food products and pharmaceutical products. These products represented around 60 percent of total French exports to Iran for the first 3 months of the year, with Iran buying large quantities of sugar in particular. Moreover, the embargo also excludes supplies connected with contracts signed before 4 November 1979 (date when the U.S. Embassy hostages were seized in Tehran). Several French enterprises which had factories in Iran are therefore continuing to supply spare parts to these establishments even when they have been "Iranicized." There are now only a few hundred French people in Iran, as against more than 6,000 before the revolution.

Iranian sales to France consist almost exclusively of oil. From January to May, 1.4 million tons of Iranian crude were imported, in other words a little less than 3 percent of total French supplies. Most of this amount was imported in the first 3 months of the year.

The French oil company has not bought 1 barrel of Iranian oil since the beginning of the year, following the failure to renew its contract in December 1979. French imports of Iranian crude are thus mainly carried out by international groups.

OUTGOING ARMED FORCES CHIEF COMMENTS ON GISCARD MEETING

LD211926 Paris Domestic Service in French 1700 GMT 21 Jul 80

[Text] General Mery, the armed forces, chief of staff is retiring. He will be replaced by General Vanbremeersch. General Mery was received this afternoon by Valery Giscard d'Estaing, (Francois Vicard) interviewed him on the steps of the president's palace when the head of the French Armed Forces, who is giving up his command, emerged from his conversation with the head of state:

[Begin recording] [Mery] I gave him my impressions of the current state of the army, which is, in my opinion, good, as a result of the cooperation within it as well as the stability of the training which is accomplished by it. All this is a result of the effort which the government and the president himself have given to our armed forces for the last 5 years.

[Question] What about nuclear or conventional weapons?

[Answer] Nuclear and conventional weapons are necessary together. This has always been my point of view, as you know.

[Question] And what is your opinion on the neutron bomb?

[Answer] As for the neutron bomb, I gave my position on the technical level in the National Assembly, saying that it seemed to me to be desirable to have it in the range of our tactical nuclear weapons.

[Question] Did you bring up military service with the president?

[Answer] No, because the president very clearly gave his position on this subject at his latest news conference, as you know. There was no point in our discussing it.

[Question] Were you in complete agreement with him on this position?

[Answer] Completely. [end recording]

COMMUNIQUE ON FIRST PCF, EGYPTIAN COMMUNIST PARTY TALKS

LD220939 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 11 Jul 80 p 8

[Joint PCF-Egyptian Communist Party [ECP] communique issued after 10 July meeting, presumably in Paris: "Joint PCF-Egyptian Communist Party Communique"]

[Text] A warm and fraternal meeting took place between an Egyptian Communist Party delegation and a PCF delegation on Thursday, 10 July 1980. The ECP was represented by a Politburo delegation. (The PCF was represented by Maxime Gremetz, Politburo member and Central Committee secretary and Central Committee Foreign Policy Section member Alain Gresh.) This important meeting, the first between the two parties, provided an opportunity for a broad exchange of views on various international questions.

Imperialism has made every possible effort to oppose the peoples' struggle in the Middle East. Following the Iranian people's extraordinary victory, which ended a bloody dictatorship and eliminated U.S. imperialism's presence, the latter is trying to regain its lost positions. It has set up a quick reaction force in the region, established bases for aggression in Egypt and Oman and strengthened its ties with the Israeli leaders and Arab reaction. At the same time, it is engaging in maneuvers to create problems throughout regimes like that in Syria.

Egypt is playing a special role in this context. Having broken with 'Abd an-Nasir's line, As-Sadat has engaged in collaboration with the United States and is trying to play the role of gendarme in Africa and the Arab world. On the internal plane this policy is producing an intolerable situation for the people's masses. Many sections of society suffering the effects of the As-Sadat regime's antinational and antidemocratic policy are joining in active opposition, to which the ECP is making a major contribution.

None of the promises made after the Camp David agreements have been kept. Indeed, these agreements were really only a means to enable the United States to increase its presence in the region while giving Begin the means of pursuing his aggressive and expansionist policy. The decision to resume negotiations on autonomy does not alter the fact that it is now clear that these agreements turn their back on real peace and have not even begun to solve the key question in the Middle East conflict--the Palestinian problem. The Camp David process is now at an impasse, and the Venice statement showed the real extent of the show of European initiative.

The PCF and ECP reaffirmed their attachment to a just and lasting peace which alone will be in keeping with the interests of all peoples in the region. This peace must be based on the UN resolutions in particular: Israel's withdrawal from all the Arab territories occupied since 1967; recognition of the Palestinian people's national rights, including their right to an independent state; and participation by the PLO--the Palestinian people's sole legitimate representative--in any negotiations. Only such a peace will guarantee the right of all states in the region to peace and security.

The two parties stressed their solidarity with the Lebanese people, national movement and Communist Party in their struggle for an independent, united and democratic Lebanon. They welcomed the success of the conference of solidarity with the Lebanese people held in Paris on 16-18 June 1980.

The PCF and ECP confirmed the importance they attach to development of economic, social and political democracy in the Middle East--vital preconditions for renewed progress by the Arab national liberation movement. They condemned the bloody anticommunist and antidemocratic repression in Iraq, and reaffirmed their solidarity with the gulf peoples.

The PCF condemned the antidemocratic and antitrade union repression in Egypt. It denounced the wicked laws aimed at silencing opposition and the arbitrary imprisonments and assured the ECP of its active solidarity.

In conclusion the two delegations expressed satisfaction with the strong relations of friendship and cooperation which exist between the two parties. They decided to make every effort to extend and strengthen their ties.

GREMETZ RECEIVES ROMANIAN COMMUNIST PARTY DELEGATION

LD221209 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 11 Jul 80 p 9

[Unattributed report: "PCF-Romanian Communist Party Talks"]

[Text] During a visit to France at the PCF's invitation, Virgil Cazacu, Romanian Communist Party [RCP] Political Executive Committee member and [Central Committee] Foreign Relations Section secretary, had a meeting at PCF headquarters with Maxime Gremetz, PCF Politburo member and Central Committee Secretary. The talks, which were also attended by PCF Foreign Policy Section member Yves Serdenif and RCP representative Vasile Nicolcioiu, provided an opportunity for the exchange of information on the situation in the two countries and for the explanation of two parties' respective stances on the international situation. The discussions, which took place in a cordial atmosphere, also enabled PCF-RCP cooperation to be examined.

LIBYAN MIG-23 PILOT'S BODY RECOVERED, INVESTIGATION CONTINUES

LD222018 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1900 GMT 22 Jul 80

[Text] The body of the pilot of the MiG-23 which mysteriously crashed in the Sila Mountains last Friday, has been recovered this evening. Tomorrow an autopsy will be carried out at Castel Silano. The decision was made by the (Frontone) public prosecutor's office after yesterday's official statement by the Libyan government, according to which the fighter plane crashed because the pilot had a heart attack during a normal training flight. Italy has proposed to Libya that a joint commission be set up to investigate the causes of the accident, Defense Minister Lagorio declared in the Chamber of Deputies.

COURT RULES OFFICIALS MUST REPAY LOCKHEED BRIBES

AU221538 Rome ANSA in English 1530 GMT 22 Jul 80

[Text] Rome, July 22 (ANSA)--Former Italian Defense Minister Mario Tanassi and former Air-force Chief of Staff Giulio Fanali will have to give the government back nearly the entire extra sum [of] one billion 308 (?million) lire Italy spent in purchasing fourteen Lockheed "Hercules" transport (?planes). The sum is the total of pay-offs the American aeronautic firm paid to grease the sale of the planes to the Italian Government. The decision was reached today by the Italian Court of Accounts. According to the ruling, Tanassi and Fanali will have to pay back the entire sum, less ten million lire of which will have to be paid by Bruno Palmiotti, who was Tanassi's private secretary at the time of the sale. The ruling took into account the verdict handed down against Tanassi, Fanali and Palmiotti by the constitutional court. The highest Italian court ruled that the three were corrupted to carry out an act contrary to their official duties and that the six percent extra Lockheed charged the Italian Government was for "political contributions" to the tune of one (?billion) 260 million lire. The remaining 48 million either went into pay-offs that escaped detection or were an "unjust" surcharge levied by Lockheed. Tanassi, Fanali and Palmiotti can not appeal the account court ruling.

COSSIGA, COLOMBO CONGRATULATE SUZUKI, ITO

OW210807 Tokyo KYODO in English 0750 GMT 21 Jul 80

[Text] Tokyo July 21 KYODO--Italian Prime Minister Francesco Cossiga has sent a message to Zenko Suzuki congratulating him on his appointment as prime minister of Japan, the Italian Embassy announced Monday. Recalling the friendly ties existing between Italy and Japan, Cossiga said in his message that he was certain that Suzuki will contribute to strengthening "the already deep relations" between the two nations, the embassy said. Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo has also sent a congratulatory message to his newly appointed Japanese counterpart, Foreign Minister Masayoshi Ito, it said.

BUFALINI CRITICIZES FOREIGN POLICY IN SENATE DEBATE

LD211533 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 17 Jul 80 pp 1, 18

[Vera Vegetti report to Senate: "Italy, Europe, Afghanistan, East-West Relations and Detente"]

[Excerpt] Rome--At a time of dramatic tensions when a few, albeit uncertain, signs of light are beginning to appear on the international horizon, Italy's foreign policy seems incapable of embracing the innovations, of acting on them to consolidate and promote the hopes of a resumption of dialogue and detente. This is the severely critical verdict that Comrade Paolo Bufalini issued yesterday in the Senate, during the debate which opened the previous day with a "flat and bureaucratic" report from Foreign Minister Colombo.

The criticisms of the foreign minister's report, for that matter, did not only come from the opposition (La Valle for the leftwing independents, Spadaccia for the radicals and Malagodi for the Italian Liberal Party) but also reflected unease and conflicts within the majority itself. Polemicizing explicitly with Colombo, Christian Democrat Granelli rejected the alternatives outlined by the minister between the "realism" of the alignment with the stances of the strongest allies and the alleged "irrationality" of any quest for autonomy, and maintained, on the contrary, that Italy has the strength and prestige to contribute "in a nonsubordinate position" to the resumption of East-West dialogue. Socialist Landolfi stressed the commitment to "not allowing ourselves to be dragged into the field of revenge and the exacerbation of tensions" and to taking every opportunity created by Soviet diplomacy for resuming negotiations.

Bufalini began his broad and thorough speech with an analysis of the salient characteristics of the international situation. On the one hand, the tensions due to the eruption of new movements of liberation and rebellion on the part of broad people masses--from Iran to South Africa and Latin America--and to the stubborn forms of resistance against these movements are still acute. Within this framework a crisis is coming about over the "bipolar" character of detente and the threats of the rearmament race, nuclear proliferation and the frightening accumulation of weapons of mass destruction are intensifying.

There is, however, another reality, consisting of a great aspiration for peace, which is reflected in the concerns and initiatives of various individuals, governments and political forces operating throughout the world. Our debate, Bufalini explained, is taking place at a time which reveals signs, though still limited and uncertain, of a turn for the better. In this regard he pointed to the signs of openness and the desire for a resumption of dialogue that the PCI delegation observed during its recent visit to Moscow and in its talks with top Soviet leaders, especially on the crucial "Eruomissiles" issue, connection with the problems of the other nuclear weapons, on which the Soviets have dropped all preconditions for starting negotiations.

As far as Afghanistan is concerned, the situation is more contorted and difficult. In Moscow the Italian Communists reasserted their disapproval of the grave decision on the military intervention. But, Bufalini explained, the Afghan problem is of particular concern to us Communists, not only as a foreign policy issue but also as a general issue which poses a number of questions to all revolutionary forces. When does a real revolutionary process take place? Therefore the seizure of power by progressive forces is not enough, though we do observe with respect the harsh and painful turmoil of an experience such as the Afghan one, that is taking place under conditions of tragic backwardness. But even within the profound diversity of historical and social conditions and the multiplicity of roads to socialism, there remains a fundamental condition valid for everyone, namely that the revolution must be carried out by the masses concerned, by the majority of them. Therefore one cannot accept or term revolutionary a revolutionary process decided and imposed from above, by a government, moreover, supported by foreign armed forces. This, therefore, is the underlying reason for our disapproval, which is accompanied by other reasons, of an international nature, which we have stressed several times. Even in this connection, despite the remaining difficulties, something is happening: There have been initiatives and proposals over Afghanistan from France, the Islamic countries, India and Yugoslavia. The Soviet Union has made the gesture of withdrawing a sizeable, through limited, contingent of troops. In this connection, Bufalini criticized the stance adopted by Colombo, who demanded the complete withdrawal of Soviet troops as a "precondition" for any solution. This is a rigid and unrealistic precondition, which does not advance the gradual process which is the only one that can lead to a peaceful and negotiated solution and provides for Afghanistan's independence and nonalignment, the withdrawal of Soviet troops and at the same time the guarantee of nonintervention by the other neighboring countries.

In connection with another problem of the international situation, the Middle East, Sufalini expressed dissatisfaction with the retrograde course being pursued by Italian diplomacy. Since Cossiga' remarks in his speech presenting his first government, explicitly mentioning the Palestinians' right to a homeland, there has been a transition to the present exposition, which regresses from even the European Council's Venice doeument and qualifies previously adopted stances, whereas there is a need to clearly assert both the Palestinians' right to secure a homeland in the form of a state, with observance of the security of all states including Israel, and the recognition of the PLO as the Palestinian people's representative.

Next, following a very critical verdict on the 6 months of Italian chairmanship of the EEC (which Bulfalini described as a "missed opportunity,") the Communist speaker stressed that the Italian Government has seemed concerned with impeding the French and German detente initiatives instead of making all the EEC countries participate in them, and more generally with not moving away from U.S. stances, as emerged clearly during Carter's visit to Rome. Hence stems the inability, demonstrated by Colombo's report, to embrace the albeit tenuous elements of innovation in the international situation, the irritation with initiatives taken by other governments, the tendency to emphasize the most rigid stances and last the underlying orientation toward a return to bipolarism, whereby the various initiatives to invert the negative trend in the detente crisis coming from certain Western countries are considered "disruptive."

This approach stems from the Italian Government's overall foreign policy line. In this connection, Bufalini said, I would like to make something clear. Our verdict on this policy is severely critical. But we have no intention of automatically transferring our verdict on the government's domestic and economic policy to the field of foreign policy. Of course this policy is creating situations of harsh tension at home which have a negative influence also on Italy's role in Europe and the world. However, Bufalini stressed, we want to make every effort to insure that the foreign policy debate is guaranteed its own autonomy, that in connection with these issues there be a quest for the utmost possible unity, the unity that in previous years was perhaps the most important achievement of the policy of national solidarity. This requirement is opposed by the tendencies, which are still very strong, to subordinate foreign policy to domestic policy, transferring the latter's divisions and prejudices to the former. There is again a tendency to give priority in foreign policy to a predetermined and almost ideological choice of camp based on a unilateral, arbitrary and Manichean view of history. This choice of camp is reflected in obedience to the U.S. line, whatever it is, as was shown during Carter's visit to Rome.

What Italy in fact needs is an autonomous foreign policy which, without questioning its membership of Western alliances (in this connection Bufalini recalled the PCI's stance on NATO,) will reject the predetermined option of "standing by the Americans even when they are wrong." In this connection Bufalini rejected the concept of the "indivisibility" of detente: Indeed, while it is true that every act of aggression or violence upsets international relations as a whole, it is also true that every individual initiative aimed at resolving a specific cause of tension helps to improve the general climate of world relations. The Italian Government must contribute to this process by surmounting its stubborn refusals and prejudices: It must press for the resumption of dialogue with Moscow; it must press for the Americans' ratification of SALT II; it must work to insure that it is possible at the coming Madrid conference to realize significant progress in the field of security and particularly of "measures of trust," thus laying the foundations for convening a European disarmament conference; it must help to create a Mediterranean dimension at the Madrid conference; and it must adopt a determined and incisive role for an autonomous European position on the world scene. This quest will enable us to recover the utmost unitary convergence in this field, not for a timid policy but for a bold, active and resolute line aimed at resolving international conflicts through negotiation, detente and peace.

SPAIN SUPPORTS ANDEAN PACT CRITICISM OF BOLIVIAN COUP

LD212155 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1800 GMT 21 Jul 80

[Text] The Diplomatic Information Office of the Spanish Ministry of Foreign Affairs has stated that the Spanish Government, in its capacity as observer country, adheres to the statement issued by the ministers of the member countries of the Andean Pact of 19 July in which they deplore the military coup in Bolivia and express their solidarity with the Bolivian people.

Bolivian Ambassador Resigns

LD221304 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1200 GMT 22 Jul 80

[Summary] A group of Bolivian students today carried out a peaceful occupation of the Bolivian Embassy in Madrid as a delegation of Spanish politicians handed the ambassador, William Busqui, a letter of protest against the military coup. The ambassador, who yesterday resigned his post, promised to take appropriate action with regard to the letter, which was signed by the Spanish Socialist Workers' Party, the Spanish Communist Party, trade union and Catholic organizations and human rights groups.

DEFENSE MINISTER MAKES STATEMENT ON TERM IN OFFICE

LD221722 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1600 GMT 22 Jul 80

[Text] Defense Minister Agustin Rodriguez Sahagun today made an important statement summing up his 15 months as head of the Defense Ministry. Briefly, the following were among the points made by the minister:

There has been no pressure from the armed forces on institutions;

No document has been drawn up by the joint chiefs of staff in connection with the proposal that there should be an amnesty for those who were formerly members of the UMD [Democratic Military Union] and for military men who belonged to the republican side. The government will report in good time on this legislative proposal. I intend to suggest that amendments to the draft should be proposed so that a balanced approach might be achieved;

The military status of the Civil Guard has now been recognized;

Finally, referring to the attack made today in the Province of Logrono, Rodriguez Sahagun said that this attack provides evidence of the difficulties the terrorists have recently been encountering in the Basque country.

TALKS ON SPANISH ACCESSION TO EEC HELD IN BRUSSELS

LD212334 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2000 GMT 21 Jul 80

[Text] There will be no interruption in the negotiations for Spanish accession to the Common Market, which will continue with the scheduled pace and timetable. This is the fundamental conclusion implied at the end of the 12th session--the fifth at ministerial level--of the conference on negotiations for Spanish accession to the European Communities which was held this afternoon in Brussels.

The president of the Council of Foreign Ministers of the Community, Gaston Thorn, in the name of the Nine ministers, has accepted, in general terms, the Spanish position brilliantly expounded by Minister Calvo Sotelo.

The two sides will meet again next September, and the negotiations will continue regularly until Spanish accession to the EEC.

FOREIGN MINISTER COMMENTS ON TALKS IN SPAIN, OTHER ISSUES

ID221145 Madrid ABC in Spanish 17 Jul 80 p 10

[Matilde Hermida interview in Madrid with Cyprus Foreign Minister Nikolaos Rolandhis: "I Hope Cyprus Issue Will Be Discussed At Madrid Conference"--date not given]

[Excerpt] Madrid--[Question] Mr Rolandhis, what is Spain's position on the Cyprus issue?

[Answer] On Tuesday I had a very interesting talk with the Spanish Foreign Minister and I was very pleased to verify that you support our demands and that Mr Oreja stressed the need to support in every way the UN resolutions concerning the withdrawal of the remaining occupation troops on the island and territorial reintegration. We also examined the opportunities that might be created at the Madrid conference. In fact I am realistic and I know that unfortunately no effective solutions will emerge because this does not usually happen at this kind of international meeting. But, Spain being the conference's host country, it seems that it will attach great importance to Mediterranean issues and among these I hope that the Cyprus issue will be discussed.

[Question] Your visit has coincided with a Libyan offer to resolve the deadlock in the negotiations between the Greek and Turkish-Cypriot communities promoted by the United Nations after the war. What is your opinion on this? Might Al-Qadhdhafi's possible "protection" of Cyprus not prove somewhat controversial?

[Answer] The initiative to which you refer took place during the Libyan foreign minister's visit to my country. Tripoli does not presume to mediate between President Kiprianou and Mr Denktas but has offered itself to the UN secretary general as a possbible meeting place between the two Cypriot communities. I believe that Libya has many points of contact with my country. I do not intend to go into whether President al-Qadhdhafi is the ideal person to host this hypothetical negotiation bid. He is certainly a controversial person, but he is also someone with real influence on the Ankara government and Denktas is an Ankara man--among other reasons because he supplies it with oil. Therefore Waldheim might consider Libya's offer, despite the objections that might be raised. Be that as it may, it is something that must be decided by the UN secretary general.

[Question] The invasion of Cyprus took place in 1974 under conditions morally compromising for the entire world. What do you believe is the position of the European countries--particularly the EEC--on this issue? What is NATO's position? What has been the outcome of Washington's promises?

[Answer] Cyprus is a European nation that maintains excellent relations with every country on the continent, especially with Britain on account of our shared past. Solid links exist with the EEC. We have an agreement dating back to 1973, which has gradually been enlarged. But it must be admitted that Europe let the issue slip at the time and that now, 6 years later on. There is no way of creating the sense of urgency that the case demands for its solution.

It is very strange to observe how the European nations feel moved by what it happening in Afghanistan, which is far from our borders, but remain unmoved by the Cyprus situation, which is very explosive.

[Question] Perhaps the fact is that nobody expects that anything will happen between Greece and Turkey....

[Answer] I do not know what to tell you. I believe nothing is impossible if the circumstances are right--and Cyprus is a factor of worrying frictions between two neighboring European countries which regard the issue as their own and with nationalist feelings. Be that as it may, even if we ignore a tragic and extreme situation, Cyprus is still a factor of discord and unease in a very vulnerable area. Permit me to remind you that it is near the Middle East, near Suez and near the oil, in short.

[Question] Could Greece's entry into the EEC and Turkey's hopes of membership be in Cyprus's interest?

[Answer] I do not believe it will be decisive but undoubtedly it will help. Athens will bring this problem with it to within the EEC and, bearing in mind Turkey's aspirations as well, it will be a further factor in the pressure that an attempt is being made to exert on the Ankara government.

[Question] In any case Ankara is now in a special situation following the loss of Iran to the West. Perhaps the pressures will not be so effective.

[Answer] Definitely. Turkey is importing a great deal at present and hence the continuous barrage of aid to shore up its chaotic and difficult situation. But Greece is still Europe's natural boundry. This cannot be easily forgotten. Turkey occupies another very important position but it is in nobody's interests to accentuate the tensions in this area and the rivalries between neighbors.

What worries me, however, is the Turkish domestic situation. It would be somewhat impolitic, for instance, for the present administration to consider a total withdrawal of troops from our country. Premier Demirel, who used to criticize his predecessor for his stance on the Cyprus issue, cannot lose favor with certain sectors. But worst of all, there is such confusion and the situation is so fragile that nobody in Ankara is in a position to take decisions in any direction.

[Question] We were discussing earlier the positions of certain countries and bodies with regard to the Cyprus issue....

[Answer] Let us see: It seems to me that NATO considers itself rather outside this issue, though two of its member nations have been involved in it in one way or another. The United States? It is true that there have been promises and good will. I remember the cordial meetings with Mr Vance and Mr Muskie... But I fear that that is all.

Frankly, this all seems rather frustrating to me sometimes. We move from one place to another, we work, we receive sympathy and sincere concern from all sides, but....be that as it may, as far as I am concerned the important thing now is for the issue not to be forgotten. A period of 6 years is a long time for one story to hold the front page of the newspapers.

[Question] Meanwhile what is the situation in your country?

[Answer] We are very hard working people with great business acumen. I tell you this because even the most highly developed countries acknowledge it. Proportionally, we are in the front rank. We emerged from the 1974 disaster in a manner which surprises many people. As for the sociopolitical situation, I believe that we could all coexist again in a federal from of state. There never used to be any problems between our communities. The present situation is artificial and I believe that the Turkish Cypriots are also tired of invasion troops and tensions. Above all, both groups are Cypriots.

MITSOTAKIS DENIES SUBMISSION OF NEW PLAN BY ROGERS

AT221020 Athens MESIMVRINI in Greek 21 Jul 80 p 1

[Text] "No plan has yet been submitted to the Greek Government by General Rogers," said Foreign Minister Konstandinos Mitsotakis yesterday in denying press reports on Greece's imminent return to NATO.

According to these press reports, "there is a new draft proposal from the chief of Allied Forces Europe, the basic points of which are acceptable to the Greek side.

Mitsotakis also denied reports that the U.S. side has requested an expansion of the U.S. bases.

In reference to the question of new proposals from Rogers it was again reiterated yesterday that such proposals are expected to be submitted to Athens and Ankara between 1 and 15 August.

Usually well-informed sources in Brussels also stressed yesterday that this time the Rogers proposals will certainly be within the framework of the Haig-Davos agreement so that they can satisfy the Greek side, while at the same time an effort will be made to neutralize Turkish reaction so that basic negotiations can take place.

General Rogers will submit the text of his proposals to General Gratsios, chief of the National Defense General Staff, who will meet him in Brussels.

RALLIS STRESSES NO ELECTION PLANNED FOR 16 MONTHS

AT221040 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1830 GMT 21 Jul 80

[Excerpts] Problems in Navplion and Argos were examined by Prime Minister Yeoryios Rallis, who visited the two cities today. He received representatives of the local authorities and workers as well as private citizens who briefed him on their problems.

Replying to an address by the mayor of Navplion, Rallis stated:

[Begin recording] I thank you, Mr Mayor, foryour kind words. I will stress two aspects: The need for moderation which you lauded, which means that you share this view, and your willingness to cooperate with the government.

I did not come here to ask for your vote. This will come later. Election must be held in accordance with constitutional provisions unless there are unforeseen developments which require an earlier election. Luckily no such developments exist. We must therefore bear in mind that the election will be held at the end of the 4-year period. We have 16 to 17 months ahead of us and at the end of that time we will ask for the Greek people's vote. They will judge us by our accomplishments. At this moment, however, we ask for the cooperation of everyone, even those who did not vote for our party and who, perhaps, will not vote for it in the next election. This country does not belong to you, Mr Mayor, nor does it belong to those of us in the government. It belongs to all of us. It is time we understand that the wear and tear of any public property is the wear and tear of our own property. We must understand that we much keep this blessed land bequeathed to us by our fathers and grandfathers in the same way we keep our own personal property. I started these tours for the explicit purpose of asking this of you, that is, that we should be briefed on the problems of each area and, primarily, to ask for your willing cooperation.

I want to repeat that if you all cooperate with the government, and I repeat this not for any election reasons but for your own personal benefit, then in a very short time we will be able to change Greece. You can help change your city, Argos will change Argos and so on, thus changing the form of all the country's areas. Then in a very short time we will have important progress. Most naturally, our fate depends upon developments in the entire world, as you said, but it also depends upon us. Naturally, international economic developments also have their influence upon Greece as we have seen in the past few years as a result of oil price hikes. However, if we are wise, prudent, moderate and without fanaticism, we can smooth out these influences. I thank you for your welcome. [end recording]

AVEROF ATTACKS PAPANDREOU'S SOCIALISM, REJECTS COOPERATION

AT221345 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 20 Jul 80 pp 1, 16

[Text] In his last address to the international socialist seminar organized at "Pantios" (Senior Technical Education School) the PASOK leader was once again unable to specifically define the form of socialism which his party promises, should it ever come to power. In vague and unclear terms he criticized and "evaluated" the various socialist experiments, but without informing his listeners about his own specific--if they exist--views on the subject.

In reference to the always vague positions of Papandreou on this subject, National Defense Minister Evangelos Averof Tositsa made a thorough and extremely interesting analysis which we present below:

After underlining Papandreou's recanting, Averof indicated that the Greek people are not prepared to gamble the fate of their own homes and of the father land by following the leader of PASOK in his dangerous game. He stressed that should Papandreou ever come to power he would never cease, as many would thin, being a Marxist and attempting to lead the country toward the most totalitarian Marxist regime. He added that he rejects any cooperation between "New Democracy" and PASOK, to which the greatest majority of the Greek people will deny their vote.

The informative and revealing analysis by Averof entitled "PASOK's Ideological Positions," is as follows:

Advanced Self-Administration

In his address to the international socialist seminar at "Pantios" on 30 June the PASOK chairman revealed to us something more about his so-far vague positions. Perhaps he was forced to do this by the high caliber of his audience, which included some of the top names from the international socialist world. Papandreou naturally remained somewhat true to his brilliant technique of using confusing excerpts with a multitude of meanings, but at least this time he sufficiently cleared up certain basic points.

Correctly, very correctly and in a lucid presentation, he refused to define the meaning of the extremely elastic term "socialism." Immediately afterwards he stated that:

"We are not satisfied with existential socialism."

Papandreou's impatience was first of all directed against the socialism reached by the countries of the Third World after they passed through national-liberation movements. Their socialism is not good enough for PASOK because it is there, he said, that the dependent labor market exists. It is a class society, naturally altered and better, but he added:

"In any case this is not what we are envisioning...because when we speak of socialism we believe in the development of different social relations in production which abolish dependent labor and in its place give the workers the opportunity to self-administer production."

PASOK wants even this self-administration in an advanced and peculiar form. Not even the extremely socialist, original, daring and realistic Yugoslav model is good neough for PASOK.

Yugoslav Socialism

Let us see, however, what is this so-called "Yugoslav socialism." With respect to large autonomous production units, the Yugoslav socialist system provides for the abolition of all private ownership, its "socialization" for the benefit of all workers and self-administration of it by the workers themselves. At the same time, however, it also provides for the opportunity to make a profit and the opportunity to invest this profit under state control, which simply directs it toward whatever best serves the whole. The PASOK chairman clearly stated:

"In addition, with reference to self-administration by the workers in the socialized sector--not exactly in the same sense that our friends the Yugoslavs give to self-administration--we add that it is essential to have not only the active participation of workers in self-administration but there must also be participation in this self-administration by local self-government."

In other words, in the purest Marxist dogma we take the means of production away from private ownership and administration by private citizens and we "socialize" it--so far PASOK is satisfied--but we disagree with its administration exclusively by the workers. We propose instead something less specific, dictated from above, something which is broader, something even far broader which goes far beyond the workers in one sector.

If such a form of administration-operation of complicated production sectors, which very often have extremely delicate technical phases, further burdens the cost, the quantity and quality of production, then this is another thing altogether.

This is another thing and perhaps it is secondary for PASOK because the primary thing is something different. I quote from the speech by Andreas Papandreou published in full in IKONOMIKOS TAKHIDHROMOS on 3 July 1980:

"There are certain interests which may not be represented, which may not be expressed by the worker in the sector involved. What are these interests? Let us suppose that there is an unemployment problem. For the self-administered workers sector, however, it is more profitable to release workers rather than to hire new ones."

This means that if the workers themselves, not the private owners, who self-administer a large sector in which they work, consider that their economic survival, even if only their logical productivity, dictates--yes dictates--a cut in personnel then this cut will not be made.

I very much fear that here we have reached the socialism of the logic of absurdity. This is the socialism which states that in the abstract and often demagogic sense of socialism it is essential--at least in many instances--to sacrifice the productivity of the economy and the product of any one branch.

Marxist Blindness

I very much fear that for certain romantic dreamers there has been no consideration of the machine revolution which completely overthrew the relations of dependent labor. [paragraph continues]

There has been no consideration of the unbelievable electronics revolution which compacts the labor of tens of thousands of people into a few boxes and which permits unbelievable achievements. These are achievements which can guarantee for the workers, or even for those only partially employed an improved living standard much superior to the best guarantees of "one day's work for one day's meal." I very much fear that for many dogmatic Marxists the fact that communist parties have retained the hammer and sickle as their symbol means that harvesting of cereals is always done under the conditions of labor which existed when harvesting was done with the sickle and that the hammer continues to be the tool of the workshop.

Those who support this, however, forget that improvement of the people's living standard depends almost exclusively upon the continued improvement of productivity and the increase of production. This is the ultimate goal of all social systems.

The fact that the PASOK chairman continually appears to forget these things, is the very reason one wonders about his statement on the inefficiency of all the labor, social-democratic and socialist parties of the countries of the West and of the Third World. Were none of them able to successfully coordinate socialist visions and the iron laws which stem from human nature and govern production and distribution, these two unshakeable foundations of man's high living standard? Were none of them able to do so?

It appears that only PASOK has found the solution, PASOK which can show no experience in productive activity. It has absolutely no experience in contrast to the surprising experience of bourgeois society which, in only a few decades, spectacularly changed the form of the world while at the same time it improved, by leaps and bounds, the conditions of life of the workers, the farmers and the small businessmen.

It is for this very reason that one cannot fail to wonder about what Andreas Papandreou said about our country. At a time when such positions were expounded for the benefit of extremely progressive foreign parties, with leaders of international prestige, or for the benefit of self-administered workers in the labor sector, how can one not be surprised when the PASOK chairman makes the following statement about Greece during an international seminar:

"What we must seek is a broad alliance of workers, those who are subject to stark exploitation not only by the industrialist (which is the classic example) but also by the middleman, the retailer, the banking system, the multinational companies."

Then he adds that when this broad alliance is achieved, then PASOK will open up the avenue.

"This leads to the foundation of the socialist society. PASOK has repeatedly proclaimed that it is a socialist party and not a social-democratic one. This is because within the limits of social-democratic thinking the definitive reforms undertaken where labor or social-democratic parties rule, simply change and modernize the form of capitalism. Fundamentally, however, they do not touch upon the basic structure."

Naturally the text which I have analyzed also contains some timid reservations. There is one, in particular, according to which socialism is not a matter of one day and of one night but it is a matter of decades and of a large national-peoples' effort.

On the basis of what has been stated above, on the basis of authentic quotations from PASOK's texts, only one thing is clear: PASOK's goal is not one of the various forms of socialism as they are envisioned by modern men. Its goal is the fullest, the most dogmatic form of Marxism, even with the addition of some vague and romantic utopia.

This, naturally, is aimed at satisfying the faction which, under Deputy Tzoumakas, wants to remove the pictures of Elevtherios Venizelos and to replace them by those of Aris Veloukhiotis [communist guerrilla and civil war leader]. I also hope this will also surprise and confuse another faction which does know how to think and how to behave realistically.

It will cause even greater surprise to another category of Greeks (large or small personalities and bourgeois elements and even the political world) who appear to believe that: "PASOK in authority will be completely different from PASOK in the opposition." Or that "perhaps Andreas proclaimed leftist demagogy but he also made moderate socialist proclamations and made logical promises to shipowners and industrialists." Or even that "a cooperation between 'New Democracy' and PASOK is possible and desirable."

Cooperation Is Rejected

Well then, no such thing: The answer due is an emphatic: No! A thousand times no! Before the fact all this was already dangerous lack of judgment. After what was delivered as a statement of faith before a high-level international socialist seminar, such a view would be inexplicable blindness which would gradually lead toward the area of the most totalitarian Marxism. This would be a regime which could far surpass the socialist systems of all the countries of the West and the Third World. No! Our progressive workers, our excellent farmers, our inventive businessmen and our professionals, all the Greek householders, will oppose this inane gambling with their homes and their fatherland. Whether this is nothing but vagueness in good faith or whether this is a silly and egotistic political game, the vast majority of Greeks will deny them its vote. [Signed] Evangelos Averof Tositsas.

KKE (INTERIOR) CENTRAL COMMITTEE RESOLUTION ON UNITY, ELECTIONS

AT161458 Athens I AVYI in Greek 16 Jul 80 p 5

[Text] At a meeting last Thursday the KKE (Interior) Central Committee discussed recent domestic and international political developments. In this connection, the text of its statement is published below:

As is well known, the Central Committee also dealt with problems of I AVYI, with the I AVYI-Thourios Festival, and with political and organization issues related to party activities this summer.

1. The international situation shows certain signs of relaxation of tension and a tendency for return to dialogue, but the danger for further tension has not receded. The Soviet Union has expressed a desire for talks on the Euromissiles issue and has stated its conditions for withdrawal of its troops from Afghanistan. Significant contributions in the direction of deescalating tension are the European Community initiatives (Giscard and Schmidt trips) which confirmed the tendencies toward greater independence from the United States and toward a different course in confronting critical issues concerning relations between the two blocs, developments in the broader Middle East area and the problems of dialogue between the North and South. The activities of Eurocommunist parties, forces from the socialist and social-democratic parties, nonaligned and socialist countries, which link the struggle for detente and peace with total respect for the principles of independence and peaceful coexistence, have significantly contributed to this course despite objective differences in interests between the United States and capitalist Europe. Within this framework the role of the countries of Mediterranean Europe acquires special significance. Return to detente and respect for the principles of peaceful coexistence as a framework for the solution of our era's great problems constitutes the central demand of all people including our own. To this demand is linked the success of the upcoming conference in Madrid in which our country must play a positive role so that a road that will correspond to current conditions can be opened toward detente.

2. The Americans and NATO are gradually increasing their pressure on our country in order to achieve its return to the military wing of the Atlantic alliance under terms which, on the one hand, will serve their interests and, on the other hand, will be dictated by Ankara. Toward that direction they are marshalling all their potentials, external and internal. A return to NATO, which until recently was unacceptable, is currently becoming exceptionally dangerous within the framework of international tension; it must be resisted, like the bases agreement with the United States, by all patriotic forces whatever their affiliation. Every traitorous position on the issues of Cyprus, the Aegean or anything else must also be resisted. Our country thirsts for peace, security and cooperation, and has no aggressive designs on anybody. Because of this position its duty is to steadfastly and persistently defend, without wavering and utilizing every possibility, anywhere on the horizon, its interests and acquired rights which are protected by international agreements.

3. The economic and social situation is deteriorating even more as a direct consequence of the reduction in peoples' income and standard of living. The policy of the New Democracy government cannot possibly lead to a positive overcoming of the crisis. Elements which characterize the long-term policy of the right, namely, persistence in the direction of economic policies which have thus far gone bankrupt, refusal of a substantive dialogue with the working people and the imposition of one-sided measures for the benefit of large capital, are now yielding their results and leading to unprecedented confusion and impasse. As a result of this situation the working people are encountering two very acute problems: for the 2d year in succession, a reduction in their true incomes because the prices of basic essentials are increasing at a much higher rate than salaries and wages; and mass dismissals, more generally a reduction in employment, that is gradually causing a serious unemployment problem in our country. This deterioration in the working people's conditions makes the need for coordinating trade union organizations' struggles and developing a strong mass movement, aimed at the defense of workers' incomes and employment, imperative.

Based on the facts that the rise in inflation has already absorbed the increases which were granted through collective agreements and that real income has dropped since June, it is necessary to intensify the struggle for establishment of an automatic cost-of-living adjustment [of salaries and wages] and, at the same time, until this is implemented, to denounce the national collective work agreement and demand an increase in the monthly wages of the working people to make up for the income they are losing. At the same time, a fully detailed program is needed to deal with unemployment and underdevelopment and with the problem's basic elements: Protection of workers from dismissal, satisfactory unemployment benefits, a policy of investments to create new employment, professional training and adjustment, and participation of the workers themselves in administration, from the business level to the level of the national economy.

The farmers' struggle to protect the prices of their produce, to guarantee subsidies and income supports for small farms and problem areas and to find markets for exportable produce, at present a crisis area, is of vital significance for them. The vigorous activities of small and medium businessmen regarding problems which are becoming more acute due to the developing crisis stress the need for total confrontation of the problems of these classes in connection with the more general problem of overcoming the country's deteriorating economic crisis.

All these struggles must be linked to both a general and specialized program of struggle, social classes and levels, branches, economic sectors and other areas, against problems which the country's expected accession to the EEC will produce. In addition, all social problems, namely, housing, sewage, settlement and protection of the environment, are being further aggravated. The sewage crisis and the now regular appearance of smog in the capital, which are only part of the more general crisis in the sector of social infrastructure and of the more general danger to our people's lives due to the social policy of the New Democracy government, stress the need for finding and enforcing positive, immediate solutions and correct, long-term solutions through united popular action and mobilization of all responsible persons.

4. The policy and orientation which dominate our national life must change so that the country can emerge from the crisis and enter the road of democratic regrouping. In order to do this, however, the government of great bourgeois interests must change. The solution is to be found in a different policy of another government which will have a democratic, progressive nature. One party alone cannot bring about such a solution. Any persistence in such a direction, regardless of its starting point, exacerbates competition within the progressive-democratic camp and encourages the hopes of the right.

The change will be brought about and supported only by an alliance of social and political forces that will express its concern on the basis of a program-contract with the people. It will have to be an alliance capable of producing or supporting a government of the broadest democratic cooperation.

The political, mass involvement of the party and of all renewal forces, from the viewpoint of the interests of the working people and the logic of the change, is necessary in following such a direction so as to gather even broader popular forces, including the camp of the right, for seeking and enforcing positive solutions to every problem and, more generally, for finding democratic ways out of the crisis which will strengthen the peoples' role and crown popular struggles with conquests, thus defeating and isolating the policy of the right. Following the opposite direction of "the worse off [for New Democracy], the better," "all or nothing" or postponing solutions until after the elections, disorients and weakens popular action and involvement and offers serious opportunities for the most reactionary ranks of our national life and for foreigners to impose unpopular solutions and drag the popular movement into roads and traps that will ultimately serve their own aims. Although the objective conditions for such a course toward change have now matured, subjective prerequisites have not. The level of militant unity of workers' and popular forces and of cooperation among democratic forces is below the requirements dictated by the course for change.

The KKE (Interior) and all forces seeking such a course must work hard to create these prerequisites through daily struggle and overcome difficulties in a spirit of optimism about the possibility of such a course and without the delusions created by electoral concepts. Seen from this viewpoint, the program of a democratic outlet toward change aimed at opening the path toward socialism is more timely than ever; its promotion and constant renewal and enrichment through the development of popular struggle is imperative.

5. One way or another, this country has entered a long election period. Without being misguided by speculation concerning the date of the elections, which serves narrow party interests, the people must in any case be ready to cope with the possibility of premature elections. Assessing that the New Democracy government cannot solve the country's great problems and that for this reason it is necessary that the country acquire a government of the broadest democratic cooperation for change, the KKE (Interior) believes that in order to implement this goal it is important and urgent to attain the prerequisites which will allow genuine expression of the popular belief for change. These prerequisites are: election through the simple proportional system; voting rights for 18-year olds, emigrants and seamen; and complete democratization of ERT [Greek Radio and Television]. Democratic forces must mobilize themselves and a broader mass movement must be created for the fulfillment of the prerequisites needed for the elections. All parties of the democratic opposition must undertake their responsibilities toward this duty without equivocation. The KKE (Interior) and its organizations and all of renewal forces must work to link their lines with the masses of working people. At the same time, the party's activities must intensify so that it can be prepared for elections, whenever they are held, on the basis of the goals which the Central Committee set forth in its recent meeting.

TERRORISTS KILL UNION LEADER KEMAL TURKLER

TA221017 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 22 Jul 80

[Text] Kemal Turkler, the leader of Turkish Mine, Metal, Metal Works and Machine Industry Workers Union [MADEN-IS] affiliated with the Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions [DISK], was killed today by terrorists in Istanbul's Merter Quarter and his bodyguard Ali Bilgeser was seriously wounded.

According to information received by a TRT correspondent from officials and eyewitnesses, two persons fired shots from two different places at Turkler, MADEN-IS leader and former DISK leader, who left his house in Merter Quarter around 0940 and entered his car. Turkler was seriously wounded and died later on the way to a hospital. Ali Bilgeser, Turkler's bodyguard who was inside the car, license No 34H4871, was seriously wounded during the incident. The wounded bodyguard was taken to a hospital for treatment. The two murderers fled in a car after the incident. The car which was used by the murderers, licence No 35M5819, was found on Posta Street in Istanbul's Gungoren Quarter 15 minutes after the incident.

Martial Law Command Statement

TA221545 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 22 Jul 80

[Excerpt] The 1st Army and Istanbul Martial Law Command has issued a statement in connection with the murder of Kemal Turkler, Turkish mine, Metal, Metal Works and Machine Industry Workers leader. It says: Turkler was killed by a group of terrorists in front of his house in Merter at 0940 on 22 July 1980. It is obvious that this despicable act, like the other murders which have been committed so far, is part of a plot aiming at dragging the country into internal chaos. We are convinced that our common sensible people and all our workers who are sincerely loyal to the unity and integrity of the Turkish nation and country will not be taken in by any provocations, will assess the situation cautiously and calmly and will help the security forces in their measures to insure and maintain general security and public order.

Party, Unions Condemnation

TA221803 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 22 Jul 80

[Summary] "Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions [DISK] leader Abdullah Basturk has issued a message in connection with the killing of Kemal Turkler, the leader of the Turkish Mine, Metal, Metal Works and Machine Industry Workers Union [MADEN-IS] which is affiliated with DISK. In his message, Basturk expressed the profound grief of the Confederation. Denouncing the incident, Basturk said that the murder was committed by fascist murderers. Senate Acting President Mehmet Unaldi and Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel sent messages of condolences to Turkler's wife and to Basturk. RPP leader Bulent Ecevit called on MADEN-IS, DISK headquarters and the family of Turkler and expressed his condolences."

Speaking at the union's headquarters in Besiktas, Ecevit referred to the role played by Turkler in Turkish labor life and in establishing union traditions in Turkey. Ecevit said:

"Those who wish to destroy our state and our democracy are extending their bloodstained hands to all sectors of our community, to the most respectable persons of our society.

"The killing of a union leader such as Kemal Turkler is, no doubt, an open provocation. However, the way to render provocations ineffective is to ignore them. Expressing the belief that the workers will behave accordingly, Ecevit expressed the conviction that as a reaction, the workers will unite their force in order to insure that democracy prevails in Turkey despite all kinds of attacks and peace prevails within the framework of a democratic regime."

NSP leader Necmettin Erbakan, NAP leader Alpaslan Turkes, RPP leader Turhan Feyzioglu and Turkish Unity Party leader Mustafa Timisi have sent messages of condolences. The Turkish Confederation of Labor [TURK-IS] Executive Council has issued a statement deploring the killing of Turkler. Stating that one should not remain a mere spectator to incidents of terror, the statement said: What are those who have closed their ears to our national unity call waiting for, whose death are they waiting for? Are the leaders of the two big political parties going to unite after the Turkish state and our unity is destroyed? We expect them to adopt a serious stand on the issue.

The General Administrative Council of the Confederation of Nationalist Labor Unions, the leader of the Metal Products Industrialists Union and other organizations issued messages condemning the killing of Turkler.

DEMIREL ARRIVES IN ISTANBUL FOR ERIM FUNERAL

TA221210 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 22 Jul 80

[Text] Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel today said the state will eventually render terrorist gangs ineffective. In a statement at Istanbul's Yesilkoy Airport, Demirel, who arrived in Istanbul by air to attend the funeral of former Prime Minister Mihat Erim, said: We continue to be grieved. Our nation is greatly saddened. God will help our nation. The state will eventually render ineffective the terroist gangs, which are disturbing the nation's peace and tranquillity and the security of its life and property. The state is continuing its struggle. Our nation is on the side of the state.

OECD REACHES AGREEMENT ON RESCHEDULING TURKISH DEBTS

TA222028 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 22 Jul 80

[Text] In a meeting in Paris an agreement in principle has been reached in connection with rescheduling Turkey's debts to OECD member countries. In a statement to the TRT, Finance Minister Ismet Sezgin said that major debt group was deferred for 10 years with a grace period of 5 years. Sizgin added that an agreement was also reached regarding again deferring the debts which were postponed in 1978 and 1979. The amount of Turkish debts that are deferred is close to $3 billion.

BRIEFS

TRANSPORT AGREEMENT WITH SYRIA--A highway transportation agreement was initialed between Turkey and Syria today. The Foreign Ministry Information Directorate General announced that the agreement aims to route transportation from Turkey to Jordan and Saudi Arabia through Syria. According to the agreement, which bases the bilateral and transit goods transportation between Turkey and Syria ona quota system, a joint transportation committee was established between the two countries. The agreement also envisages the gradual decrease and eventual elimination of the tariffs levied on the transportation of goods between the two countries. LE MONDE ON EEC ENLARGEMENT ISSUES, SPANISH 'FRUSTRATION'

LD231505 Paris LE MONDE in French 23 Jul 80 pp 1, 22

[Philippe Lemaitre dispatch: "The Nine Call On Spain and Portugal To Be Patient"]

[Text] The Nine have called on the Spaniards not to cherish too many illusions on the possibility of conducting the negotiations leading to their membership in the Community very quickly.

That was the gist of the statement made on the EEC's behalf by Mr Gaston Thorn, Luxembourg foreign minister and current chairman of the EEC Council of Ministers, at a ministerial-level negotiation conference in Brussels on the evening of Monday, 21 July. The text of the statement had been previously agreed on by the Nine:

Brussels, (European Communities)--The process to pinpoint problems which was started in September 1979 and which, in keeping with Community practice, precedes the phase of active negotiations, has not been completed since two essential spheres, namely, agriculture and fishing, have not yet been tackled.

With regard to these spheres, the chairman's statement stresses that "establishing the Community's position requires major preparative work among the Nine which has already been started in the sphere of agriculture and soon will be in the fishing sphere." It was added that this work will have to be "carried out in detail."

Indeed the discussions among the Nine on the agriculture question have only just begun. In view of the scope of the problems, economic and budgetary, raised by Spain's membership in sectors such as olive oil, fruit and vegetables and wine, these discussions promise to be protracted.

In fact this debate is an integral part of the even-broader debate, which has scarcely been started, on the modifications to be made to the Common Agricultural Policy [CAP] and to the EEC's financial regulations. As Mr Giscard d'Estaing explained a few weeks ago, the Community, in view of circumstances, namely, the British problem, the exhaustion of the Community's own resources, the outdated nature of the CAP, must be reorganized before being expanded.

The radical change for which the Community is preparing is bound to interfere with negotiations on expansion. This also applies to the subjects already examined in the process of pinpointing problems; with regard to these problems the Nine admit that "further examination could prove necessary."

In short, the Nine are confirming their intention to go ahead but remain extremely cautious as to the course of the coming stages: "It is our firm intention to outline the solutions which the Community will propose to you in negotiations as this becomes possible."

Commenting on the joint stance presented in this way by the Nine, Pierre Bernard-Raymond, French secretary of state for foreign affairs, noted that this is an "admission that the French view is based on undisputable facts."

Calvo Sotelo, Spanish minister responsible for relations with the Community, did not properly speaking, give any reaction to Mr Thorn's statement. These ministerial conferences provide all parties with an opportunity to express their viewpoints on the progress being made in the negotiations but they are not followed by discussion. However, his own statement confirmed that Madrid's viewpoint is very different from that expressed by the Nine. The Spanish find it annoying that the agricultural question is not being tackled on the pretext that the Nine must first agree among themselves on a way of reorganizing Green Europe. "Only negotiations would make it possible to make a real assessment of the problems which our gradual integration into the CAP poses, more for Spain than for the Community." Pointing out that the negotiations must be viewed as a whole, Calvo Sotelo stressed that "this all-embracing approach would be seriously undermined if the outstanding questions were not tackled in the next few months." He warned the Nine against the frustration which the appearance of new obstacles could cause in Spain: "It is vital not to introduce into the negotiation process unknown quantities or doubts which are foreign to the discussion and which, by disturbing the normal course of negotiations, could spark off embarrassing accusations."

Finally, Calvo Sotelo noted that it is difficult for the Spanish to get things moving without having at least some indication of how long it will be before they are admitted to the Community: "Progress toward membership requires, particularly for the candidate country, discipline and a timetable like the one which has seemed reasonable and possible since negotiations opened--a timetable likely to encourage Spain's efforts to adapt to the Community."

The Nine will meet with the Portuguese this Tuesday and will say virtually the same to them as they have to the Spanish. However, this time the speech will contain a piece of good news for Lisbon: The Nine have agreed to grant Portugal "pre-membership financial aid. It will amount to around $50 million European currency units (Fr2 billion).

Finally the Nine foreign ministers have decided to send Greece a letter deploring the restrictions on imports from the Community recently introduced by Athens. These restrictions, which relate notably to automobile spare parts and whisky, have already had negative effects on the sales of member countries, particularly Italy. The Nine, who were not consulted, feel that they are particularly inappropriate coming a few months before Greece's entry into the Common Market, and insist that they be lifted, as the Greek authorities have promised, as from 1 October.

NATO CIRCLES SEE EARLY CONCLUSION OF SOVIET ARMAMENT PROGRAM

DW231002 Bonn DIE WELT in German 23 Jul 80 p 7

[Report by Brussels correspondent C. Graf Brockdorff]

[Text] NATO circles have disclosed why in the forthcoming discussion round with the Soviet Union on the limitation of nuclear armament in Europe the United States wants to concentrate on medium-range arms with a range of more than 1,000 kilometers: The development of Soviet SS-20 missile bases is so rapid, against all expectations, that one must reckon with a conclusion of this Soviet armament program by the end of 1981. It is therefore Washington's main aim to come to an agreement as quickly as possible on the limitation of medium-range arms.

Once the last SS-20 bases have been completed, which up to now had been expected by 1983, the Soviet Union will be in a position to unilaterally announce a halt in the development of this arms system. NATO experts expect such a Soviet step to take place. They believe that it would be aimed at increasing the pressure of public opinion in West Europe against the installment of the new NATO medium-range arms. The first new NATO medium-range arms out of the total of 572--with just one nuclear warhead for every missile--are to be deployed in the third quarter of 1983. That would be 1 and 1/2 years after the completion of the SS-20 program.

It has been learned in Brussels that Washington wants to achieve results in the talks as quickly as possible, particularly since this seems possible after Chancellor Schmidt's visit to Moscow. One does not believe that a result will be achieved which would completely render superfluous the implementation of the decision to close the arms gap. But the experts hope that "a lid could be put on the boiling pot," as they put it.

The NATO decision to close the arms gap states in this connection: "Every future limitation of American nuclear arms which are primarily scheduled for Europe must be accompanied by a corresponding limitation of Soviet nuclear arms." That sentence means the automatic implementation of the closing-the-arms-gap decision if no agreement is achieved between Washington and Moscow.

State and government chief Brezhnev, however, indicated through Federal Chancellor Schmidt that Moscow wants to negotiate on medium-range arms only under the prerequisite that simultaneous talks take place on the forward based American nuclear arms in Europe. These so-called forward based systems include, at least on the U.S. side, planes which are suitable for carrying nuclear bombs to their target in addition to their conventional function. The Soviets have a similar system of "forward based arms systems," involving planes as well as missiles with a range of 1,000 kilometers (Scaleboard SS-22). Just the definition of what must be considered as belonging to forward based arms is the "most complicated concept in the history of disarmament talks," as Deputy U.S. Secretary of State Christopher put it. Most NATO experts interested in a quick negotiation result with Moscow believe that an agreement on these problems will never be achieved or maybe only after 10 years. The Americans, therefore, do not want to plainly reject the inclusion of "forward based systems," but they want to postpone it into the distant future.

It caused surprise in Brussels that the German response to Brezhnev's suggestions of including the "forward based systems" has clearly been positive. That response supposedly came from political circles which have been interested so far in quick negotiations with Moscow on the limitation of nuclear armament rather than in NATO's decision to close the arms gap. Now it seems that these circles want to accept the complications formulated by Brezhnev. These contradictions are puzzling.

BELGIUM, ZAIRE PLAN NEW COOPERATION STRATEGY

LD231143 Brussels LE SOIR in French 17 Jul 80 p 3

[Unattributed report: "New Cooperation Strategy Between Belgium and Zaire"]

[Text] Belgian Foreign Minister Charles-Ferdinand Nothomb had a meeting on Monday with Zaire First State Commissioner Bo-Boliko Lokonga and his delegation.

The two ministers exchanged general views on Belgian-Zairian relations and stressed the continuity of practical and effective cooperation aimed at ensuring the Zairian population's well-being through the revival of economic activity in Zaire.

Development Cooperation Minister Mark Eyskens organized a working session at the Egmont Palace in Brussels with the Zairian delegation headed by Zairian First State Commissioner Bo-Boliko Lokonga and State Commissioner for Planning Bokona and attended by Zaire Ambassador to Belgium Inonga and by top officials of the AGCD [expansion unknown].

After analyzing the progress made on Belgian cooperation projects in Zaire, the Belgian minister and his Zairian colleagues reviewed the various problems in the rural development sphere.

On this occasion the two delegations were given a memorandum on the new rural development strategy in Zaire.

The main aim of this meeting was to draw up a work program for the implementation of an all-embracing plan concentrating on improving the Zairian population's living standards.

A Belgian-Zairian committee will be formed, composed of representatives of Zaire's planning office and agriculture department and the Belgian cooperation section in Kinshasa. It will have the job of listing all action now being taken in the private sector and at the government level.

This work will be completed by the end of September, when Mr Eyskens will invite his Zairian colleagues responsible for the planning, agriculture, economic affairs, tourism, environment, fishing and forestry departments to a roundtable conference in Brussels to draw up a plan of action for rural development.

At the end of the meeting with the Zairian first state commissioner Mr Eyskens said that the decision to make a fundamental review of cooperation with Zaire on rural development constitutes a new state in Belgian-Zairian relations.

Mr Eyskens stressed that in emphasizing the rural sector, Belgium's cooperation policy is fully in keeping with the new development strategy defined by the United Nations.

The minister plans to involve Belgian agricultural and social organizations in this new rural development policy. He also intends to contact the EEC Commission in order to increase coordination between Common Market aid to Zaire and Belgium's efforts.

ARAB LEAGUE'S CHEDLI KLIBI HOLDS PRESS CONFERENCE

ID231240 Hamburg DPA in German 1128 GMT 23 Jul 80

[Excerpts] Bonn--The European Community and Arab League are agreed on the need to resume their dialogue and want to hold a joint foreign ministers' conference before the end of this year. This was announced by the secretary general of the Arab League, Tunisian Chedli Klibi, speaking to journalists in Bonn today at the conclusion of 3 days of talks. Klibi further welcomed the EEC's growing involvement in the Middle East question and stressed that during the past years, the Federal Government has adopted an increasingly "progressive attitude" toward the Arab viewpoint.

The Arab politician said that he gained the impression in Bonn that the Federal Government is distancing itself more and more from the Camp David agreement on separate Israeli-Egyptian peace talks. Bonn, which welcomed this agreement as a first step toward a comprehensive peace settlement in the Middle East, is apparently coming to share to a growing extent the doubts of those opposing Camp David. Klibi noted that this agreement has not fulfilled existing expectations mainly because it has not led to Palestinian self-determination.

Klibi does not regard it as detrimental that the EEC foreign ministers decided the previous day in Brussels to refrain from submitting a draft resolution of their own at the present special UN General Assembly session on the Middle East. The secretary general, who during his visit to Bonn also had a meeting with the acting EEC Council chairman, Gaston Thorn, during a trip to Luxembourg, said that the EEC is preparing an initiative to be submitted "if the occasion arises and at an appropriate time."

Even if it is not possible to reach agreement in the UN on a new Middle East resolution, this does not mean confrontation between the Arabs and Europeans. According to Klibi, the key issue in any Middle East peace settlement remains the Palestinian's right to self-determination. In this respect, the recent Middle East statement by the EEC heads of state and government contains positive elements. Klibi said that it is not enough that the "organic link between the Palestinian people and PLO is only hinted at" in the statement. Furthermore, he regretted the lack of a clear statement on Arab rights in Jerusalem.

Klibi avoided answering the question of whether the Arab states would recognize Israel's right of existence in borders still to be laid down and whether they would demand a formal declaration of the invalidity of the Camp David agreements before fresh peace talks. With regard to the EEC's appeal for a renunciation of force, Klibi said that this is addressed premarily to Israel.

Spokesman Contradicts Remarks

ID231409 Hamburg DPA in German 1329 GMT 23 Jul 80

[Text] Bonn--The Federal Government assesses the chances that a joint European-Arab foreign ministers' conference will soon be held with considerably more reserve than Chedli Klibi, the secretary general of the Arab League. The Arab politician stated in Bonn today that this conference would more than likely take place before the end of the year. A Foreign Office spokesman later described it as precipitate to be already talking about a joint conference in this form. The discussion about it has not yet been concluded. With regard to Klibi's comment that Bonn is apparently distancing itself more and more from the Camp David agreement, the spokesman said that the talks with the Arab politician contained nothing to suggest this assessment.

The Federal Government adheres precisely to what was stated in Venice. The EEC statement on the Middle East recently adopted in Venice calls for the Palestinians' unrestricted right to self-determination. The Camp David agreement was not directly mentioned in this statement.

16 JUL CABINET SESSION, DISARMAMENT DISCUSSION REPORTED

DW241034 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 17 Jul 80 p 2

[Article signed Ckn.: "Schmidt Affirms Intention To Catch Up Regarding Armament and Readiness To Negotiate"]

[Text] Bonn, 16 July--Just prior to Chancellor Schmidt's departure on vacation this Thursday the federal cabinet on Wednesday once again dealt with the international situation. Schmidt commented on the success of the official visit by Giscard d'Estaing and what he felt was the positive course of the German-French consultations. In his report on the talks with Luxembourg Prime Minister Werner, the chancellor especially stressed that he had drawn attention to the importance of NATO's decision on closing the arms gap. On the preceding day the chancellor had affirmed to newsmen jointly with Werner his view that serious negotiations with the Soviet Union on a limitation of medium-range weapons will produce a positive result only if the West, pending the opening of and during the negotiations, leaves no doubt about the fact that it pursues the first half of the NATO decision, meaning the closure of the arms gap, just as earnestly as it does the second part, the offer to hold negotiations on a balanced limitation of nuclear weapons. During the cabinet meeting the British Government's decision on the modernization of the British nuclear potential was welcomed as a contribution to the military balance.

State Secretary in the Foreign Ministry Van Well reported to the cabinet on the exchange of opinions which Foreign Minister Genscher had had with U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Christopher Monday on the readiness to negotiate on medium-range weapons signalled by the Soviet Union. Boelling said Wednesday that the U.S. Government will hold preliminary talks with the Soviet Union. Christopher and Genscher had reached a congruent assessment of the next steps to be taken in that respect, he said.

Now that Bonn has conveyed to Washington the Soviet answer to the offer to negotiate contained in the NATO decision of last December on the medium-range weapons in Europe, the Americans as the actual interlocutors concerned seem to be taking the initiative in setting forth the Western negotiating strategy. On the very Monday when Christopher discussed the "next steps" in Bonn, U.S. Secretary of State Muskie received Soviet Ambassador Dobrynin in Washington. This was the second U.S.-Soviet contact within just a few days, Christopher having met with the Moscow diplomat prior to his European tour.

Before proceeding from Bonn to Brussels, where he informed the NATO council, Christopher, addressing journalists in Bonn, made it absolutely plain as to who will now talk with whom about the "extremely complicated matter" of the missiles. Christopher said he had informed Foreign Minister Genscher about his meeting with Ambassador Dobrynin. On that occasion the ambassador directly supplied the Soviet answer to the U.S. position on the question concerning arms control and to the December NATO decision. The position advanced by Dobrynin was the same as the one brought back by Chancellor Schmidt in his report on Moscow.

The State Department spokesman said, however, after Muskie's meeting with Dobrynin: "We have a more clear idea now than was the case before." He thought he had to stress that the direct contacts with the Soviet Union do not reflect mistrust concerning the information supplied by the German side. The United States wanted to learn more details from Moscow about the information supplied by the Germans, particularly since the NATO proposal was an American suggestion and because American-Soviet talks are involved.

The lack of clarity, which has repeatedly been criticized by the Bonn opposition lately, could not be substantially eliminated after Dobrynin's visit, which was followed the next day by an ambiguous article in the Soviet party paper PRAVDA. Christopher had only made vague statements on the announced initial talks with the Soviet Union. He said that among the steps to be taken in the weeks to come will be "work in our own government" and consultations within NATO with the aim of achieving some progress in the matter once the Soviet Union had dropped the prerequisites. With regard to a question about the American nuclear forward based systems, which the Soviet Union wants to include in the negotiations, Christopher said in Bonn that one should concentrate in the initial discussions on land-based medium-range missiles. This position was maintained last December in NATO by the United States and by the Federal Republic of Germany.

No time schedule exists yet regarding the thorough preparations and intense consultations with the Allies, which according to Christopher ought to precede the initial talks with the Soviets. As regards the American talks with the Belgian Governemnt, Schmidt had mentioned the publicly uttered concern over the hesitancy in Belgium and Holland. What was meant was the discussion of medium-range missiles in both countries.

Mertes, the development policy spokesman of the Union, referred on Wednesday in the press service of his party to a purposeful game by Moscow aimed at creating confusion. The recent PRAVDA article on disarmament and rearmament confirmed the CDU/CSU'S assessment of the results of Schmidt's talks. Soviet preparedness with regard to initial talks prior to the negotiations offered by the west on limiting land-based medium-range missiles in Europe, which Federal Chancellor Schmidt brought back home from Moscow as an allegedly great success, turns out to be a smokescreen intended to promote the central Soviet intention of calling into question the decision to close the arms gap, calling it into question in Germany and eventually preventing it.

Moscow's statement announcing its preparedness, which was spectacularly inflated by Schmidt who passed it on to America as a "high-ranking German messenger," was from Moscow's point of view an opening shot for a game of confusion in an impatient Western Europe and for an offensive against America. According to Mertes, the Union is asking the Federal Government to refrain from dressing up the Soviet divisive tactics, to stress in the election campaign the opposition's loyalty to security matters and not to accept playing the role of a "transport donkey" passing the buck of Soviet policy to the Western alliance.

Schwarz, spokesman for the SPD executive board, wrote in this connection that CDU Deputy Mertes' daily overfulfillment of his norm is characterized less by new ideas than by attempts to verbally downgrade the federal chancellor. After having produced the "Trojan Donkey," the "role of a transport donkey has now flowed from his creative pen.

GENSCHER VIEWS MOSCOW SUMMIT, EUROPE-U.S. TIES

LD231215 Lisbon DIARIO DE NOTICIAS in Portuguese 16 Jul 80 pp 3,4

[Unattributed interview with FRG Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher: "Greatest Possible Speed in Portugal's Entry into EEC"--date and place not given]

[Excerpt] DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: How do you analyze the talks in Moscow between Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Brezhnev?

Hans-Dietrich Genscher: We held these talks in Moscow based on the utmost prior agreement with the EC and NATO allies. Within this context, our explanations will not fail to have an influence on the Soviet leaders. I believe that it is beneficial at difficult times to explain our own stances. This is what we did. It is now time to constructively analyze and study the Soviet reaction to the West's proposal on the medium-range missiles.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Do you agree with the theory that the United States has surrendered leadership of Western policy with respect to the USSR and the Middle East to Europe and the FRG?

Hans-Dietrich Genscher: No.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: But some observers, even in the United States, have made this analysis. So do you believe that there is no prospect of building a Europe with the United States based on the strengthening of relations between Paris and Bonn?

Hans-Dietrich Genscher: The consolidation of relations among the European states is in the interest both of Europe and of the United States, because they both form part of the same free West.

This means that rapprochement among the European states does not occur to the United States' detriment but to the benefit of the entire West on the level of international policy.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: So you do not fear that the Soviets could benefit from the disagreements between the United States and the European countries?

Hans-Dietrich Genscher: If we proceeded from the principle that there was a disagreement between the United States and France and the FRG, the Soviet Union would profit from this. Fortunately such a conflict has not occurred, and this has constituted a benefit for the West.

DAIRIO DE NOTICIAS: What is the future for the Camp David agreements, following the initiation of dialogue between the PLO and West European countries?

Hans-Dietrich Genscher: There has been no recognition of the PLO. However, it is believed that the PLO will also have to take part in a solution to the negotiations for a just and lasting peace in the Middle East.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: And does the idea underlying the Camp David agreements remain valid after the adoption of this stance?

Hans-Dietrich Genscher: The U.S. secretary of state has asserted that this stance, adopted by the EC member states, does not adversely affect the efforts made by the United States in the Middle East. On this point I agree entirely with the U.S. secretary of state.

I can add that President as-Sadat has also received our attitude with satisfaction.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: How do you analyze current relations between the FRG and Brazil? Do you regard as positive the implementation of the agreement on nuclear energy signed 5 years ago?

Hans-Dietrich Genscher: Relations between the FRG and Brazil are very positive on the political level. We also greatly value the economic relations between our two countries.

We also regard the development of cooperation in the nuclear field as important.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: And what about relations between the FRG and the Portuguese-speaking African countries, such as Guinea, Angola and Mozambique? Could Portugal play an important role in the rapprochement between these countries and the EEC?

Hans-Dietrich Genscher: I believe that Portugal, in view of the good relations which it maintains with the countries which you mentioned, could in fact exercise a positive influence in the interest of those African states and of the EEC member states.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Do you regard Portugal as a politically stable country?

Hans-Dietrich Genscher: Yes, I believe that democracy is broadly based in this country.

We admire the democratization process and believe that it is the outcome of a successful policy conducted by your government.

DATES FOR SCHMIDT MEETINGS WITH GIEREK, HONECKER SUGGESTED

LD221658 Hamburg DPA in German 1627 GMT 22 Jul 80

[Text] Bonn--The dates for the meetings of Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt with Polish Communist Party leader Edward Gierek and SED General Secretary Erich Honecker have been roughly set. Although the precise dates for the separate talks have yet to be officially agreed, it was reliably learned from informed circles in Bonn today that Gierek will most likely meet the federal chancellor in Hamburg on 20 August.

According to [illegible] sources, about a week later--on 25 or 26 August--the long-planned meeting between Schmidt and Honecker is due to take place in a yet-undisclosed location in the GDR. Rostock has been mentioned as the venue for the talks, but it is not being clearly denied in Bonn following a proposal made by the GDR that the Baltic spa of Dierhagen be planned for the meeting. Dierhagen is about 50 kilometers northeast of Rostock.

PRESS DISCUSSES LABOR UNREST IN POLAND

DW211010 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 21 Jul 80

[Press review on unrest in Lublin, Poland]

[Text] NEUE OSNABRUECKER ZEITUNG writes: In Lublin, eastern Poland, everything is quiet again. The last people on strike have returned to their places of work. But this quiet has been achieved only through fear--fear of action by their big neighbor, the Soviet Union. The seriousness with which the Warsaw leadership assessed the situation can be gathered by its frank statement that developments in Poland could cause the "concern of our friends." This is a barely camouflaged hint at the strong pressure by the Soviet Union and other neighbors.

DIE WELT notes: In Lublin, Poland, an almost plain threat had to be uttered, namely that the powerful neighbor--the Soviet Union--could march in to end the strike that was paralyzing the whole city. Moreover economic concessions had to be made to the workers.

Since no mechanism exists in socialist countries to absorb and channel the annoyance of the people, as is usual in democratic countries, every strike is a mortal danger for the system. But the slow-burning match is glimmering not merely in Poland! The economic gear is grinding everywhere, from Romania to Czechoslovakia and even the Soviet Union. Supply difficulties exist everywhere and the Soviet model of the planned economy is reaching its limits. Poland is so far merely a particularly glaring example.

SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG asks: Can it contribute to calming down the situation for the Polish Communists' Politburo to warn the people by saying that the friends of Poland are worried? It is obviously the strongest trump card the party leadership can play in the dispute with the workers for a proper relationship between income and food prices. The Poles know their friends and they know why they are alarmed: Because "the Polish model" could find imitators in the Soviet Union and in the GDR. The Warsaw Politburo knows that just a reminder about the Poles' two neighbors will most probably make them realize their limits. The threat about their friends shows that Poland is in a precarious situation, to put it mildly.

RHEINISCHE POST of Duesseldorf states: Poland's problems have not changed since the fall of Gomulka in 1970. They have not been eliminated either by simultaneous appeals to tighten their belts and to work harder. The problems are those of a country that has been strained beyond the limit by enormous armament efforts, stepped-up industrialization, continuous agricultural difficulties and failure of the planned economy. Even Communist Party chief Gierek, despite his good intentions, is faced with the limits of the system.

NEUE RUHR-ZEITUNG of Essen writes: There are many reasons for the backwardness of the Pol Polish standard of living--historical and contemporary reasons--but the working people can no longer be calmed down with statistics. They appear to be informed and self-confident, recalling trade union-like means of fighting in a system where the trade unions are just a long arm of the party. The establishment of "workers committees" in Polish factories is a challenge to the communist system in all of Europe. The party knows it, and it fears that it could be overtaken by developments. FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU notes: The fact that a socialist country admits the existence of strikes is a political fact in itself. It is possible that the party sees a way out of the misery not in appeals to economize, but in open and honest discussion with the people. That would be a sign of hope.

JORDAN'S KING HUSAYN TO VISIT 30-31 JULY

LD221625 Hamburg DPA in German 1548 GMT 22 Jul 80

[Excerpt] Bonn--King Husayn of Jordan will pay an official visit to the Federal Republic on 30 and 31 July. It was learned today from Bonn government circles that he will meet Federal President Karl Carstens, Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher. Thevisit is taking place against the background of German endeavors to get the EC's European-Arab dialogue moving, especially on the Middle East question.

NICARAGUAN FOREIGN MINISTER DEFERS VISIT TO BONN

LD231547 Hamburg DPA in German 1501 GMT 23 Jul 80

[Excerpt] Bonn--Nicaraguan Foreign Minister Miguel d'Escoto Brockman will not pay his scheduled official visit to Bonn tomorrow. A Bonn Foreign Ministry spokesman said this afternoon that the ruling junta in Managua informed the Federal Government through the German Embassy that, regretfully, the foreign minister could not at present visit Germany because of the situation in Bolivia. At the request of the government of Nicaragua the visit is to take place at a later date still to be arranged.

BOLIVIAN ENVOY IN BONN DENIES REQUESTING ASYLUM

LD241053 Hamburg DPA in German 1032 GMT 24 Jul 80

[Summary] Bonn--Luis Alberto Alipaz Alcazar, the Bolivian ambassador in Bonn who resigned yesterday, contrary to reports circulating here has not asked for political asylum in the Federal Republic. The ambassador told DPA today that he will continue to carry out his duties following his resignation until the arrival of his successor. Further steps will depend on developments in Bolivia. He added that the future shaping of relations between Bolivia and the Federal Republic will also depend on the Federal Government's attitude.

CHAUFFEUR OF FRG ENVOY IN PRAGUE DEFECTS WITH FAMILY

LD230911 Hamburg DPA in German 0824 GMT 23 Jul 80

[Text] Weiden--The chauffeur of the FRG ambassador in Prague, Pawel Homolka, a 39-year old Czech, has defected to the Federal Republic with his wife, son, daughter and son-in-law. It was learned on Tuesday evening that the escape took place on 13 July. While his wife and children were able to travel officially to the Federal Republic as tourists, the diplomat's driver had to use an escape route through Hungary and Yugoslavia, it was learned in Weiden (Upper Palatinate) today. It is not clear by which route Homolka's son-in-law arrived in the Federal Republic.

PRC'S MILITARY PLANNING, REQUIREMENTS EXAMINED

[Adelbert Weinstein article: "China's Military Future"]

[Text] There is no such thing as a Beijing-Washington axis. Yet the Carter-Hua meeting has shown that both sides are pushing rapprochement. The foreign policy program of Republican presidential candidate Reagan, too, allows the conclusion that a change in the White House would not produce any changes in the Sino-U.S. relations. U.S. interest in China is obvious.

Kissinger had incorporated China in his balance policy because the presence of a third party in the tension field between East and West gains more options for the U.S. strategy. The purpose and objective of Chinese policy point in the same direction. Within the Washington-Moscow-Beijing triangle it is possible to act more flexibly than in arrogant isolation.

By turning to Washington the Chinese have not, however, merely assumed a partner role in world politics. They have dedicated themselves to a new strategic concept: defense of the northern border has replaced confrontation in the Pacific. The potential enemy is no longer the United States, and that even though, as far as the United States is concerned, the Asian coast remains the strategic opposite shore which Washington must safeguard. China's conceivable adversary is the Soviet Union. This change in fronts need not be a lasting one. Still, the exchange of one enemy image for another has resulted for the Chinese Government in power policy tasks which demand a new version of the armed forces mission.

The catchwords are: further development of the Mao-formulated thesis of the prolonged popular war; modernization of the ground forces and the air force; perfection of nuclear weapons. What might be regarded superficially as the demand for reform in some military fields is basically the compulsion to implement a revolution in military thought and practice. [paragraph continues]

Granted, for a long time to come the Chinese Army will be unable to fend off an attack by the Soviet Army with classical means. The material of the Chinese mechanized and armored troops is obsolete.

The potential adversary could be halted only in the Chinese interior by mobilized armed masses. People's militia, local defense forces, and old-fashioned active units would have to wage battles far in the rear areas of their own country using the terrain, weather and the natural wear and tear experienced by enemy armies. This form of warfare must now be adapted to the area-blanketing technically sophisticated weapons which the intruder would use.

The concept of a prolonged popular war contains a danger for the future of a China that wants to develop new industries. If one were to allow the enemy to run himself to death in the broad expanses of the interior in a "scorched earth" struggle, one's own industry would be suicidally destroyed. Therefore a powerful armored and mechanized army must be set up. It must be able to form concentrations and defend growing economic areas in far forward positions. This calls for a highly qualified corps of professional officers. At present, however, the army is burdened with political and administrative tasks. That curtails the ability to solve military tasks.

The Chinese must set up a modern army for other reasons, too, in addition to the armed forces of the People's Army because not merely the northern border must be safeguarded, the whole strategic forward area must be covered. A hint will suffice in this connection: Vietnam. For the Chinese the Vietnamese are the Cubans of the Far East. China can cope with every camouflaged form of political encirclement and military threat of war by proxy only if it has an army able to make a devastating first strike.

A "strategic fire brigade" must be kept ready for Another situation, namely, for "power projection" [term rendered in English]. The Angol-Saxons consider this the projection of military strength into political action. In the Korean war China initiated a great counteroffensive against the Americans when it considered its interests to be threatened. It would have liked to do the same against the Soviets in Afghanistan, but it did not have the decisive military instrument.

The eventual development of a navy that will be able to protect advanced bastions is also a part of China's plans. Naval routes in the area of the Chinese and Yellow Seas must also be safeguarded. It is uncertain how far the Americans will help to implement that mammoth program. But it is certain that the Soviets will not be able to hinder the Chinese from becoming stronger and stronger militarily.

China is a nuclear power. The nuclear armed forces have been well developed. They are not a match for the Soviet strategic nuclear strength, but they are mobile. They can launch a retaliatory strike even after a first Russian strike. Mao's formulation that nuclear arms are a paper tiger has been disproved by reality. Some Chinese present the thesis that the nuclear destruction of Moscow or Russian industrial areas would be more painful for the Soviets than the corresponding devastations and suffering would for the Chinese, numbering 1 billion people.

PAPER COMMENTS ON MBFR PROPOSAL, MISSILES

DW231036 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 23 Jul 80 p 3

[Ulrich Mackensen editorial: "High Time For Talks"]

[Text] At present the Soviet Union has made moves on several levels to get the disarmament discussion going again and to make some progress. Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt brought the news from Moscow that the Eastern side is now prepared to discuss reducing the nuclear potential on both sides in Europe. [paragraph continues]

Vadim Zagladin, the first deputy chief of the International Department of the CPSU Central Committee, explained how such talks could take place concretely according to Moscow's ideas. Then the Eastern delegation at the Vienna negotiations produced some proposals, suggesting the withdrawal of 20,000 Soviet and 13,000 U.S. soldiers from the central European reduction area--including Belgium, The Netherlands, Luxembourg, the GDR, Poland and the CSSR.

If one strips these suggestions of their propagandistic dressing, if one further considers the fact that it could be a maneuver to detract attention from the ongoing occupation of Afghanistan, and if one takes into account the summer stagnation, sufficient substance remains that is worth thinking about. First of all, there are now some cards on the table. Moscow is prepared to discuss medium-range arms in Europe (and to negotiate later on). That will involve their own missiles as well as those systems which, according to the NATO decision, are to be stationed in central Europe as of 1983 if negotiations are unproductive. The Soviet Union, however, wants to include the "forward-based systems" of the United States in Europe, such as, for example, F-111 nuclear bombers which so far have not been included in any negotations.

The aim of these far-reaching talks can only be the attempt to include, if possible, all nuclear arms on both sides in treaties to at least hinder uncontrolled proliferation. The West must be also interested in such talks because it is of vital importance, in the true sense of the word, to probe all possibilities of arms limitation where its own security interests are not neglected. In other words, as in the past the West should not reject the chance that might be contained in the Soviet offer.

Still, the Soviet Union should do something beyond its verbal offers to underscore the seriousness of its intentions: Even if one only reiterates the Soviet position which Zagladin has now formulated anew, Moscow proceeds from a current strategic parity in Europe. Even if this were true, however, the Soviet Union constantly changes this parity to its advantage by deploying new SS-20 medium-range missiles. It would definitely be in line with the logic of what the Soviets call strategic parity if they stopped the further introduction of SS-20 missiles now. NATO plans to, and can, build and position new medium-range weapons, namely, the cruise missiles and the Pershing-2 missiles (as a replacement for the Pershing-1) only from 1983 on. Until then, no new, dangerous situation will emerge for the Soviet Union (even if one followed Moscow's logic). By unilaterally withdrawing 20,000 soldiers and 1,000 tanks from the GDR, a withdrawal which is still in progress, the Soviet Union has indicated that it does not consider the power ratio in the conventional field unfavorable to itself. Why not a clear signal in missile armament as well?

Even if Moscow cannot make up its mind to give such a signal, the West should seriously consider the offer of talks--and it will do so, too. Just as in the case of the talks on strategic arms limitation (SALT) at the time, initial contacts can lead to a point where the weapons systems will be defined whose limitation will be the subject of negotiation later. This "definition phase" is extremely important for future negotiations whether it is possible to cover all nuclear weapons of all military varieties.

There is no room for excessive optimism, of course, because the question continues to be topical as to what course the Soviet Union will be steering in the post-Brezhnev era. On the other side of the Atlantic there is a haze as well. Should Ronald Reagan win the presidential elections in the United States we will learn whether he will go through with his election program announcements to sink the SALT II treaty with Moscow for good and to make the United States the number one military power again. Should he consistently pursue this course there would not be any negotiations and no arms limitation treaty but instead a new arms race of unimaginable dimensions. Then the Europeans would be facing the question of whether they can, and want to, go along with that.

PAPER WEIGHS PROS, CONS OF GERMAN NAVAL ENLARGEMENT

[Ernst-Otte Maetzke article: "Near and Remote Seas"]

[Text] The controversy has a definite pattern: A naval strategist, if necessary a naval lieutenant of the reserve like Lower Saxony Finance Minister Kiep most recently, draws attention to the fact that the most sensitive maritime regions as far as security is concerned lie far beyond the bounds of the North Atlantic pact's fleet--off the Cape, in the Gulf and in the Indian Ocean. His advice that the Federal Navy should also adapt and consider this boundary on the "Tropic of Cancer" nonexistent in case of hostilities and operate in the South Atlantic jointly with the alliance partners immediately meets with pious outrage and hand-wringing horror. Subsequently, depending on the courage of the convictions held by the one who triggers the dispute and by his political friends, what will then follow in a debate back and forth is concretizing, interpreting, denying or insisting.

Unfortunately, they do not ask which German ghost fleet is involved. At present the Federal Navy has exactly 17 ships with which it can venture out into the great Atlantic. Of these, 10 ships were part of the navy's initial equipment; they are ripe or overripe for decommissioning. They will be replaced by 1984 with six new frigates or--if all goes well--with eight frigates, provided there is more positive thinking next year about the additional two. Even borrowed destroyers, which the United States might let us have from its "mothballed" fleet, would not be of any help in getting out of this mathematical dilemma: They would have to be thoroughly modernized and, above all, fitted out with electronic equipment. This would require funds which if used for new ships would allow them to be built better and less expensively. The personnel requirement has not even been considered in this connection; modern warships need many specialists with extended service periods, each frigate alone 60 petty officers. Anyone who visualizes the Federal Navy, which is only 38,000 men strong, in the remote South Atlantic during the eighties harbors illusions which are not worth the paper to print them.

But is is indeed necessary to think about its future area of operation. One of the navy's boundaries which is much closer than the Tropic of Cancer is to be removed. Planning henceforth will ignore the 61st latitude in the Norwegian Sea. This is a realistic albeit rather high goal, because to date its mission has been to patrol the Baltic Sea exits. It has been performing this mission in a manner which presumably elicits the respect of the Warsaw Pact, with many, predominantly small, ships having good armament, with noiseless submarines and with plenty of combat planes--exactly in keeping, by the way, with the corresponding doctrines of Soviet Navy boss Gorshkov on how to cope with such a task.

If additional German ships and modern navy planes are now to protect a considerable part of the Norwegian Sea as well, the pullout of U.S. naval units could be coped with and the concentration of the Norwegian naval forces in the maritime areas further north could be made feasible. This would be an achievement which would benefit Western Europe's security. But it would be expensive. It would have to involve a sizeable additional financial contribution, that is to say, not a redistribution which would give the navy more ships and the army fewer tanks along the lines of "frigates instead of Leopards." Even for a Federal Government of the union parties it would be anything but easy to raise the required funds which that Federal Government, too, would prefer to spend on social programs than on security programs when the next landtag election are considered. "Children's bonus or frigates?"--how might that question be answered in Adenauer House [CDU headquarters]

The political effort that would have to be made would, however, be even greater than the financial effort. For the Federal Navy the exact opposite of the armed forces reduction would have to be done which is currently considered the ardently desired goal of a nearly undisputed combination of disarmament and security policies; negotiations on this are in progress in Vienna. Everywhere, in the West at any rate, the principle that armament jeopardizes peace is as valid as an axiom on which no doubt need be wasted. If the Federal Navy, including its air force, takes over the protection of part of the Norwegian Sea it must obviously be the first branch of the Bundeswehr to be reinforced, and not reduced.

We can look forward to a discussion about principles which is bound to be waged on the issue. Some people--we already know who they are--will go on to say as before that "armament" is an indecent word and that peace is all the safer the less one does for security. The others will argue in return that peace is safe only to the degree that there is mutual respect between two potential adversaries in war. The arguments of the former are easy, pleasant, cheap and seemingly "moral." In contrast, those of the latter are unpleasant, expensive and allegedly "evil," but it is not always the most comfortable pillows on which the people awake in good health.

WEU LIFTS RESTRICTIONS ON SIZE OF FRG WARSHIPS

LD221316 Hamburg DPA in German 1233 GMT 22 Jul 80

[Excerpt] Bonn--The Federal Republic can again build warships of any size. The permanent council of the Western European Union [WEU] has granted the Federal Government's application for the lifting of German's self-imposed restrictions on the construction of large warships laid down in the WEU treaty. This is not linked with any concrete plans to build such ships at the present time.

For Bonn the lifting of the naval restrictions is a measure that has long been due. The possibility that ships of this order can be built raises defense readiness and is in the interests of the further extension of equal arms cooperation within the Western alliance.

PUBLIC OPINION POLL ON OLYMPICS, ELECTION CANDIDATES

DW231126 [Editorial Report] The Cologne ARD Television Network in German at 1915 GMT on 22 July presents within the framework of its regular feature "Report" an account of a public opinion poll on current issues carried out by the Infas Polling Institute.

Moderator Ruediger Hoffmann notes that "the judgment of the people concerning the Olympic boycott more and more deviates from the official line of FRG boycott policy." The moderator says that "as many as 55 percent of the people interviewed consider German's Olympic boycott inappropriate, and a mere 39 percent consider it right, with the rest making no comment."

Hoffman goes on to report that the proportion of disapproval and approval was the exact opposite barely 3 months ago. At the time "more than 50 percent of the people interviewed endorsed th. boycott." But the nearer the Olympic games drew, the more "boycott-fatigued" the FRG citizens grew, and "the painful absence of German athletes and the threatening renunciation of the sensational Olympic television event promoted the call for a separation of sports from politics."

The moderator goes on to say that "62 percent now feel that politics plays too great a role in sports; only 25 percent believe that sports generally is independent from politics; and 51 percent consider it wrong for politics to play such a large role in sports."

According to Hoffmann, FRG citizens "generally accept" the Moscow visit made by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher despite the Olympic boycott. Some 67 percent believe Schmidt and Genscher represented "German" interests in Moscow well; 62 percent believe that "Western" interests were well represented; 48 percent consider it a contribution to detente; 21 percent think it has had an effect on the Afghanistan situation.

The criticism by CDU/CSU followers is relatively "mild": Only 24 percent consider it a violation of "German" interests; 23 percent think it was a violation of "Western" interests; about 50 percent think it was not a contribution to detente and 75 percent say that the visit has changed nothing about the Afghanistan situation.

Hoffmann says that the effect on the two candidates for chancellor and their sympathy curves is as follows:

Helmut Schmidt, whose popularity had been on the upswing since January, lost 3 points compared with May/June, scoring a total of 62.

Franz Josef Strauss, on a downward trend since January, gained 4 points compared with May/June, scoring a total of 25.

Asked about their election plans, 45 percent of federal citizens want to vote for the Union parties; 43 percent for the SPD; the Liberals maintained their position after the shock of the North Rhine-Westphalian elections with 8.5 percent; the share of the other parties is continuously decreasing and amounts to a mere 3.5 percent now now, says the moderator.

BRIEFS

GREEN PARTY RESIGNATIONS--Leading representatives of the Greens in Bremen, among them the house of delegates Deputies Delphine Brox and Olaf Dinne, as well as members of the land executive board Irmgard Laaf and Bernd Vogel, have resigned from the party following Schleswig Holstein farmer Baldur Springmann. This is the first time that Greens holding an official position have drawn conclusions from the controversy over ecological positions which occurred again at the Dortmund federal level party congress. A spokesman has said that another 30 members had followed the example of the Bremen party resignations. [Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 17 Jul 80 p 1 DW]

ROMANIA'S CEAUSESCU ARRIVES 23 JULY FOR 4-DAY VISIT

NC231505 Paris AFP in English 1501 GMT 23 Jul 80

[Text] Paris, July 23 (AFP)--Romanian President Nicolae Ceausescu arrived here today for a four-day official visit to France. He was welcomed by President Valery Giscard d'Estaing who greeted him as "a head of state who has played a major part in East-West rapprochement and cooperation."

Mr Giscard d'Estaing said that Mr Ceausescu's presence illustrated the utility of that policy and "the permanence of our dialogue"--a necessary one because "the world's situation demands that one meet, talk, and understand." France and Romania, he said were in a position to contribute to the necessary improvement of the international situation and to the defence of peace.

Mr Ceausescu replied that he had come to France hoping to broaden Franco-Romanian cooperation. "We are living," he said, "in a diversified world in full transformation. In the first part of this year we witnessed events that resulted in extreme tension in the international situation.

"The unfolding of those events demonstrate the necessity for a solution to problems on the basis of negotiations in the respect for the independence of each people and the right of each people to develop without external interference." He also expressed the conviction that Romania and France "can make an important contribution to European security and international entente."

Giscard Raises Afghan Question

LD240916 Paris Domestic Service in French 0600 GMT 24 Jul 80

[Text] France and Romania enjoy all the conditions for good relations. President Giscard d'Estaing, who welcomed the Romanian head of state in Paris, stressed the points which the two countries have in common, similarities illustrated by expressions like international detente and national independence, themes which were moreover picked up yesterday by the president during thedinner given in honor of Mr Ceausescu, when the Afghan question was mentioned:

[Begin Giscard recording] In order to restore confindence a political solution in Afghanistan must also be rapidly sought, as weapons will not be able to decide the future of the Afghan people. Such a political solution is not unrealistic, as Afghanistan has been able to live in peace with its neighbors since the beginning of the century without threatening anybody's security. Such a solution must include thecomplete withdrawal of foreign armed forces and the acceptance of the right of the Afghans to choose their own political regime and to return to its traditional line of nonalignment. It must be accompanied with the appropriate guarantees so that Afghanistan will not be used to threaten the security of neighboring states. [end recording]

LE MONDE Previews Ceausescu Interview

LD240925 Paris LE MONDE in French 24 Jul 80 p 7

[Unattributed report: "Romanian President Intends to Highlight Disarmament in Europe"]

[Text] Mr Ceausescu, Romanian head of state and Romanian Communist Party [RCP] general secretary, arrived in Paris this afternoon, Wednesday, 23 July, for a 4-day official visit. [paragraph continues]

He is accompanied by his wife Elena, a member of the RCP Political Executive Committee Permanent Bureau, first deputy primeminister and number two in the state according to protocol; Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Trade Minister Burtica, Foreign Minister Andrei and Industry and Machine Building Minister Avram.

In a television interview to be shown by French television Channel 3 on Friday, Mr Ceausescu, questioned on the current international crisis, said he thinks that the peak of tension has passed and that we are in a period of calm." However, he added, "the danger is still quite considerable. That is why, according to him, questions of military disengagement and disarmament in Europe must be highlighted because despite the fact that there are various zones of tension Europe remains the main area from which a new world war could break out."

With regard to Afghanistan, Mr Ceausescu said he thinks the essential thing is to "make every effort to attain a political solution based on an end to all foreign aid to the antigovernment forces and on the withdrawal of Soviet troops."

In addition Mr Ceausescu denounced the agitation stirred up over human rights in Romania by some circles which want the world to regress to the cold war period." These circles, according to him, "concentrate on minor aspects and not on the fundamental problems which have already been resolved in Romania and other socialist countries much better than in the Western capitalist countries."

SOVIET 'POLICE BRUTALITY' AGAINST JOURNALISTS PROTESTED

LD231446 Paris Domestic Service in French 1400 GMT 23 Jul 80

[Text] The French Embassy in Moscow has made an official protest to the Soviets about the police brutality which French journalists were subjected to in Red Square on Monday. The offense committed by these journalists was part of their work: trying to interview an Italian who had chained himself to a railing to protest against Soviet legislation against homosexuality. The French have asked for an explanation from the Russians.

L'HUMANITE CRITICIZES FRENCH MEDIA 'CENSORSHIP' ON OLYMPICS

[Rene Andrieu editorial: "Rearguard Battle"]

[Text] Tomorrow's opening of the Olympic games in Moscow represents a serious defeat for Carter, who hoped to prevent them from taking place, and for those such as the French Government who fell into step with him.

Hence stems their evident chagrin and their strateric withdrawal in other areas: In obvious obedience to the Elysee leader, the major media are doing their utmost to play down the event.

In fact the scale of the means being used in this campaign gives the lie to the idea that it seeks to impose. If the games were only of slight importance the whole crowd of court journalists would not have been mobilized to combat them.

They are not afraid, somewhat unwisely, of brandishing the banner of freedom of information against the Soviets at the very time when they are agreeing in France to act as the government's submissive servants in its rearguard battle to reduce news of the games to a minimum.

Thus Channel Two's management has announced that it will not be covering the opening ceremony on Saturday, without even the elementary courage to state its reasons. This is flagrant censorship of the event of the coming fortnight, an event which interests the entire world since athletes from 85 countries will be competing there. Everyone is aware of this, even if some people pretend to deny it.

Yesterday morning on Europe One Etienne Mougeotte echoed the previous day's assertions by Radio France by expressing rather comic--and rather belated--indignation at the fact that the Soviet press on 30 June and 4 July published only parts of the statements made by Chancellor Schmidt and the U.S. ambassador. On the other hand, he had nothing to say about the censorship exercised on French radio and television, for the simple and clear reason that he is actively involved in it. The Elysee's blinkered eyeglasses enable it to distinguish the minutest details across the Urals but prevent it from seeing what is happening in our own country.

It is strange to see the major media now discovering their vocation as defender of human rights against the Soviet Union. But what did they do in the past at the torrid time of the colonial wars? They found justifications for the slaughter and judged it natural to censor, seize and ban the Communist press. If anyone harbors the slightest doubt about this, one glance at the press of the time, whether spoken or written, will suffice to rid him of it. Then, as now, commentators took great care not to distress the government in the slightest.

From this viewpoint, it is entirely consistent that a number of figures "of various political leanings" are planning to demonstrate outside the Afghan Embassy at the time when the games are being opened. Whom do we find among these new crusaders? Representatives of the Socialist Party, the Rally for the Republic, the French Democratic Union and even a former member of the "New Order" fascist group. It is the reconstitution of the joint front of the losers of the colonial wars. Even then they all burned with the same love for the Muslims, as long as they were on their knees. As for the others, they turned their flamethrowers on them, as we know.

But this inglorious battle, this dishonorable fight will not prevent the Olympic games from opening in Moscow tomorrow.

CABINET DISCUSSES TERRORISM; STATEMENT ISSUED

LD231324 Paris Domestic Service in French 1100 GMT 23 Jul 80

[Excerpt] The Council of Ministers, meeting this morning at the Elysee, was to discuss this wave of terrorism. (Jean-Paul Bonami), I think the meeting is over. Was this subject in fact brought up by the ministers and by the president of the republic?

[(Bonami)] By Mr Giscard d'Estaing himself, in fact, in a statement that the press service has just distributed, the essence of which I will give you:

France must be and will continue to be, says the head of state, a country of asylum. That is to say that it will welcome those who, persecuted for their opinions or for their political actions in their own countries, hope to find the refuge of a peaceful life in France while respecting our laws.

On the other hand, it will not accept serving as a base for foreigners who seek to organize here and undertake actions of violence here. The necessary arrangements will be made to protect the national territory from them.

Mr Giscard d'Estaing adds: Public opinion and all those who are attached to the traditional values of the hospitality, generosity and freedom of our country must differentiate between what helps in the protection of those who are in exile and are persecuted and what is used to transport to other people's countries the methods of hatred which are contrary to the laws and beliefs of France.

ZAIRIAN FOREIGN MINISTER MEETS WITH GISCARD

[Text] Paris, 23 Jul (AZAP)--Citizen Nguza Karl-I-Bond, state commissioner for foreign affairs and international cooperation arrived in Paris from Brussels on Tuesday. Citizen Nguza was received shortly after his arrival at the Elysee where he delivered a message from Citizen Mobutu Sese, Seko, founder-president of the MPR [Popular Movement of the Revolution], to his French counterpart, Valery Giscard d'Estaing.

The state commissioner is to have talks this Wednesday with his French counterpart, Jean Francois-Poncet, before flying to London where he is to deliver a message from the MPR founder-president to British Prime Minister Mrs Thatcher. Citizen Nguza is then to have talks with his British counterpart, Lord Carrington.

LE MONDE VIEWS SANDINIST REVOLUTION ANNIVERSARY

LD231045 [Editorial Report] Paris LE MONDE in French on 20-21 July 1980 carries on pages 1 and 2 a 700-word Francis Pisani Managua dispatch reporting on the various leaders invited to attend the celebrations to mark the first anniversary of the Sandinist revolution in Nicaragua. Pisani cites the Nicaraguan newspaper LA PRENSA which expresses some criticism of the visit by Cuban President Fidel Castro, recalling that Castro's visit to Chile in 1971 "caused political difficulties for S. Allende's government." Pisani goes on to mention plans to show off the Nicaraguan Armed Forces' strength in the military parade on 19 July. Pisani adds: "As for the revolution's political line, it is clear to everybody that it will be socialist...eventually. 'All the political forces in the country understand this,' a leading Sandinist National Liberation Front member told us. 'Some,' he continued, 'are thinking of a superficial socialism, others of a schematic and rigid socialism but in the middle of all these different forces we are advocating a Sandinist socialism.'

"The concept is still vague. At present the front's national line stresses the revolution's popular and anti-imperialist character. For those interested, it states that it favors pluralism and respect for private property 'within the limits which political and economic events determine.'"

AKTUELT ON NEW WARSAW PACT VIEW OF BALTIC BOUNDARIES

LD231315 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 18 Jul 80 p 4-5

[Lennart Weber article: "Eastern Bloc Navy Comes Closer to Denmark"]

[Text] Eastern countries are busy encircling Denmark. The navies from Eastern bloc countries are using the Store Baelt, the Kattegat and the North Sea for their maneuvers to an ever-greater extent.

This fact, taken with the recent provocations against the Danish fleet, confirms NATO experts' theory that the Eastern bloc countries have enlarged their defensive area.

Ten years ago it was rare for Eastern bloc countries' naval vessels to go further than Bornholm and Ruegen. Today it is a daily occurrence for these warships to be close to the Danish coast.

There are many indications that the Warsaw Pact's view of the Baltic's boundary has been changed. Normally Bornholm and Ruegen are considered to be a natural boundary. But NATO experts claim that the Eastern bloc countries are now working with a completely new boundary for their defenses, namely, a boundary between Hanstholm and southern Norway.

There are several things that indicate that this view is correct.

When two Russian ships collided in the Store Baelt in December 1979 and four seamen died, the Soviet news agency wrote "that two Russian ships had collided in the Baltic."

Thus, in the Eastern bloc countries, internal Danish waters, the Store Baelt and the Kattegat are reckoned as part of the Baltic.

In addition the Baltic is no longer seen as isolated waters. There have been increasing numbers of naval maneuvers where Eastern bloc navies from the Baltic have taken part together with naval units from the Black Sea and from Murmansk in the Arctic Ocean.

Within the last few weeks there have been three episodes in Danish waters that confirm the theory of a new line in Eastern bloc defense thinking.

At the end of May three destroyers from the Soviet Union, the GDR and Poland, together with three supply ships from the Baltic, came up through the Store Baelt to Aalbaek Bay between Fredrikshavn and Skagen. In recent years this has been a favorite maneuver area for the Eastern bloc fleet. On 30 May five of the ships sailed out into the North Sea, while the supply ship from the GDR remained in Salbaek Bay. On 5 June the fleet returned and sailed to the Baltic. This was the first time the Warsaw Pact fleet from the Baltic took part in a maneuver in the North Sea together with naval units from the Soviet fleet in the Arctic Ocean.

On 26 June four submarines from the Baltic sailed to the Atlantic where they took part in a maneuver. They returned last week. It is the first time that four submarines from the Baltic together have taken part in an Eastern bloc maneuver in the Atlantic.

A couple of weeks ago a large landing exercise was completed on the Soviet Baltic coast. A large number of landing craft, naval vessels and merchant vessels built so that they can be used as landing craft took part in this exercise. Such exercises are carried out regularly. But in this exercise Soviet warships from the Black Sea and from Murmansk in the Arctic Ocean were observed taking part. These vessels sailed back through the Store Baelt last week.

Thus we have three episodes within the space of a few weeks that show something of the new pattern of maneuvers.

Danish defense forces have also noted an interesting detail in waters south of Lolland and Falster. When warships are on their way back to the Baltic they quite often start an "attack" on the Soviet Union.

The Warsaw Pact fleets "play" NATO vessels and attack the Soviet Union. "The NATO fleet" is then attacked by ships and planes from the GDR, Poland and the Soviet Union.

Normally the Eastern bloc fleet keeps to the international rules. They do not train in Danish waters and they do not embarrass the Danish fleet.

But within the space of only a few months there have been three episodes. Such events are completely new and are otherwise only known from encounters in the Mediterranean and the Indian Ocean between Western and Eastern fleets.

On 18 April the minesweeper Fyn was rammed by a Soviet naval vessel. The Danish ship suffered a dent and Denmark sent a protest to the Soviet Union.

On 8 July [as published] a home guard naval vessel from Kolding was rammed by an East German ship. Only evasive action kept the ship from being totally destroyed. After the collision the East German ship sailed off.

On 11 June the Danish fleet had to chase a Polish landing craft out of Danish waters. The frigate Peder Skram was in the Baltic at the beginning of June and at the weekend it docked in Roenne. The crew had noticed that a certain Polish ship had tailed Peder Skram very closely. And when the Danish ship sailed from Roenne on Monday morning it was again followed by the Polish vessel.

Later in the week the Peder Skram and other Danish vessels were on maneuvers north of Sjaelland. And it was here that it became necessary to chase the Polish spy ship out of Danish waters.

Naval Commodore J.F. Bork said: "I was on the voyage to Bornholm and saw for myself how the Polish ship followed the Peder Skram. Even then I had the feeling that the Polish ship had been assigned to follow us. So the Polish ship can hardly have been unaware that it violated international regulations when it sailed south of Hesseloe and therefore close to the north coast of Sjaelland."

"The Polish ship came from the Oeresund and we noticed it first when we were well inside Danish waters. We went after them to give them a warning that they were violating international regulations. The ship tried to make a run toward the Store Baelt, but we slowed them down and explained to them very clearly through loudhailers that they were violating Danish territorial waters and that they should clear out as quickly as possible."

HELSINKI REPORTS PURCHASE OF NEW MIG FIGHTERS

LD171452 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1040 GMT 17 Jul 80

[Excerpts] First an item on the new aircraft purchases by the Finnish Air Force. Six new MiG-21bis interceptor fighters were flown to the Kuopio airfield today. The new planes will gradually replace the MiG-21 fighters acquired in the 1960's. The modernization of the squadron is based on the proposal of the parliamentary defense review committee.

The MiG-21bis fighter is a more advanced version of the MiG-21F plane which has been in use in the Finnish Air Force for years. The new Mig-21bis interceptor fighters do not differ much in appearance from the MiG planes in use here. The new plane is, however, an all-weather fighter. It has better weaponry, fire control and radar equipment than its predecessors. The top speed of the MiG-21bis fighter is more than twice the speed of sound. It is stated by the air force staff that this aircraft totally fulfills the demands of the interception duties of the Finnish Air Force. Finland has bought a number of MiG-21bis interceptor fighters equalling one air fleet. The exact number has not been announced.

The Karelia wing is now obtaining modern aircraft. What, then, is the general state of air force security equipment? The air force staff states that the Draken air fleet in the Lapland wing is fully operative. The Satakunta wing in Pori is awaiting the modernization of its equipment. The parliamentary defense review committee has taken this need into account, but it has not yet been possible to allocate funds for it in the budget. The Saab-Safir training plane has been flown almost to the end of its capacity. The air force is awaiting the arrival of the new Vinka trainer planes, which are about 2 years behind schedule.

The British Hawk fighter will be the jet trainer aircraft. Deliveries will begin this year. Of the 50 Hawks, 46 will be built on license in Finland.

NORWAY

DEFENSE MINISTER ON RATIONALE FOR NATO STOCKPILING

LD231349 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 19 Jul 80 p 3

[Paal Nordenborg interview with Norwegian Defense Minister Thorvald Stoltenberg: "Stoltenberg on Contingency Stockpiling: Increases the Credibility of Our Defenses"-- date and place not given]

[Text] "The quality of Russian sea and air forces has improved. This means that they are able to cut off reinforcements to Norway in a crisis situation more quickly and over greater areas."

Defense Minister Thorvald Stoltenberg justifies the contingency stockpiling of equipment for allied forces with the above argument.

Stoltenberg is now back in Norway after a visit to the United States, where he had been invited by U.S. Defense Secretary Harold Brown. During the talks on contingency stockpiling no plans were discussed in detail, but he went through the work in progress in the Bruland committee with the American defense secretary.

Concrete negotiations with the Americans will only take place when the recommendations of the Bruland committee are presented in early 1981.

"Contingency stockpiling is a Norwegian initiative. The intention is to strengthen the credibility of our own defense strategy. Throughout the period since the last war this has been based on the idea that we will have reinforcements from outside in a crisis situation. We have had contingency stockpiling since the beginning of the sixties, in the form of aircraft parts, fuel and ammunition," Stoltenberg told ARBEIDERBLADET.

He maintained that Norway has worked for several years to arrange such earmarking with its allies. But only Canada has agreed to earmark a force of 4,000-5,000 men and to stockpile a very limited number of track-laying vehicles. The British have refused, while the United States now seems to be intent on earmarking and contingency stockpiling.

Stoltenberg can understand that there should have been a certain reluctance to agree to the Norwegian request. The majority of countries, of course, prefer to be free to deploy their forces in a crisis, he said.

He denied that the contingency stockpiling of military equipment now being discussed is the same as Norwegian rearmament.

"The first consideration is our own security, the possibilities we have of receiving help from outside in a crisis situation. The stockpiling of fuel, vehicles, guns and missiles, first and foremost for the defense of our airfields, can hardly be taken as a provocation," Stoltenberg said.

He stressed that nuclear arms are not being discussed in this connection.

Asked about the alternatives for the stationing of U.S. Marines which the budget office of the American Congress has worked out, Stoltenberg said that this was a study made by a consultant there, and does not represent official U.S. Government planning. Nor is there agreement within the U.S. Marine Corps on the alternative deployment plans for the corps that the budget office has drawn up.

This study proposes four alternative main tasks for the Marine Corps in the eighties, one of which is reinforcement of the northern flank. If this alternative is chosen, the United States will stockpile equipment for a Marine Corps brigade in Norway, for four brigades in Denmark and for one-third of a brigade in Iceland. Equipment for two-thirds of a brigade would be stockpiled onboard ships, according to a report on the four alternatives for the Marine Corps drawn up for the American Congress published in FORSVARETS FORUM [DEFENSE FORUM].

AFTENPOSTEN SEES SOVIET MBFR OFFER AS 'DIVERSIONARY TACTIC'

ID181153 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 14 Jul 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Soviet Diversion"]

[Text] It is clear that NATO must give serious consideration to all proposals from the Warsaw Pact countries. This also applies to the most recent proposal put forward in Vienna during the negotiations on mutual balanced force reductions in central Europe (the 6-year-old MBFR conference). The Soviet delegation has offered to withdraw 20,000 of its own soldiers on condition that the United States reduces its contingents by 13,000 men. This really does sound as if Moscow is blowing the trumpet of peace, and it is a sound to which various Western circles will gladly listen.

But in the world in which we live it is not only a question of giving serious treatment to all proposals that might possibly lead to detente; there is also the question of whether there are serious intentions behind such intitiatives. In other words: Do those in power in Moscow really want to reduce the two military blocs' troop concentrations on the European Continent? In our opinion it is very natural that NATO's experts, who are only too willing to show goodwill toward moves from the East which could make our part of the world a safer place, should have shown a somewhat skeptical initial reaction to Moscow's new plan for a reciprocal Soviet-American troop withdrawal. According to informed NATO sources, it is a fact that the Warsaw Pact nations have 150,000 more men under arms than the Western alliance. The Soviet proposal would not therefore weaken the Eastern bloc's numerical superiority, and it would not therefore "cost" the Soviet generals anything to operate with 20,000 fewer soldiers.

There are also other reasons why NATO shows a certain restraint in its reaction to Moscow's latest offer of withdrawal. It is not the first time that the Soviet Union has demonstrated its "desire for peace" in this way. In December last year President Leonid Brezhnev proclaimed that he was willing to recall 20,000 of his officers and men from East Germany. It is no military secret that the majority of these military units are still in the GDR.

Moscow recently announced that a whole Soviet division would be pulled out of Afghanistan. This would mean something over 10,000 men, no longer needed in a country which sees the Soviet forces as friends and defenders against imperialist enemies. No one can deny that Soviet soldiers have been withdrawn from Afghanistan, but it is just as clear that they have been replaced by others. The Soviet Union has not reduced its military forces in manpower terms in Afghanistan. What has happened is that the forces have been reorganized to be better able to fight against the Afghan resistance movement.

There is a great geographical distance between Vienna and Kabul, but in the foreign and military policy arenas the two capitals are merely extreme points in the game between East and West. Those in power in Moscow hope that what they offer as "peace-loving" measures in Vienna will make the rest of the world forget the war they are waging in Afghanistan. For this reason there is unfortunately no reason to assume that Moscow's latest offer of withdrawals is anything more than a diversionary tactic.

MINISTER ANNOUNCES LIFTING OF ARMS EMBARGO AGAINST CHILE

LD231015 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 23 Jul 80 p 5

[David Adamson report: "Britain Ends Arms Embargo on Chile After Sales Study"]

[Text] Britain lifted the arms embargo against Chile yesterday and the countries had returned to normal relations, said Mr Ridley, the minister responsible for Latin-American affairs.

He told the Commons that the decision had been taken after "careful consideration" following a review of defence sales to Chile.

The embargo was imposed by the Labour government in 1974 after reports of executions, torture and other violations of human rights by the military regime which succeeded the shot President Allende.

In the following year the British ambassador was withdrawn from Santiago in protest against the torture of Dr Sheila Cassidy.

Since the return of a Conservative government last year there has been a step by step return to normal relations.

In January both countries announced there would be an exchange of ambassadors and resumption of full diplomatic relations.

While the British Government does not claim that all violations of human rights have ceased in Chile, it is satisfied that there has been a considerable improvement. In any case the situation is certainly no worse than in some other countries where Britain does not exercise an arms embargo, such as Argentina.

Sales will still be subject to review and licensing which should ensure that equipment which could be used directly for internal repression will not be sold.

The timing of yesterday's announcement appears to be related to the release of the lastest unemployment figures. Trade--and thus employment in Britain--has suffered from the six-year hiatus in Anglo-Chile relations.

Britain was the traditional supplier for the Chilean Navy and a strong link was maintained through the Royal Navy, which trained Chilean officers. Although there is nothing in the pipeline the government hopes that orders for new warships will be placed with British yards.

DENKTAS CRITICIZES RECENT KIPRIANOU STATEMENT ON TALKS

TA231253 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 0900 GMT 23 Jul 80

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has called on UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim to take action regarding Greek Cypriot leader Kiprianou's attitude. Kenktas said that Waldheim should refer to Kiprianou's recent statement and ask Kiprianou whether or not he seriously wants to hold talks or agrees to the joint establishment of a federation and whether or not he will again bring up subjects that have already been settled through the population exchange program.

Replying to journalists' questions this morning, Denktas noted that Kiprianou rejected the agreement reached with Makarios and the agreement signed on 19 May based on the Makarios agreement, that he denied the population exchange and that he is relying on the illusion of the return of the refugees. Pointing out that Kiprianou does not want to solve the problem through negotiations, Denktas concluded: If Kiprianou's recent statement constitutes a basis, then it is really unnecessary to discuss the Cyprus problem under this [word indistinct]. It would be beneficial and even necessary to grant the Greek Cypriot community the opportunity to find a more realistic leader.

TURKISH TRADE MINISTER HOLDS DEPARTURE NEWS CONFERENCE

TA221522 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 22 Jul 80

[Text] The Turkish minister of commerce, Mr Basol, flew back to Ankara today at the end of a visit to the federated state. During his 5-day visit he signed a new trade protocol with the federated state and attended celebrations marking the 6th anniversary of the Turkish peace operation in Cyprus. Speaking at a news conference at Ercan State Airport, Mr Basol said he was happy to have observed that the Turkish Cypriot Community had made great strides toward establishing their own state. He said he had found the opportunity to make an on-the-spot study of the economic situation in the federated state and that he had seen that there had been a great development in the economy of the state. Referring to the new trade protocol, he said that the two sides had agreed on several ideas to improve the economy of the Turkish Cypriot community further. The minister of commerce and industry of the federated state, Mr Atasayan, also speaking at the news conference, said the talks in Nicosia with Mr Basol had proved that the aid provided by Turkey had not been in vain.

TURKISH CYPRIOT LEGISLATIVE DELEGATION RETURNS FROM TURKEY

TA221514 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 22 Jul 80

[Text] The Turkish Cypriot parliamentary delegation today returned to the federated state at the end of a visit to Turkey. In a statement at Ercan State Airport the leader of the delegation, Dr Semzi Kazim, the deputy president of the legislative assembly, said that they had discussed the economic and other problems of the Turkish Cypriot community in their talks with Acting President Mr Caglayangil, the prime minister, Mr Demirel, and other government officials as well as with leaders of the political parties. Dr Kazim added that they had expressed the hope that the leaders in Turkey would continue to keep the Cyprus problem above party politics.

RALLY PARTY REJECTS KIPRIANOU CALL FOR UNITY, DIALOGUE

NC230635 Nicosia CYPRUS MAIL in English 23 Jul 80 p 1

[Text] The rightwing opposition [Democratic] Rally Party of Mr Glavkos Kliridhis has rejected president Kiprianou's appeal for a dialogue to restore unity among the parties on the national issue. The party repeated its call for Mr Kiprianou to resign, accusing him of leading the country to "political and economic bankruptcy". A statement from the party says the president's call amounted to an invitation to submit to a "governing minority" in the name of an "ill-conceived unity".

There has been no statement from the AKEL Party, which has also expressed disagreement with the president's policies and withdrew its support from him, but the Rally statement seems to take AKEL's rejection of the president plea for unity as granted.

"We warn Mr Kiprianou that he should have no illusions about the attitude of the parties which disagreed with his policy and declared him an undeserving and impotent leader", the Rally statement said. However, the government spokesman rejected the Rally statement, saying it shows once again the "policy of distortion and systematic undermining of the unity of the people" followed by the Rally Party.

The spokesman said that President Kiprianou had actually covered all the points raised in the Rally statement and added that the people gathered at Elevtheria Square constituted a silencing answer.

The Rally Party statement covered four pages and essentially repeated the call for the resignation of the president. About Mr Kiprianou's hints as to responsibility for the abandonment of Famagusta town and its occupation by the Turkish troops in August 1974 whilst Mr Kliridhis was in charge, the Rally says this betrays "lack of sense about the realities not only of the present and the future but also of the recent past".

The Rally counters by saying that Mr Kiprianou and his family left the island with the start of the invasion and if he was in Cyprus he would have known that the people fled the town after the overpowering of the national guard by superior arms and after reports of savage acts by Turkish troops in the places occupied. The Rally claims that government pressure was used to gather the crowds at Elevtheria Sqaure on Monday night and accuses the Cyprus Broadcasting Corporation of showing the gathering yet refusing to show the gatherings organised by the other parties.

About the presence of the speaker of the Greek Parliament and Greek parliamentarians and Greek mayors, the Rally says that Mr Kiprianou is using "crutches from abroad". It also claims that Kiprianou's quotations from speeches of Makarios do not convince about his following the Makarios policy as laid down in minutes of the National Council.

In reply to Mr Kiprianou's statement that the parties may diverge on all issues except diverge on the national issue, the Rally declares: "We do not need Kiprianou's authority to disagree with the disastrous policy he follows on the national policy". Unity cannot be secured under a "minority leader" and the submission of the majority but through democratic elections for a majority-elected president, the Rally statement says.

However, the government spokesman denied charges of any use of illicit means for the Elevtheria Square gathering and said that the government's attitude about the gathering was the same as that followed on all previous occasions with the consent of the parties. "Methods such as those referred in some sections of the press have not been used this year nor were such methods used in previous years," the spokesman said.

WORKERS PROTEST KILLING OF TURKLER; SECURITY MEASURES URGED

TA231631 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 23 Jul 80

[Excerpts] Workers employed at the Ankara, Istanbul, Izmir and other municipalities and at other business premises have not reported to work to protest the killing of Kemal Turkler, the leader of the Turkish Mine, Metal, Metal Works and Machine Industry Workers Union. TRT correspondents report that bus and cleaning services were suspended and the various brances of private banks remained closed in various cities today.

The IV Army Corps and the Ankara Martial Law Command has issued a statement in connection with the action taken by workers. The statement recalls that occupation, de facto situations, work stoppages and slowdowns, not reporting to work in masse and similar actions in municipal offices are banned in accordance with a communique issued on 6 May 1980. The martial law command statement adds that in spite of this communique, workers did not report to work in masse in various Ankara municipal offices. The statement gives the workers notice to return to work by 1400 today. The statement further notes that if the workers do not report to work by that time, transportation services will be resumed with drivers from public institutions and that municipal drivers, workers employed in the cleaning services and other workers will be watched. Following the statement issued by the Ankara Martial Law Command, workers began reporting to work as of 1400. Workers in other cities also began to report to work in the afternoon.

Demirel Comments

TA231621 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 23 Jul 80

[Text] Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel has said that Turkey will combat anarchy and terror through legitimate channels, within legal grounds and through the legitimate forces of the state. Demirel was replying to reporters questions as he emerged from the JP joint group meeting today.

In reply to a question on his views regarding the action taken by unions affiliated with the Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions following the killing of the machine industry workers union leader Kemal Turkler, Demirel said: The killing of Turkler is a deplorable incident. I expressed my grief yesterday. This deplorable incident has grieved the whole nation. Strikes, work stoppages and similar actions decrease production is detrimental to the country, which makes it seem as though the whole nation is being punished. I do not believe it is right to implement such actions. In other words, I do not believe it is right to implement actions that will adversely affect the country and that might be considered punishment for the whole nation.

In reply to a question on whether he believes the dimensions of anarchy are changing with the killing of union leaders, Demirel said: Actually, I do not know that the term the dimensions of anarch means. However, the killing of a former prime ministers, a policeman, a citizen... They are all human beings. They are the children of this country. No one is less important than the other.

A journalist recalled the wish expressed by NSP leader Necmettin Erbakan for early elections unless certain problems are solved by 19 August. He then asked Demirel for his opinion on Erbakan's statement that the NSP would propose early elections if such a proposal was not submitted by the JP. Demirel replied: Let them not hesitate for a moment, let them submit it.

GRAND NATIONAL ASSEMBLY DEBATES ANARCHY, TERRORISM

TA231832 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1800 GMT 23 Jul 80

[Text] Anarchy and terrorism were discussed at the joint session of the Senate and the National Assembly today. A statement by the chairmanship council on terrorism and anarchy in the country was read at the joint session today which says that anarchy and terrorism have been going on in Turkey for over 10 years, and the dimensions and manifestations of this are causing more suffering with each passing day. They are aimed against the integrity of the Turkish Republic and the unity of the nation. Noting that remaining ineffective spectators in the face of the incidents might cause more painful incidents in the future, the statement adds that the members of the Turkish Grand National Assembly must accept their responsibilities now more than ever if the Grand National Assembly is not to go down in history as an institution which failed to perform its duties.

After the statement of the chairmanship council was read, various speakers expressed the views of their parties. Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel came to the rostrum after the party speeches were delivered and called for the ratification of the bills on the security courts, the state of emergency and the amendment of the martial law commanders' authorities. Noting that the Turkish Grand National Assembly should be united in ratifying these bills that will prevent bloodshed, Demirel said: If these bills are not ratified incidents cannot be stopped even if the JP and the RPP govern jointly.

POLICE DETAIN IRANIAN STUDENTS AT FOREIGN MINISTRY

NC240618 Istanbul GUNAYDIN in Turkish 23 Jul 80 p 1

[Text] Ankara, THA--Fifteen Iranian students who called at the Foreign Ministry yesterday afternoon have been detained by police. The Iranian students had called at the Foreign Ministry to put forward their demand for the return of the two Iranian officers who had sought asylum in Turkey some time ago. The students were detained by policemen, who were ordered to do so.

GOVERNMENT OFFICIAL SIGNS OECD AGREEMENT DEFERRING DEBTS

TA232036 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 23 Jul 80

[Text] An agreement on deferring Turkey's debts to OECD member countries has been signed in Paris. According to the agreement, 90 percent of Turkey's guaranteed debts amounting to some $3 billion have been deferred for 10 years with a grace period of 5 years. The cash payment of the remaining 10 percent will be made in equal installments within 5 years. According to information obtained by a TRT correspondent the agreement, which will be effective from 1 July, 1980, stipulates that all debts due within the next 3 years are deferred. The agreement also recognizes the possibility of holding talks at the end of the 3 years with the aim of deferring the payment of debts for another 2 years. According to the agreement the unpaid installments of Turkey's debts which were deferred in 1978 and 1979 are also deferred for 8 years with a grace period of 4 years.

Turgut Ozal, Prime Ministry under secretary and State Planning Organization deputy under secretary, who signed the agreement on agreement on behalf of Turkey, left France for Britain this evening. In London Ozal will hold talks in connection with deferring Turkey's debts to international commercial banks. Ozal, who will stay in Britain for 2 days, will then go to Italy to hold contacts on loans the Italian Government is expected to extend to Turkey.

BRUSSELS TO SUSPEND ARMS DELIVERIES TO BOLIVIA

LD241702 Brussels in French to Africa 1500 GMT 14 Jul 80

[Summary] The army is suppressing a miners' protest in Bolivia, and the United States plans to cut its economic aid to that country.

"In Brussels, Belgian Foreign Minister Charles-Ferdinand Nothomb has decided to suspend all arms deliveries to Bolivia. He issued a communique stating that he deplores any form of overthrowing a government by force and regrets the military coup even more in view of the fact that a democratization process was under way.

"The Belgian trade minister has decided to suspend indefinitely the signing of a 100 million Belgian franc state loan to Bolivia."

FOREIGN MINISTER EXPLAINS POLICY ON JERUSALEM EMBASSY

LD2402839 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 17 Jul 80 p 3

[Diplomatic correspondent report: "Arabs Request Embassy Closure Without Threats"]

[Excerpt] The Hague, 17 July--Last week the Arab countries asked Foreign Minister Van der Klaauw to close the Dutch Embassy in Jerusalem. The three ambassadors who made this request on their colleagues' behalf did not back up the request with any threats. There is no question of their intending to break off relations with the Netherlands.

Van der Klaauw explained the historical background to the Dutch diplomatic presence in Jerusalem to the Arab ambassadors. At the same time he pointed out the stance which the Dutch Government has always taken on the status of Jerusalem, in other words that it opposes any unilateral change in Jerusalem's status. This stance is in keeping with the stance adopted by the Nine, which was once again confirmed at the European summit in Venice last week. The de facto annexation of East Jerusalem by Israel is not recognized by the Netherlands or any other Western country.

The Arab countries presented their request to the Netherlands last week, before the Islamic conference in Amman last weekend demanded that all diplomatic missions be withdrawn from Jerusalem. Aside from the Netherlands, 12 countries, all from Latin America, have established their embassies in Jerusalem.

BOELLING INTERVIEWED ON BOLIVIA, GIEREK VISIT, GDR TRIP

DW242215 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 1010 GMT 23 Jul 80

[Heribert Schwan interview with Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling in Bonn--date not given--recorded]

[Excerpts] [Question] A cabinet meeting took place as usual today under the chairmanship of Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, since the chancellor is on vacation. Two topics in the foreign policy field may be of interest to our listeners. To begin with, the situation in Bolivia: In many Western countries Bolivian embassies have been occupied, including the one in Bonn, as news agencies have just reported. Did more than just expressions of displeasure over the putsch in Bolivia come up during the cabinet meeting today?

[Answer] The word displeasure just does not characterize the cabinet discussion which followed a situation report by State Secretary Van Well. As we said a few days ago the Federal Government is watching with great concern the situation which has developed after the forcible seizure of government power in Bolivia by the military. State Secretary Van Well reported to the cabinet a while ago that the five EC ambassadors accredited in La Paz called on the top-ranking official of the Interior Ministry and insisted that the bloodshed be halted as soon as possible. This goes to show that the EC ambassadors are making every effort to exert influence on the rulers there. Even the smallest contribution we can make toward ending the reign of violence is worth undertaking. We will reserve all further steps to our own discretion. At the moment the situation is unclear. But we have stated once again with all clarity that this is the second time within a year that the military has succeeded in smashing beginnings to a restoration of democracy. For some time developments did not look bad and seemed to indicate that it might be possible to lead Bolivia back to a working, liberal democracy.

[Question] In the event of developments such as those in Bolivia right now it is often the custom to recall the ambassador, at least for the purpose of reporting; a gesture which the EC states also practiced in the case of Iran. Has this been considered?

[Answer] I am sure that jointly with the other EC states and our Western allies, in particular the United States, we are considering the conclusions that must be drawn, if so warranted. At the moment, I repeat, the five EC ambassadors, including our ambassador, are trying to exert influence on the government in La Paz with a view to halting the violence. This does not mean, however, that this is the final step.

[Question] The Federal Government is not inclined to discontinue development aid to Bolivia, for example, at the moment?

[Answer] Well, negotiations on the government level were held last fall and during the first few months of this year. In principle DM30 million in capital aid and DM16 million in technical assistance were promised on that occasion. At the moment the situation is so unclear that we will remain reserved for the time being.

[Question] Did the Federal Cabinet also deal today with the chancellor's trip to the GDR, with the Schmidt-Honecker meeting, with the Chancellor's meetings with both Honecker and Gierek?

[Answer] There was no call for this. We are maintaining contacts with the People's Republic of Poland with regard to the visit by the first secretary, just as we are in contact with the GDR leadership. What is definite is that Mr Gierek's visit to the Federal Republic will take place in August. We may proceed from the assumption that the chancellor is GDR visit will take place at the end of August. Details are now being discussed with the GDR Government.

[Question] Some news agencies and newspapers reported today that the chancellor will meet Erich Honecker in Masdeburg on 28 August. Can you confirm the date?

[Answer] At the moment there is no definite agreement as to the date for the visit, but I was able to tell some interested newsmen in Bonn yesterday that it is realistic to talk in terms of the last 10 days in August. Besides, you probably will agree with me that the timing--whether the day of a trip is a Monday, a Wednesday or a Friday--is actually of secondary importance.

PAPERS DISCUSS KLIBI VISIT, CONFERENCE PROPOSAL

DW241240 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 24 Jul 80

[Press review on the European Community's Middle East initiative and visit by Arab League Secretary General Chedli Klibi]

[Text] FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG comments: The European Community is trying to bring some movement into the Middle Eastern problem, and the FRG holds a leading position in this respect. One hopes that the Federal Government will not burn its fingers or even worse in this connection. It could happen that the European Community's Middle East initiative which is being pursued so energetically by the Federal Government might complicate the situation in the Middle East even more. Just think of a hardening of the Israeli standpoint, or Palestinian demands becoming more and more far-reaching caused by European preparedness to talk to the foreign ministers of the Arab League.

RHEINPFALZ of Ludwigshafen stresses: The self-appointed role as mediator that the European Community wants to play in the continuation and the bringing to fruition of the Middle Eastern peace process produces a number of problems as was to be expected. Most Arab countries allegedly show stronger signs of readiness to compromise. But as before, the Arabs want to prompt the countries of the European Community to act with more toughness toward Israel. The Israelis are showing more and more disappointment with the European Community. Prime Minister Begin continues to refuse to have discussions with the European Community on the basis of the European Community's Middle East declaration. The Americans will see to it that the European Community, in carrying out its role as mediator, will not upset the continuation of negotiations on the basis of the Camp David agreements. Against this background the president of the European Community's Council, Luxembourg's Foreign Minister Gaston Thorn, is facing a most ticklish mission.

RUHR ZEITUNG of Essen argues: He who sits on a powder keg must try to help put out the fuse. This is exactly what the European Community is doing in the Middle East conflict. The planned missions of the Council's president at the United Nations and in other involved states demonstrate that Europe does not want to give in. The solution of the continuing problem, involving not only the fate of Israel and the Palestinians but also world peace, cannot tolerate postponement. The starting position is obvious: There will be no solution without the PLO. There will be no peace if Israel does not withdraw from the conquered areas, and there cannot be a solution without safeguarding Israel's right to exist.

BADISCHE ZEITUNG of Freiburg comments on the same issue: The aftereffects of the appearance of the secretary general of the Arab League in Bonn were embarrassing. The Federal Government and its guest assessed the subject that was discussed so differently that the chancellor's spokesman felt impelled to make a quick correction so as not to aggravate German-Israeli and German-American relations. He said that Bonn still adheres to a positive assessment of the Middle Eastern peace agreements of Camp David. The impression that the Federal Government has now formed a different opinion was obviously justified by Secretary General Klibi with a view to the zeal demonstrated by the Germans as well as their European Community partners with regard to their PLO contacts. This example demonstrates that the European Community has moved onto slippery ground with its Middle Eastern initiative, says BADISCHE ZEITUNG.

NEUE OSNABRUECKER ZEITUNG states: The Foreign Ministry statement that the Federal Government is acting "exactly in line with the Venice statement," was tantamount to a correction of Klibi's statements. It was urgently necessary to avoid dangerous misunderstandings. The Federal Republic may neither be the main initiator of a European-Arab conference of ministers, nor may the impression be created that it has in the meantime taken a critical view of the Israeli-Egyptian agreement of Camp David. Bonn was acting correctly by showing a reserved and skeptical attitude regarding the project of a foreign ministers' conference between the Arab League and the European Community. That suggestion is as spectacular as it is risky.

RHEINISCHE POST of Duesseldorf notes: Klibi's statement that prior to the end of this year a foreign ministers' conference of the Arab League and the European Community will take place contains as many dangers as his obvious impression that the Federal Government is maintaining more and more distance with regard to the Camp David peace agreement between Egypt and Israel. A foreign ministers' conference between the Arab League and the European Community would have the following consequence for Bonn: Genscher would sit at one table with the foreign policy spokesman of the PLO, which is not recognized by the Federal Republic. That would be tantamount to a recognition of that organization. Bonn does not want that. The political dialogue between the League and the European Community would make sense only if it were to complement the current efforts of the Americans, Egyptians and Israelis--and not if it were to replace them.

COMMENTATOR SEES DIFFICULTIES IN INCLUDING FBS IN TALKS

[Wolfram von Raven editorial: "Including Kamikaze Fliers"]

[Text] How and when will one succeed in bringing about reasonable negotiations on an American-Soviet balance in the field of medium-range arms? The euphoria which seemed to have come about after Schmidt's talks with Brezhnev was soon replaced by soberness. Not merely the experts but also the public have clearly realized that the Soviets define the subject of possible agreements completely differently than the Americans; the Europeans can therefore hardly expect useful results within the forseeable future.

Those who can recognize the words' meaning underlying their propagandistic camouflage must clearly draw such conclusions from the interview Vadim Zagladin gave to Radio Luxembourg. The man who has been acting for quite some time as an official interpreter of the Kremlin's nuclear policy, so to speak, clearly stated that Moscow "wants to include in the negotiations all kinds of U.S. nuclear amrs stationed on our continent." Together with the statement that the present situation is based on a balance of forces between West and East, he thus confirmed the apprehension that the USSR is interpreting the American term "forward based systems" (FBS) in a considerably more far reaching way than NATO believes.

In order to demonstrate what danger this could contain, one ought to bear in mind that the NATO initiative was first aimed merely at a limitation of ground-based medium-range arms, meaning the Soviet SS-4, SS-5 and SS-20 missiles as well as the American missiles of the Pershing-2-XR type and the Tomahawk, a moderate number of which are scheduled to be stationed in Europe as of 1983. The West wanted this first step toward an agreement with the East to be followed by a second step toward an agreement on limiting naval and air-based arms of this category, including the Soviet Backfire bombers and the American F-111 bombers. Arms limitation in the intercontinental strategic field, which was considered more or less settled by the SALT II arrangement between the United States and the USSR, was supposed to be followed by arms limitation in the continental strategic field, which NATO did not necessarily want to link immediately with the SALT II arrangement.

But as was actually to be expected from the very beginning, the antagonist had a contrasting concept. Moscow wants to immediately also include the forward based systems in the negotiations. In this way the problem of overall nuclear arms capabilities was to be taken care of at the same time. A precise definition of FBS has always been lacking. The Soviets tried to include such capacities in the American long-range weapons potential in the previous SALT negotiations, although in vain. Now they seem to have in mind including American short-range weapons in the European region which can reach Soviet border areas from their places of deployment. According to Western ideas, however, only planes at bases in Turkey and on carriers in the Mediterranean count here--if at all--although doubts have arisen in the meantime as to whether they would be able to achieve anything against the adversary's defenses. But now it has become obvious that the Eastern side includes all planes in its calculations, including those whose range would indicate kamikaze missions (no return).

That would produce a distorted "balance" because the Soviets want to keep their short-range arms out of this calculation. This dilemma unfortunately has a historical reason, in which connection NATO is not free of guilt either.

The withdrawal of American medium-range arms from European territory which took place in connection with the Cuban crisis created an imbalanced situation vis-a-vis the Soviet adversary. The Soviets like to state today that they withdrew all their missiles from Cuba at that time, while the U.S. missiles in Europe still threaten the USSR and have short warning times. This is a misunderstanding, to put it mildly. The Soviet missiles in Cuba served Moscow's strategic calculations; Cuba was not threatened by U.S. missiles. Europe, however, is threatened by Soviet missiles, so that it needs its own, since the Germans do not have any missiles and are not supposed to have any, they must be stationed by the Americans.

The imbalance was not obvious because it was made to look like a balance due to the inclusion of some long-range and some short-range arms. In connection with SALT, the United States negotiated with the Soviet Union only on the parity the two world powers had with regard to sufficient "second strike" retaliation.

Had the Americans started out from the alliance as a whole and as a community with regard to danger and security, they would have to negotiate with the Soviets simultaneously on long and medium-range arms, thus being able to add up to their original superiority with regard to the first and their inferiority with regard to the latter. The trump card was lost in the past thus bringing about the present imbalanced situation. It makes negotiations on settling multinational security demands of the alliance almost hopeless at the moment. Only if NATO is persistent in closing the arms gap can it hope to be able to change the situation so that negotiations might possibly become hopeful.

ROMANIAN PRESIDENT CEAUSESCU CONTINUES PARIS VISIT

'Similar Approach' on Afghanistan

LD250929 Paris LE MONDE in French 25 July 80 p 6

[Unattributed report: "Ceausescu and Giscard d'Estaing Note 'Similar Approach' Over Afghanistan"]

[Text] The first one-on-one meeting between Mr Ceausescu and Mr Giscard d'Estaing was held on Wednesday afternoon "in a very cordial atmosphere," Elysee spokesman Jacques Blot indicated. The talks consisted of a "very detailed" examination of the international situation and related to East-West relations and Afghanistan. The president of the republic noted that the two countries had a "similar approach" to these questions. According to Mr Blot, the second meeting on Thursday will be devoted to continuing this examination and the third meeting on Friday to bilateral relations.

During the banquet he gave in his guest's honor on Wednesday evening Mr Giscard d'Estaing said in particular on the Afghanistan question: "To restore confidence a political solution must be quickly sought as weapons will not be able to decide the Afghan people's furure....Such a solution is not unrealistic. It must include the complete withdrawal of foreign armed forces and acceptance of the Afghans' right to choose their own political regime and to resume a policy of nonalignment. It must be accompanied by the appropriate guarantees to ensure that Afghanistan cannot be used to threaten neighboring states' security." In addition Mr Giscard d'Estaing said he hopes that the Madrid meeting in November which will continue the 1975 Helsinki all-European conference will not be "a superficial meeting in which each side sticks to its positions, locked in distrust." "It must be an opportunity," he continued, "to make an authentic assessment of our action to promote the development of cooperation among European states and peoples, to strengthen their security and put forward new positions. This is what France will do, notably with regard to promoting disarmament in Europe in keeping with a mandate which will include specific aims."

In his reply Mr Ceausescu asked that "every effort be made to achieve a political settlement" in Afghanistan. "This settlement," he said, "must be able to end all external support for the antigovernment forces and, at the same time, bring about the withdrawal of all Soviet military units from Afghanistan."

The Romanian head of state welcomed the fact that a "large number of peoples and states," in the "particularly dangerous" situation the world has faced recently, "did not allow themselves to be drawn into extreme actions which would increase tension and refused military bases, not wanting to become a tool of the superpowers' policy."

Referring to the NATO decision on Euromissiles, Mr Ceausescu said: "Any new deployment of nuclear weapons in Europe is bound to aggravate the situation." According to him, negotiations are "vital" to "prevent the deployment or development of new nuclear missiles." Finally, the Romanian president welcomed the fact that it has been possible to double trade between the two countries 1 year earlier than expected.

Importance of 'United Europe'

NC241313 Paris AFP in English 1251 GMT 24 Jul 80

[Text] Paris, July 24, (AFP)--Romanian President Nicolae Ceausescu today stressed the importance of a united Europe to avoid what he called "the domination of certain countries over others" during a reception at the Paris City Hall.

Mr Ceausescu, who arrived here yesterday, made his statements after a morning meeting at his residence with the French National Executives' Committee (CNPF), during which he discussed the possibility that Romania would buy French nuclear power stations. Romania is still open to proposals from other countries, he added, and is also interested in French computer technology.

During the reception at the city hall, hosted by Paris Mayor Jacques Chirac, Mr. Ceausescu also called for closer ties with France, saying "only a united Europe can guarantee lasting detente and peace in the entire world. France and Romania should do more in the direction of that unity."

It is important "to act not in the sense of division of Europe," he added, "but in the sense of its unity, while respecting the political and social regime of each country."

Mr. Ceausescu had harsh words both for the countries he accused of "domination," which he did not name, and for "the division and continuation of spheres of influence."

"The deployment of new nuclear rockets in Europe...could destroy the continent, West and East," he added, while stressing the importance of disarmament conferences. "Nobody has yet invented a weapon that differentiates between people."

Mr. Chirac, the head of the Gaullist Assembly for the Republic (RPR) Party which is part of the government coalition, noted the late President Charles de Gaulle's efforts to strengthen links of friendship between the two countries, and mentioned their shared cultural traditions.

Mr. Ceausescu and his wife lunched with French Prime Minister Raymond Barre. He was to have a second meeting with President Valery Giscard d'Estaing later today.

Review of Relations

PARLIAMENTARIANS REPORT ON VISIT TO WEST BANK, ISRAEL

ID230959 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 14 Jul 80 p 4

[Unattributed report: "The Situation on the West Bank Is Unbearable for the Palestinians"]

[Text] "The Israeli military and administrative presence on the West Bank has become unbearable for the Palestinians in the occupied territories," three French deputies stated on their return to Paris Friday night from an information visit to Israel and occupied Arab territories.

Following outrages against West Bank mayors, Communist Deputy Antoine Porcu, Socialist Deputy Jean-Yves le Drian and French Democratic Union Deputy Jacques Richaume explained, "We decided to visit the places concerned to make inquiries." They made it clear that they were given no mandate by their groups to carry out such a mission. Mr le Drian and Mr Richaume added that they travelled unofficially and that "they would later try to share their impressions with members of their political organizations."

The joint communique adopted by the three deputies at the end of their visit emphasizes that, as a result of "the continuation of a policy of settlements on the West Bank, the nature of the Israeli military presence is becoming increasingly colonialist. To achieve definitive peace," it adds, "it will be necessary to ensure a complete withdrawal of Israeli troops from the occupied territories; nor will it be possible to initiate any peace process unless the Palestinians' right to a state is recognized and unless the PLO participates in such a process."

The delegation, whose presence in Israel had a great effect and whose activities have been widely reported, was present at sessions of the Supreme Court which was asked to give a decision on the future of three Palestinian personalities expelled from the West Bank. It had talks with representatives of all parties represented in the Knesset.

In the occupied territories, the delegation met many elected Palestinian leaders and representatives of the main professional organizations. The meeting with Bassam ash-Shak'ah, mayor of Nabulus, was especially moving, the deputies emphasized. "We stayed with him all day, during which we witnessed a continuous procession of Nabulus residents coming to pay him tribute." Bassam ash-Shak'ah was the victim of an outrage and had both his legs amputated as a result. He told the delegation that he intends to travel to France, where he will conclude his convalescence.

As far as the situation on the West Bank is concerned, Antoine Porcu confirmed that it remained dramatic. Military barriers have been erected on all roads. At the Abraham Mosque in Hebron, one of Islam's holy places, armed Israeli soldiers are encamped day and night. Three-fourths of the mosque has been turned into a synagogue and people are systematically searched at the entrance. Soldiers are present even in places where prayers are said. As for Mr Jean-Yves le Drian, he recalled that what is now in question is the right of the Palestinians, not Israel's existence. "Israel is not being threatened at present. This has been proved to us by facts."

The three deputies emphasized that the Palestinians are awaiting some initiative by France and that they have been deeply disappointed by the absence of any concrete results from Mr Giscard d'Estaing's speeches and by the vagueness of the Venice summit statement.

DIFFERING EUROPEAN, U.S. VIEWS ON ARMS TALKS FORESEEN

LD241029 Paris LE MONDE in French 19 Jul 80 pp 1, 4

[Michel Tatu article: "The Complexities of 'SALT 2.5'"]

[Text] "It really is a daunting task," U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Warren Christopher said as he left an Atlantic Council meeting this week. "The question of what forward based systems constitute is one of the most perplexing in the whole history of arms control." This question is, furthermore, only one section of the voluminous file which the experts will have to examine before opening the "Eurostrategic" negotiations for which the concessions made by the USSR to Mr Schmidt at the beginning of this month have paved the way.

First let us recall the main stages in the current discussion. On 6 October 1979, when NATO was preparing to make the decision to deploy new U.S. missiles in Europe, Mr Brezhnev announced in a speech in East Berlin: "We are prepared to reduce the present number of nuclear missiles deployed in the western part of the Soviet Union. However, this will, of course, only be done if no additional such missiles are deployed in Western Europe." The Soviet leader did not propose specific preliminary negotiations on this point, but he alluded to the SALT III negotiations which Moscow "is prepared to open as soon as the SALT II treaty comes into force." He agreed to discuss, "in these preliminary negotiations," limitation of all armaments--"not only intercontinental weapons but all other types, taking all factors involved into account and strictly observing the principle of equal security for the two sides."

This approach did not prevent the West from going ahead with its decision. In its eyes the SS-20 missile, which adds one new nuclear missile every 2 days to the Soviet arsenal targeted on Europe, must be countered by new means.

However, at the same time, the Western countries proposed negotiations on 12 December. These negotiations must be "bilateral within the framework of SALT III," relate to "certain U.S. and Soviet long-range theater nuclear weapons systems," and finally have the "short-term objective" of reaching agreements on the limitation "of U.S. and Soviet ground-based long-range theater nuclear missile systems." In other words the discussion must be limited and produce an even more limited initial agreement, since it would only relate to ground missiles. Curiously enough, the Soviet Backfire bomber, which the Americans strove to include in SALT II, no longer seems to interest them although it is, by definition, a "theater" weapon. (Note: Mr Christopher nonetheless indicated in Brussels on 15 July that the United States will try to obtain a limitation on the Backfire" in the initial discussions" to be opened with Moscow. However, according to him a Soviet concession in this connection "does not necessarily imply" a reciprocal concession by the Americans on another weapon system.)

In this connection, the invasion of Afghanistan dealt a fatal blow to the SALT II treaty and the Soviets, furious at NATO's decision on the Euromissiles, stated that "the basis for negotiation has been destroyed." That is a difficult position to maintain (you cannot reject the very principle of discussion for long) and Moscow finally agreed--keeping the good news for Mr Schmidt--to lift its "precondition": Preliminary negotiations can take place before SALT II is ratified on the understanding that any agreement will only be enforceable when SALT II has come into force. However, as an article in PRAVDA on 15 July demonstrated, the Kremlin is nonetheless placing very definite limits on its concessions.

The Soviet stance is flexible with regard to the form they take: Negotiations can take place within the framework of SALT III, in other words relate to all nuclear weapons including the central systems. They can also have a more limited object: very limited if the West abandons last December's decision on the U.S. missiles (in this case a reduction of Soviet medium-range missiles will be negotiated in exchange for a similar reduction of existing U.S. systems of the same type--not specified by Moscow), but much less limited if this decision stands. In the latter case, the preliminary negotiations will become a kind of "SALT 2.5" not covering the central systems but involving "the problem of medium-range nuclear missiles in Europe and forward-based U.S. nuclear weapons simultaneously and in an organic reciprocal relationship."

What are these forward based systems? A number of weapons undoubtedly comprise part of this category but others are more debatable, so much so that the estimates made in both camps vary by a factor of one to three, and the Americans themselves cannot make head nor tail of it. The USSR decrees, not without cause, that anything which can strike its territory concerns it. [paragraph continues]

The 600-km range threshold--a figure it succeeded in introducing into the now moribund protocol added to SALT II--seems to satisfy it. However if the Europeans apply the same criterion, all nuclear weapons, including short-range nuclear weapons, must be included in the debate. In addition, many aircraft have both a nuclear and a conventional capability. Should they all be included in the Eurostrategic systems?

The Old Problem of U.S. Bases

In any event, PRAVDA of 15 July gives an ambitious list of forward based systems without supplying figures: It includes not only aircraft capable of reaching Soviet territory from Europe or from aircraft carriers in the Mediterranean, not only the five U.S. Poseidon submarines allocated to NATO--although these systems are already included in the SALT II limitations--but also the bases placed at the disposal of these forces; indeed, U.S. missile-launching submarines use bases in Scotland and Spain which enable them to considerably increase their operational capabilities. Similarly aircraft can be brought from anywhere, including the United States, to the NATO bases in Greece and Turkey whence they will increase NATO's offensive capability in a crisis.

The Soviet proposal therefore once again raises the question of U.S. bases abroad--an old question which Moscow has constantly raised since immediately after World War II. Right from the start of SALT negotiations more than 10 years ago and again during the SALT II negotiations, the USSR had tried to discuss the U.S. "forward based systems." The Americans had probably resigned themselves to satisfying their wish one day, but they anticipated Moscow's desires by December's offer of negotiations. It is even more paradoxical that it is the Europeans, traditionally more worried at the prospect of a deal between the two superpowers on their security problems, which this time urged their protector to offer these negotiations.

The first and very predictable result of these preliminary negotiations and preparations for them will be to increase discord among the allies. The Soviet overtures have already encouraged the "doves" in Belgium and the Netherlands to step up their opposition to the deployment of Euromissiles in their countries. Without going as far as that, Mr Schmidt quite naturally "vaunted" the concessions he brought back from Moscow and urged the Americans to welcome the. In the future he is likely to continue to advocate compromise.

Finally, although the Soviets did not explicitly mention it, there is hardly any doubt that the partners in the coming negotiations will be none other than Washington and Moscow, as in the SALT negotiations. This is logical in that the Americans alone will have control over the new Euromissiles (the FRG, for instance, will have not control over the use of the Pershing and cruise missiles deployed on its territory; it is a little less logical, however, in cases where the host country will have to "give its consent" to the decision to use the missiles (this is true of Britain, so the British defense secretary has explained).

Generally speaking, with regard to weapons which concern them even more directly than the weapons involved in SALT I and SALT II, the Europeans will have to rely entirely on the only one of their NATO partners (apart from Canada) whose territory cannot be reached by these systems. Even with the best of consultations, this disparity is likely to produce differing views.

Finally, it is difficult to see how these negotiations will slow down deployment of the SS-20 missiles--the cause of the recent agitation. Since these negotiations are even more complex than the Vienna MBFR negotiations they will, at best, go on for years: quite long enough for the USSR to complete the program it began 3 years ago. It may one day be realized that the "fixation" with the SS-20 missile has distracted attention from other equally serious problems. [paragraph continues]

For instance, according to some experts the new Soviet SSG21 and SSG22 missiles which are approaching the operational stage could prove daunting...particularly for the Pershing and cruise missiles, already threatened before coming onto the scene.

The only favorable element--especially for France and the other countries which have autonomous deterrent forces--is Moscow's avowed intention not to refer to these forces at present, except in the still hypothetical eventuality of "official" SALT III negotiations being opened. Opinions on the value of this concession are divided. Pessimists think that the Soviets' main goal is to "disconnect" the various levels of deterrence, in other words to remove or neutralize U.S. means of depending Europe. Secondary forces apparently worry them less with regard to this priority concern. Skeptics point out that, in any case, the French and British means will be taken into account at the end of the negotiations, with the Soviets being given a quantitative advantage on some pretext (this happened with SALT I). As for the optimists....there are very few to be found in this sphere. The most that can be said is that the desire to maintain good relations with Paris prompted the Kremlin to make this concession to French national pride--a concession which is not very costly in the Kremlin's view.

MARCHAIS MEETS WITH VIETNAM'S LE DUAN IN MOSCOW

LD250931 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 21 Jul 80 p 6

[Unattributed report: "Georges Marchais-Le Duan Meeting]

[Text] Georges Marchais, who is attending the Olympic games, has met with Vietnam Communist Party [VCP] Secretary General Comrade Le Duan.

This cordial meeting gave the two secretaries general the opportunity to express satisfaction at the traditional ties of friendship that unite the PCF and VCP and the two peoples. Georges Marchais replied to Le Duan's thanks for the PCF's constant solidarity with the Vietnamese people by confirming the French Communists' desire to further develop it. Georges Marchais and Le Duan expressed their joint wish to extend and strengthen cooperation between the parties.

POLISARIO FRONT RELEASES CAPTURED PORTUGUESE FISHERMEN

ID242014 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1900 GMT 24 Jul 80

[Excerpts] The 15 Portuguese fishermen of the trawler Rio Vouga detained by the Polisario Front were released last night and are now in the Algerian capital. Well-informed sources in Algiers have stated that the release of the 15 Portuguese fishermen followed Portugal's recognition of the rights of the people of the Western Sahara to independence under the leadership of the Polisario Front. In effect, a statement released today in Algiers by the Ministry of Information of the Saharan Democratic Arab Republic [SDAR] and signed by Luis Fontoura, representative of the Portuguese Government, and by [name indistinct], representative of the SDAR, [words indistinct] the position of the Portuguese Government which recognize the Polisario Front as the only and legitimate representative of the Saharan people.

According to the same statement the Portuguese side voiced its concern over the dangerous situation arising from the continuing military occupation by Morocco of SDAR territory. The communique concludes that both Portugal and the SDAR representative underline the need to open negotiations between the Moroccan and Saharan Governments, in keeping with the resolutions of the United Nations and the OAU, in order to arrive at a just and lasting settlement of this issue.

The 15 Portuguese fishermen are expected to arrive at Oporto airport tomorrow at about 0900.

Clarification on Communique

ID250220 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2300 GMT 24 Jul 80

[Excerpts] The 15 Portuguese fishermen of the trawler Rio Vouga, who were detained by the Polisario Front about 1 and 1/2 months ago, are due at Lisbon's Portela Airport in a few hours. They will be flown to Lisbon in a Portuguese Airways aircraft chartered by the government for that specific purpose and will be accompanied by an official from the Foreign Ministry. They are reported to be fit and sound.

Much remains to be revealed about what actually happened behind the scenes during this past 1 and 1/2 months. In a 15-minute appearance on television, Freitas do Amaral, deputy prime minister and minister of foreign affairs, clarified many of the obscure aspects concerning the difficult negotiations which secured the release of the 15 Portuguese fishermen. One has the feeling, however, that not everything has yet been disclosed, although not for much longer, we think, since the joint statement signed by the Portuguese Government's special envoy and by the Polisario Front representatives in liberated areas of the Western Sahara is to be released shortly.

Not everything is believed to have gone as the Lisbon government had expected or wished. This is indeed what one could infer from Freitas do Amaral's own statements:

[Begin Amaral recording] What happened in the meantime was that due to the very special and very difficult circumstances in which the negotiations were held, the joint communique signed with a view to securing the release of the Portuguese fishermen overshoots in some aspects and in the way it is couched the line mapped out by the Portuguese Government. I wish to declare, however, that nothing in that communique could be viewed as any kind of hostile or unfriendly stand on the part of Portugal toward Morocco, a friendly country whose recent overture on the need for a negotiated solution to the Western Sahara conflict deserves our approval and praise.

The joint communique should therefore be interpreted as I have indicated earlier, that is, the Portuguese Government takes a favorable stand on the self-determination of Western Sahara but does not recognize the existence of the SDAR or of its government. It was always evident to the Portuguese Government--and we said this to the Polisario Front--that our willingness to negotiate was conditioned by three main points: first, our intention not to antagonize Morocco, a country with which we maintain and wish to maintain the best possible relation ; second, our wish to contribute to a peaceful solution of the Western Sahara conflict, which after the OAU summit appears indeed to be on the right path; and third, our intention not to recognize at this moment what has come to be known as the Saharan Democratic Arab Republic, SDAR, because in our view the necessary conditions for such a move have not yet been met. COUNCIL OF REVOLUTION'S ANTUNES COMMENTS ON VISIT TO IRAQ

[Text] Lt Col Melo Antunes, member of the Council of the Revolution, has returned from a visit to Iraq where he attended ceremonies marking the 12th anniversary of the Iraqi revolution. Upon arriving in Lisbon, Antunes said that the Iraqi authorities view with optimism the prospects for economic relations between the two countries. Antunes, who was received by President Saddam Husayn, Chairman of the National Assembly Haddad and the Iraqi foreign minister, said that it would be advantageous to establish a closer dialogue with Iraq since that country is to preside over the nonaligned bureau. Antunes said that the Iraqi leaders reaffirmed their wish to strengthen bilateral relations which, he said, have been held in abeyance for the past 4 years.

PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE SOARES CARNEIRO INTERVIEWED

LD241209 Lisbon EXPRESSO in Portuguese 12 Jul 80 pp 1-5 (Review section)

[Maria Joao Avillez interview with Portuguese presidential candidate General Soares Carneiro: "In Terms of National Awareness, Eanes Is Negative. I Am Hope"--date and place not specified]

[Excerpts] EXPRESSO: Why did you agree to run for the presidency of the republic?

Soares Carneiro: It is no secret to anybody that I used to be in favor of a civilian president of the republic. Using his powers, General Eanes decided in July last year, in view of what appeared to be a blockade of the Portuguese situation, to dissolve the Assembly of the Republic and call interim elections, and afterward, also in obedience to the institutional rules, he called on Dr Sa Carneiro to form a government. And the fact is that 2 January this year, when swearing in the government, he publicly stated that he refused to accept the election results with democratic discipline, since his social model was different from that which Dr Sa Carneiro advocated. This was a great shock to me, which led me to believe that it was becoming necessary to state that I did not support him. After that, various circumstances arose, under which the idea emerged from various sources and various factors that for circumstantial reasons the president should be a military man, and in most people's opinion, I could be that military man; thus, after a period of some reflection, I believed that I should accept the responsibility and consequently decided to run.

Civilian and Military Pressures

EXPRESSO: Who was the person who asked you to run?

Soares Carneiro: I do not say that it was a person; there were several groups of people from various sectors.

I would not like to divide Portuguese society into civilians and military personnel, but this suggestion came in fact from both sides. Individuals connected with various parties and outside any party framework believed that I could ensure a view with a clear option for Portuguese life and struggle for a stance which would harmonize the state bodies in a blueprint which would give all of them responsibility, and thus end the ambiguity which has recently characterized Portuguese life.

EXPRESSO: For how long did you experience pressures and encouragements to this end?

Soares Carneiro: This began--this forces me to rack my brain--they were perhaps most pressing about the end of March.

Two Roosters in Same Chicken Coop

EXPRESSO: And afterward, let us say that the invitation was finally made by somebody? Do you not appear to be a candidate as a result of pressures and suggestions?

Soares Carneiro: I would not say "invitation." It was stated at a certain point that if I ran, I could benefit from the support of certain groups--both party and nonparty groups. Dr Sa Carneiro was perhaps the person with whom I had the most decisive conversation.

EXPRESSO: But isn't there a proverb about two roosters in the same chicken coop? It is said that you like to be in command and are accustomed to being so, and that Sa Carneiro also likes to be in command....

Soares Carneiro: Instead of being in command, I would say that I trained myself to be a decisionmaker, and indeed I like to make decisions. And there is no decisionmaker who insists on deciding matters which are not within his limited province: You may rest assured that the role which I understand, within the head of state's province, is that of a decisionmaker within his own province. I will not go outside it to interfere in what are the other states bodies' responsibilities.

EXPRESSO: Your candidacy is not very clear. It is said that it is supported by the Democratic Alliance, but you say that you are not the Democratic Alliance's candidate. Yet but for the Alliance would you be a candidate?

Soares Carneiro: I would not say that. I believe that in a system like ours, under which it is the parties which act as mediators for the people in the representative system, it makes no sense for people to believe that they can be candidates if they do not in fact have identification with something, whether in terms of structures or of blueprints. Being head of state does not give the right to have personal blueprints. And it is therefore necessary to find a certain understanding with a broad group, whether of people or of interests, who will serve the national blueprint or design. Under these circumstances, I always emphasize that I am the candidate supported by the Democratic Alliance.

Very Encouraging Support

EXPRESSO: So your candidacy is supported by two parties?

Soares Carneiro: That is true, but not in the restrictive sense. I cannot believe that the candidate can be only supported by two parties, and I believe that a candidacy for the post of head of state must necessarily be a national candidate and consequently find other kinds of support. Thank God, I have been finding these, and even very encouraging support. The latest meetings in which I have taken part were all organized by nonparty people.

EXPRESSO: How will your election campaign be conducted? Will you appear frequently? Will it be based on rallies and meetings, such as the one which you mentioned with the farmers, for instance?

Soares Carneiro: There are three periods to be considered: There is an initial, precampaign period, which is occurring now, when I need to make myself known and when, above all, in order for my part to guarantee the right to vote freely, which every citizen should accept, I must go out and undergo examination and attend these meetings.

In my opinion, this is an essential part, since you cannot be a candidate for the presidency of the republic with this reputation which you attributed to me a little while ago of living hidden in the shadow. I must shoulder responsibilities and say who I am and what I believe, and what the aims are which in my opinion should be mobilized so that we can all agree on the national plan, which should be built by everybody.

I do not have a messianic view of things, but there are rules. I have already announced these rules of coexistence at my press conference: respect for the dignity of the human individual, the stability of Portuguese democracy, the everlasting nature of our fatherland and also the need for social reforms, which also means progress and economic development. These are the rules of coexistence which should unite the Portuguese people.

Challenge and Effort

EXPRESSO: Do you believe that you will be able to attract people to the extent of their voting for you and your securing a majority and winning?

Soares Carneiro: I believe that this is the challenge confronting me and that I will have to make this effort and strive in earnest to this end.

EXPRESSO: I do not doubt it, but do you believe that you will be victorious?

Soares Carneiro: If I were not convinced that victory is possible, I would not have committed myself to a task which would have been meaningless.

EXPRESSO: I suppose that Eanes also believes that victory will be his....

Soares Carneiro: That is precisely what I believe; that this should be the underlying motive prompting each of the candidates. It is not permissible to doubt two things: first of all, the patriotism which prompts them to run, and secondly that the prospect of victory exists for them. In my case also, this is the significance which I attach to my candidacy.

Instead of Powers, Responsibilities

EXPRESSO: Who chose the members of the political council supporting your candidacy?

Soares Carneiro: I myself chose and invited the ones who are independents. Those representing the parties were appointed by them.

EXPRESSO: Do you believe that the president of the republic's powers should be increased, reduced or kept unchanged in a new constitution or in that which is emerging from the revision of the constitution?

Soares Carneiro: Instead of "powers," I would request you to say the responsibilities of the president of the republic, which is the more pleasant way of putting it, because in fact the notion of power is always associated with a power of coercion, whereas I believe that the president of the republic should have authority through his responsibility, and I believe that our system should be a semipresidential system. The powers which the president of the republic has under the present constitution fully satisfy the level of responsibilities which he should shoulder in that harmony which must be established among the state bodies.

EXPRESSO: And the Council of the Revolution? There is talk that it will be replaced by a kind of body called the council of the republic if you achieve victory.

Soares Carneiro: I have already seen this proposal announced in some plans which are being drafted. What I believe is that the president of the republic is a one-person state body. And he is in danger of becoming a man alone, which is terrible for whoever has to shoulder highly demanding responsibilities. And under these circumstances, I believe that he should benefit from the support of a consultative body, such as council of state, or whatever you like to call it.

EXPRESSO: So you would support a solution of this kind?

Soares Carneiro: But I would not support a council of the republic with deliberative powers. Not those. As a consultative body of the head of state, I uphold the need for the existence of a merely consultative body [sentence as published].

EXPRESSO: And do you adovcate that it should be composed of personnel and civilians, or solely militarymen or solely civilians?

Soares Carneiro: I believe that it should be composed of citizens of sufficient quality to ensure good advice. I do not belive that this distinction between military personnel and civilians should be maintained; the military wish to be subordinate to the political power.

It Is Curious That Civilians Should Seek Military Man for This Candidacy

EXPRESSO: I asked you that because the question is connected with another I would like to ask you: How long will the military be preponderant in Portuguese political life? Some 90 percent of the candidates in these presidential elections are military personnel... It is certainly curious....

Soares Carneiro: It is certainly curious that the civilians should seek a military man for this candidacy.... This does not mean that with the desirable evolution of Portuguese political life more civilians than military personnel should not be found and put forward for future elections. I believe that a military man, if elected, should be deeply civilian in his conduct, and consequently, being a military man is a prerequisite--for reasons which are very honorable for our military personnel--but have nothing to do with our nature or, basically, with a certain understanding of the need for authority, conceptions of authority, conceptions of coercion, or anything of that kind.

EXPRESSO: A short while ago, you mentioned the Socialist Party (PS), and I would now like us to discuss that party. But before that, and also because it is relevant, what is your conception of order and authority? Valuing authority above everything? As a weapon? As a decisive factor for conducting politics?

Soares Carneiro: Nothing of the kind. The question in the way in which it is put implies an accusation which I reject. Order for order's sake or any idea of erecting a system of repression is unacceptable in our times.

It Pains Me To Learn That Socialists Do Not Always Distinguish Themselves From Communists

EXPRESSO: The PS now: What is your opinion of that party? I know that you are acquainted with some of its principal figures...What kind of relations do you maintain with the Socialists?

Soares Carneiro: First of all,they are citizens of the same country, which is my own. I do not believe that it is even legitimate to infer that they are less patriotic than the others or to suspect that they are not prompted by sound aims...

EXPRESSO: Yes, but what is your opinion of them?

Soares Carneiro: It pains me to learn that they do not always distinguish themselves quite clearly from the Communist Party, even allowing people to infer from their practice that the party is not sufficiently free from certain relations which sometimes seem to be assumed to exist between the two parties.

EXPRESSO: Some people have wondered about the particularly favorable way in which you referred to Mario Soares a few days ago. What underlies these statements?

Soares Carneiro: Nothing more than the rightful tribute which I owe to a political leader, who, when heading the government, frequently disregarded party limitations in order to serve his country better. This is what I sincerely believe.

EXPRESSO: And the Communist Party: What is your opinion of this party?

Soares Carneiro: I have already said this at my press conference: It practices are proundly antidemocratic....

EXPRESSO: But are they as Portuguese as the others?

Soares Carneiro: That is a different matter: What I was saying is that the Communist Party is seeking, in terms of society or the state, to assume a disproportionate role in relation to it electoral importance. In short, what I believe is that the Communist Party should be contained within the bounds of its electoral importance and significance.

EXPRESSO: Do you like this Democratic Alliance government's foreign policy? That is, do you agree with it to such an extent that if you won the elections you would approve its continuation?

Soares Carneiro: Foreign policy forms part of a government's overally policy, and as such is included in its program and submitted by it to the Assembly of the Rebpublic. Consequently, it has its proper forum for debate.

The president of the republic also has some role to play, but he will have to do so harmoniously with the government. The question which you ask me is one of detail, and....

EXPRESSO: Of detail? But you must agree that it is an important detail!

Soares Carneiro: Exactly. So important that I wish to tell you that nobody in Portugal doubts our European vocation and the need for us to remain in the Atlantic alliance, just as nobody will doubt, either, the need for us to have a policy of rapprochement with the new Portuguese-speaking countries and to maintain good relations with Brazil. Even merely with respect to what I have mentioned, I can state that already, now, there exists a very broad range of points of agreement between myself and the government's current policy.

For the present, I am certainly unable to say more than this, at least in detail.

EXPRESSO: What is your opinion of the Democratic Alliance?

Soares Carneiro: The Democratic Alliance is a temporary alliance, created by the needs of the time, and in which, as has admittedly already been stated, none of the parties is abandoning its own identity, which it will resume when a certain stability and a certain political, economic or social level is achieved.

Conflicts Are Natural

EXPRESSO: This reply is not very specific, either. In other words, did you believe that the Democratic Alliance, with which in the meantime you have become acquainted, was what it is or did you expect it to be something else?

Soares Carneiro: Madam, I basically.... Well, we must be realistic and see the limitations which are created.... In a country like ours, in which differentiation among people only became possible a short while ago, it is natural that they should need to assert this identity which they have acquired or to which they adhere. I therefore believe that the party tie is far stronger than any other form of association.

This has the effect, principally in less democratic circles, that problems of a personal nature frequently arise and take precedence over problems of political coexistence. And there are always conflicts. But this is not surprising.

EXPRESSO: Is this diversity the reason why there are very strong disagreements about you in the Democratic Alliance, and why the camp is still split between Soares Carneiro supporters and Eanes supporters?

Soares Carneiro: I clearly cannot draw the same conclusion. At the level of the party apparatuses, party members and mere supporters, I have been honored with clear expressions of support.

EXPRESSO: In your opinion, how do the armed forces view General Eanes today?

Soares Carneiro: Oh madam, that is a question... which is so delicate, so delicate.... In the first place, I cannot act as a mouthpiece or spokesman for the armed forces...

EXPRESSO: How do the sections of the armed forces with which you are most closely connected view the current president of the republic?

Soares Carneiro: Well I believe that the armed forces should not express opinions. It is necessary to single out the military personnel who express opinions on an individual basis, which is legitimate. But the armed forces cannot take part in a political debate of an electioneering nature. They cannot and should not, and I am convinced that they will not do so.

PCP'S CUNHAL STRESSES NEED TO ENSURE 'DEMOCRATIC MAJORITY'

LD250839 Lisbon AVANTE! in Portuguese 17 Jul 80 pp 6-7

[Portuguese Communist Party (PCP) Secretary General Alvaro Cunhal 13 July speech at AVANTE! festival in Lisbon: "Alvaro Cunhal's Speech"]

[Excerpt] Sa Carneiro Out!

Our party has never denied the institutional legitimacy of forming a government with the parties which at the elections gain a majority of deputies in the Assembly of the Republic.

We do not deny the institutional legitimacy of summoning the parties of the reactionary alliance to form a government after they gained a majority, albeit small and precarious, in the Assembly of the Republic at the 1979 interim elections.

But the reactionary alliance has lost its right to govern by adopting as a government method the systematic nonobservance and violation of the constitution and the systematic nonobservance and violation of the most basic principles of democratic life.

The reactionary alliance lost its right to govern when, as a government, it adopted as its political program and practice the destruction of the revolutionary gains, the practice of all forms of violence and arbitrariness, the destruction of assets and lives and the conduct of subversive action against the democratic system with the aim of eliminating it.

Last, the reactionary alliance has no right to remain in power at election time, since it fails to observe the most basic democratic principles and wants to turn the elections into a farce.

For all these reasons the PCP, together with millions of Portuguese men and women, demands the promptest possible resignation of the Sa Carneiro-Freitas do Amaral government.

"The struggle continues; Sa Carneiro out" has become established as a popular and national slogan the length and breadth of the country.

Following the end of the legislative session of the Assembly of the Republic, the Portuguese Socialist Party [PS] claimed to support this demand of the PCP and the people's masses.

On 28 June the PS secretary general announced that "Dr Sa Carneiro does not have the right to govern." On 1 July he stated that the government does not meet "the conditions of democratic impartiality of presiding over truly free elections." "The PS," he said, "calls for the government's resignation." Well now, comrades.

If this attitude of the PS with regard to the Sa Carneiro government's immediate resignation was sincere and reflected a real political aim, the conditions would have been created for achieving such an objective.

With this in mind, our party sent the PS national secretary a letter on 3 July.

This letter noted the "similarity of stances between the two parties and their respective allies." It stressed that "from now on the government's resignation is demanded by a combination of political forces that represents the vast majority of the electorate."

It proposed an immediate meeting between delegations of both parties for "an exchange of opinions....on the possibility of joint actions with a view to the government's resignation."

I believe you will all agree, comrades and friends, that the initiative and the proposal which the PCP put to the PS were correct, opportune and necessary.

If, as the PS leaders claimed, the PS believed that the government no longer had the right to govern; if the PS was demanding the government's immediate resignation, is it or is it not true that the joint action of the PCP and PS, together with all the other democratic forces and the active support of millions of Portuguese citizens, would have created extremely favorable conditions for leading to the government's resignation?

Is it or is it not true that, given the rift in the scanty "Democratic Alliance" majority that emerged at the latest Assembly of the Republic session, it would even be possible to consider jointly calling an extraordinary session of the Assembly of the Republic to vote on a censure motion?

Is it or is it not true that among the masses an understanding between the two parties jointly and practically demanding the Sa Carneiro government's resignation would impart an extraordinary thrust to the people's struggle?

Yes, all this is true.

But what was the PS' reply to the party's proposal?

I will now read in full the reply from the PS National Secretariat in a letter dated 7 July (I have it here in my hand):

"Esteemed friends:

"We acknowledge receipt of your letter of 3 July, which has received our most careful attention. Sincerely, we see no advantage in the proposed meeting, given the autonomy of our publicly stated positions, to which there is nothing to add, at least as far as we are concerned.

"With nothing further to add, we are, with socialist compliments," and so forth.

This was the PS's reply.

Following this reply, can one believe in the PS leaders' sincerity when they "demand" the resignation of the Sa Carneiro government?

Is it not legitimate to believe that the PS leaders are frightened at the possibility of joint action by both parties actually leading to the government's resignation?

Some people believe that the Sa Carneiro-Freitas do Amaral government's immediate resignation would enable it to place itself in the position of a "victim" and would strengthen the "Democratic Alliance's" chances at the next elections, and that the Sa Carneiro-Freitas do Amaral government's continued existence until the elections would further erode and further diminish the prestige and authority of the "Democratic Alliance" and lessen its election chances.

Our party has defended and still defends the opposite opinion.

The existence of the president fascist-type government at election time would mean the multiplication of illegal acts, irregularities and deception committed or protected by the state apparatus. It would mean that the media would be at the service of lies, of manipulation by alleged opinion polls, demagoguery, misinformation and propaganda by the reactionary parties.

On the contrary, the Sa Carneiro-Freitas do Amaral government's resignation followed by the formation of a caretaker government guaranteeing the democratic nature of the elections would be a serious blow to the reactionary forces, would impart an extraordinary thrust to the popular and democratic will and would open the way to a huge defeat for the "Democratic Alliance" at the elections.

Unlike the PS, which "demands" the government's resignation but refuses to take action leading to such a result, our party will continue to demand that the Sa Carneiro government resign or be made to resign and that Sa Carneiro be thrown out as soon as possible.

And if the reactionary government has not resigned or been made to resign by the time the Assembly of the Republic elections are held, then the Portuguese people must effectively force it to resign through the elections, by voting against the "Democratic Alliance," by voting for the democratic forces, by voting PCP and United People's Alliance [APU] and by putting the "Democratic Alliance" in the minority and insuring a democratic majority.

PS-Socialist Republican Front [FRS] False Alternative

The reactionary alliance seems to want to link the Assembly of the Republic election campaign to the pre-campaign for the presidential elections.

Other forces are preparing to present their presidential candidates before the general election.

Our party, on the other hand, has insisted that the basic task at present is to prepare for the "Democratic Alliance's" defeat and a democratic victory at the coming elections to the Assembly of the Republic.

Since the presidential candidates will depend to a large extent on the general election results, our party will define its stance on a presidential candidate only after the general elections.

Nevertheless, speculations are continuing and we are being asked many questions.

Therefore, it has been decided to answer some of them here, thus clarifying our party's position.

We are asked: In the event that General Ramalho Eanes is a candidate, will the PCP support that candidacy or not?

To stop any speculations, we would like to confirm that we will not.

We are asked: What if Mario Soares is a candidate, as is being suggested and as the "Democratic Alliance" is encouraging in every possible way?

Our reply is clear: Our party's Central Committee has already announced publicly that the PCP will not support a strongly partisan candidacy. Furthermore, nobody must believe that in the presidential elections, in either the first or the second round, the Communist votes will go the their candidate if the respective candidacy has not been previously examined by the PCP and if the PCP has not approved it.

As for the possible candidacy of Otelo Saraiva De Carvalho, whose balloon full of leftist hot air has burst spectacularly, we believe that his candidacy will only be confirmed to help split the democratic forces.

And that is all on the subject of the presidential elections for the time being.

To return to the general elections, the defeat of the reactionary alliance, which has once again been reduced to a minority on the Assembly of the Republic, will itself have profound repercussions on national political life. It will mean the resignation, with any appeal, of the fascist-type Popular Democratic Party [PPD, former name of Social Democratic Party] -Social Democratic Center Party (CDS) government, unless it has already resigned or been forced to resign by then.

It will mean the failure of the reaction's overall offensive against the revolutionary gains, against the democratic system and against the constitution.

It will mean a great success for the Portuguese people's determination and a considerable strengthening of the Portugal of April.

But the reactionary alliance's defeat at the elections alone will not determine what kind of democratic alternative will emerge from the elections.

With the reactionary parties in a minority in the Assembly of the Republic, the democratic parties will be in a majority. But what kind of majority could form an alternative?

Knowledge, however superficial, with the present Portuguese political picture, with the results of previous elections and with the evolution of the political situation leads to an unavoidable conclusion: No one democratic party alone (and no one reactionary party alone) is in a position to secure either an absolute majority of votes or the majority of seats in the Assembly of the Republic.

Now the PS and the FRS, which the PS heads, are trying to make people believe that the PS and the FRS alone constitute an alternative to the majority which the "Democratic Alliance" held in the Assembly of the Republic, because (according to their assertions) they will secure "the absolute majority of votes" (30 June 1980.)

The PS secretary general goes even further, stating that to smash the "Democratic Alliance" majority "it was not even necessary to form the front. It would be enough for us to contest the elections as the PS" (from an interview with "Ph." 3 July 1980) (the words are his).

This is outright electioneering mystification which the PS is repeating yet again. During the elections to the Constituent Assembly in 1975 the PS said that it would gain an absolute majority: It gained 38 percent and that was a good result. It repeated the claim in 1976; it lost 250,000 votes and fell to 35 percent. It repeated the assertion again in the 1979 elections: It lost a further 260,000 votes and dropped to 27 percent.

We believe it would be a positve factor for strengthening the democratic system if the PS recovers some of its votes, either with votes for the PS or with votes for the Union of the Left for Social Democracy (UEDS) or the independent Social Democratic Association (which are not many, but some, nevertheless).

But to state that the FRS will gain an absolute majority is a huge lie by which the Portuguese people will not allow themselves to be deceived. The lie consists in the fact that it is impossible for the PS, the FRS, alone to gain an absolute majority. It also lies in the fact that the policy of the PS alone is not itself a democratic alternative.

What guarantees does the PS provide of a really democratic policy when, in a question of imminent threat to democracy, the PS leaders persist in their narrowminded anticommunism and bridges to the right?

Lopes Cardoso, the UEDS representative within the FRS, actually stated on 30 June that a "post-election rapprochement with the Social Democratic Party [PSD] is "a hypothesis which is not being considered.... which was discarded at the outset."

But PS Directorate member Vitor Constancio has shown that such a "hypothesis which is not being considered" is in fact being considered, since he regards a PS-PSD agreement as indispensable.

And when other PS leaders solemnly deny that they would form alliances with the right, how can we fail to remember that the PS secretary general promised exactly the same thing in 1976 following the elections and another PS leader solemnly swore exactly the same, and in the end what did we see! A permanent alliance with the PPD and CDS, which led to the policy of packages, the legislative counterrevolution and even the PS-CDS government coalition?

And what is the meaning of the repeated mutual eulogies between "Democratic Alliance" and PS leaders?

How are we to regard the fact that PPD leader Carlos Macedo describes Mario Soares as a "real democrat" and Soares Carneiro also eulogizes Mario Soares? And how are we to regard the fact that, at the same time as they accuse the Communists of being "totalitarians," the PS leaders praise the reactionary leaders? And that Mario Soares says that Sa Carneiro is "a man who supports the democratic path"?

No, not only because its electoral support does not justify it but also because as long as it persists with its systematic refusal to ally itself with the PCP and persists in its alliance on the right, the PS cannot claim to be the democratic alternative to the "Democratic Alliance" government and to the "Democratic Alliance" majority.

A democratic majority in the Assembly of the Republic is impossible without the PS deputies. But neither is it possible without the PCP deputies, and it will be all the more possible the more PCP deputies there are.

Democratic Alternative With PCP and APU

A democratic majority in the Assembly providing the basis of support for the formation of a democratic government must include both Communists and Socialists.

This being the case, what is the sure vote, the certain vote, the useful vote for democracy, for the democratic majority and for the democratic alternative?

Is it a vote for the PS and the FRS, as their propagandists claim?

No. A vote for the PS, for the FRS, is not sure or certain because the PS has hitherto refused to consider the only possible majority, the only possible democratic alternative--the majority and the alternative with the PCP.

If by chance (as the PS leaders claim) the PS does gain votes from the APU, will this fact help to facilitate a democratic alternative?

No. Such a result would encourage tendencies within the PS leadership toward persisting in the refusal to reach an understanding with the PCP and toward seeking further understandings and alliances with the right, specifically with the PSD.

The strengthening of the PCP and APU, the increase in the number of PCP and APU votes and deputies, is a condition for preventing further PS alliances with the right, so that the PS will at last understand the need for an alliance on the left against the reactionary forces defeated in the elections.

As far as the majority of democratic deputies are concerned, the stronger the APU is compared to the FRS and the stronger the PCP is compared to the PS, the better the chances of transforming the numerical majority of Communists, Socialists and other democrats into a real democratic majority that will serve as a foundation for forming a democratic government.

If anyone wants the PS to form a democratic majority and a democratic alternative with other democratic forces (this is the only possible way,) the correct vote, the sure vote, the certain vote, the useful vote, the indispensable vote for this result is a vote for the PCP, a vote for the APU.

Unlike other electoral alliances, the APU is a solid alliance between the PCP and another responsible and consistent party (the Portuguese Democratic Movement [MDP]) which we now cordially greet. The APU is open to independent democrats or to others who decide to struggle alongside the Communists.

As far as we are concerned, and in agreement with the MDP, we are now trying to ensure that the lists of candidates will be drawn up very openly and in a unitary spirit, and we are sure that the APU's unitary dynamic gained at previous elections will be confirmed in the coming campaign and the coming election.

Our unitary will, the definition of the reactionary alliance's defeat as the basic objective and the concern with ensuring that no antifascist votes are wasted at the coming election battle prompted our party to establish informal and exploratory contacts with the Popular Democratic Union [UDP], without, however, in any way altering its critical opinions concerning that party's leftist and splittist activity. As is known, the UDP gained 129,000 votes at the 1979 elections but only one deputy. Thus, about 100,000 votes were wasted; if these votes had gone to the APU they would have made possible the defeat of some rightwing candidates and the election of three of four democrats.

Contacts with the UDP did take place but with no result. Now some people are saying that the PCP only wanted advantages for itself and was unwilling or make any concessions.

What is the truth? The truth is that the UDP (while talking demagogically about so-called joint lists) was only aiming at agreements with the PCP in two districts for the election of independent candidates approved by the UDP, while remaining free in all the other districts to field its own candidates and to form links with other parties, specifically the PS, and to conduct campaigns against the PCP and the APU. You must surely agree that such proposals cannot fail to be rejected.

And what was our reply?

We would like to reveal now that the PCP proposed to the UDP the sure election of three candidates on the APU lists, as long as the UDP called for a vote for the APU on a national scale and committed itself in this direction.

We feel that this was the most we could do to prevent wasted votes and to defeat the reactionary alliance.

Let it be clear once and for all: The PCP is willing to conclude responsible political agreements to defeat the reactionary alliance and to guarantee a democratic majority, but the PCP refuses to enter into unprincipled agreements and to barter votes.

FOREIGN MINISTER OUTLINES PROPOSAL ON MIDDLE EAST

LD250234 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1830 GMT 24 Jul 80

[Excerpt] Foreign Minister Oreja gave a lecture at the Institute of Foreign Policy and Relations in Vienna this afternoon on the subject of Western solidarity and the international crisis. Oreja referred first to the current process of international tension, which has increased with new cause for world concern in the so-called arc of crisis, which stretches from Afghanistan to the Mahgreb. The Spanish minister said that a solution must be found to the Iranian crisis and an end put to the inhuman situation to which dozens of citizens are being subjected as detainees in violation of the most basic rights. Marcelino Oreja also said that a negotiated settlement must be found that will allow the total and final withdrawal of the Soviet forces from Afghanistan.

Referring to the program for the Middle East, the Spanish foreign minister proposed a negotiating mechanism to go beyond UN Resolution 242 and the Camp David accords. Oreja suggested the following five-point procedure:

1. Following preliminary consultations, the UN Security Council would be convened to discuss the Middle East question in all aspects.

2. The Council would adopt a new resolution to complement Resolution 242 on the subject of Palestinian rights.

3. The Council would recognize the PLO as an interested party in the conflict in its capacity as the sole and legitimate representative of the Palestinian people.

4. Israel and the PLO would undertake to accept the new resolution along with Resolutions 242 and 338.

5. The Council would recommend the calling of a diplomatic conference at which, alongside the interested parties, the superpowers would take part as well as those countries capable of making a positive contribution to a Middle East solution.

Oreja also suggested the advance of Western solidarity on three fronts: struggling to win the political and security crisis, making progress toward detente and persevering in the building of peace. In the opinion of the Spanish minister, the two major lines which should guide the West's attitude in this crisis are firmness and detente.

Oreja's lecture takes on particular importance in light of the proximity of the CSCE which will be held in Madrid in November. The Spanish minister proposed finally three collective tasks for the international system: an end to the arms race; the fostering of international cooperation; and the defense of human rights and the struggle to eradicate terrorism.

ETA SPOKESMAN ISSUES STATEMENT ON BOMBING TARGETS

LD241942 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1800 GMT 24 Jul 80

[Text] An ETA [Basque Fatherland and Liberty Group] spokesman has given a statement to a London radio station. Here is Carlos Riera reporting from London:

ETA may not carry out its announced bombing campaign in the tourist regions of the Canary Islands, according to a statement made today in London by a spokesman of the Basque terrorist organization to an independent London radio station. The spokesman, who refused to identify himself, also said that docks and artistic monuments would be the next objectives in the terrorist campaign against the Spanish state. Finally, referring to last night's attack in Bilbao during which four people died, the anonymous ETA spokesman denied that his organization was responsible.

BOLIVIAN AMBASSADOR TO LONDON RESIGNS IN PROTEST

PY241418 Paris AFP in Spanish 1235 GMT 23 Jul 80

[Text] London, 23 Jul (AFP)--It was learned today that the Bolivian ambassador to London, Jose Luis Roca, resigned from his post to protest the recent military coup in his country. Roca confirmed today to AFP that he resigned at the end of last week and criticized the action of the ambitious military leaders who seized power in La Paz. The former Bolivian ambassador, who will continue living in London, expressed his optimism toward a quick reestablishment of democracy in his country.

LABOR PARTY EXECUTIVE TO SUPPORT ANTINUCLEAR MARCH

[Tony Conyers report: "Callaghan Anti-CND Line Defied"]

[Text] The Labour Party's National Executive yesterday defied appeals by Mr Callaghan not to give official support to a Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament [CND] march.

Mr Callaghan said he was fiercely opposed to the idea of participating in the demonstration on Oct. 26 and sending a Labour Party speaker to it.

"As far as I am concerned, I have never been in favor of unilateral disarmament and never will be," he said.

To support the CND could have serious consequences for the party and severe repercussions on NATO.

But a move to refer the demonstration decision back to the National Executive's international committee, proposed by Mrs Shirley Williams and Mr John Golding, was lost by 15 votes to nine.

The Labour Party has never before given its official support to the CND movement.

Nevertheless, at the party's special conference at Wembley in May, there was opposition to American cruise missiles being deployed in Britain and with the announcement that Britain is going for the Trident weapon system to replace Polaris there is growing concern within the party over nuclear policy.

The National Executive, which met yesterday for its final session before the autumn party conference, did not discuss the controversial issue of the mandatory re-selection of MPs as it is still not satisfied about the legality of such a move.

A similar matter, but concerning local councillors, was discussed. Mr Wedgewood Benn had suggested that local Labour parties should elect the leaders of local council Labour groups and determine their policies.

But when his resolution came up he asked for it to be referred back. Mr Benn's original proposal had attracted some 30 letters from constituency Labour groups protesting that the matter should be put to the party conference.

PASOK REITERATES CHAMBER'S ROLE IN NATO, BASES ISSUES

AT231520 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 23 Jul 80 p 1

[Text] The dispute between the government and the official opposition on the outstanding issues of NATO and the U.S. bases has intensified as these two issues have now entered a decisive stage. The focus of the dispute is Papandreou's new position that, if the government concludes any agreement on these two burning issues, it must submit the agreements to the chamber for ratification. Furthermore, citing his previous position that the current chamber has ceased to express the will of the electorate, the PASOK chairman has demanded that any possible government agreement on NATO or the U.S. bases be ratified by the chamber which will emerge from the next elections.

Commenting on Papandreou's relevant statements a government spokesman observed:

"The PASOK chairman should not worry. The constitution and the laws will be implemented. Whatever must be ratified according to the constitution or the laws will be ratified; that which needs no ratification will not be ratified.

"Second, it is sad that the PASOK chairman does not want to understand--although he speaks about the constitution--that the current parliament will continue to express the will of the electorate until the deadline envisaged by the constitution has expired."

Yesterday, official opposition leader A. Papandreou stated the following:

"Indications are increasing that our country's return to the NATO military wing and the signing of a new Greek-U.S. bases agreement are being promoted under pressure. Of course PASOK firmly opposes the country's return to the NATO military wing and just as firmly maintains its position on the withdrawal of foreign bases from our soil.

"However, we first wish to remind the government that, according to the constitution, responsibility for concluding international treaties and agreements, which become valid only through law (articles 27,28, paragraphs 2-3; article 36, paragraph 2), belongs exclusively to the legislative organ--to our national representatives.

"The responsibility belongs neither to the president of the republic (article 36, paragraph 1)--whose responsibility for concluding international treaties in parliamentary democracies is after all purely formal,--nor to the government, which simply holds the preliminary discussions. It follows that the government, which conducts the negotiations, must unfailingly brief the chamber on every stage of its discussions by submitting its every action to parliamentary scrutiny. Secrecy in the negotiation of agreements for which the parliament decides not only is inconceivable but also violates the constitution and shows contempt for the people's representatives.

"Second, only the chamber that will emerge from the next elections is able to make choices which concern our own national existence. This is so because the current parliament has ceased to express the will of the electorate.

"Third, the New Democracy government has declared that it accepts the return to NATO on the basis on the Haig-Davos agreement, but neither the people nor the body which is directly responsible, namely, the chamber, have been informed as to the contents of this agreement.

"In any case, the prime minister is obligated to directly state whether the Haig-Davos agreement amends or provides the possibility of amending the Aegean status in relation to what was in force prior to Greece's withdrawal from the 'alliance's' military wing."

The government side has also mentioned that there will most probably be new proposals by the alliance in August or, at the latest, in September. In any case, it added that the Greek Government has not received any relevant notification about the timing of the submission.

Furthermore, regarding the beginning of preliminary negotiations for the future of U.S. bases in Greece, the same sources mentioned that most probably the submission of new proposals on the return to NATO will come first.

Finally, regarding a report published yesterday that the United States has allegedly not made any commitment on maintaining a balance of forces between Greece and Turkey, the government side stressed that the balance is not an issue between the two countries. There is a bilateral agreement, it was added, between Greece and the United States on the maintenance of a 7:10 ratio in U.S. defense aid to the two countries. This agreement is valid and the United States is committed to adhere to this ratio.

GREECE 'NOTIFIED' IN DECEMBER OF U.S. PLANS TO EXPAND BASES

[By correspondent St. Evstathiadhis]

[Excerpt] New York, 23 July--The Greek Government "must be aware and actually has been for some time" of U.S. interest in "broadening" the U.S. bases' role in Greece and modernizing their "functionality" so that they can correspond to new NATO concepts of Western defense in the broad area of the eastern Mediterranean.

Three informed sources in Washington, whom TO VIMA questioned in this regard over the last few days, independently confirmed that last December, U.S. officials in Brussels informed the "Greek side" that the United States desires, "in the event of the conclusion of a new bilateral agreement, that the bases operate for the purpose of providing facilities in addition to those required by NATO," that is, for purely U.S. interests.

In two more instances, in February and later, the Greek Government was "notified" of the same U.S. interest through diplomatic channels. The Washington sources were not in a position to know or did not want to reveal the reactions of the Greek Government but hinted rather clearly that Athens knows of the relevant U.S. intentions. After all, they add, recently the U.S. press has repeatedly reported "the new possibilities" that are afforded or may exist for the movement of U.S. forces to the eastern Mediterranean and the corresponding use of the area's bases for that purpose.

RALLIS ADDRESS ON 'RESTORATION OF DEMOCRACY' ANNIVERSARY

AT241412 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 24 Jul 80 pp 1, 3

[Excerpts] Speaking at a huge gathering of New Democracy cadres at the party's offices where the sixth anniversary of the restoration of democracy was being celebrated, Prime Minister Y. Rallis asked the opposition to support the government in its efforts to defend democracy. Specifically, the prime minister referred to the stance of some parties of the opposition which have adopted illegal actions and absurdities and have supported people who have designs on lawful order and who are eroding democracy.

For the first time, PASOK Chairman A. Papandreou has not made any statements this year on the occasion of democracy's restoration. Another noted absence was that of National Defense Minister Evangelos Averof, who did not attend the anniversary celebrations at the New Democracy offices.

Speaking at the New Democracy cadres' meeting yesterday the prime minister's first assertion was that, thanks to the admirable cooperation of the people with Karamanlis, democracy was fully restored within a very short time. The army, Rallis added, returned to its task, namely, guaranteeing the country's defense; the security corps ceased to restrict freedoms and has only served to guard the citizens' security and order; trade union freedoms were restored; and every citizen now enjoys the freedom which had been denied for 7 years.

Rallis then said: "Please allow me to state that, despite all the rhetorical exaggerations of the opposition, exaggerations which they themselves do not believe, the democracy which currently exists in our country does not have to envy the multiparty parliamentary democracies of the West.

"Another assertion which we can make is that, soon after the restoration of our democratic regime, a few groups of extremists and anarchists at various times tried to disturb the state of normality, calm and quiet that had been restored. This would normally not be of special significance because these kinds of events happen in all democracies and the police and judicial branches undertake to neutralize agitators in those places. Whereas, in our case, many times the opposition has defended lawbreakers.

"We should worry because some gentlemen from the opposition, instead of criticizing the agitators and thus contributing to their isolation so that they can be rendered harmless, on the contrary have tried to criticize the government because it has refused to tolerate violations of the constitution and laws.

"I do not need to refer to events of the past. Let me mention the disorders which occurred in Rhodes last week which are known to all of you. Lawful order was disturbed on that beautiful island without reason, the island's tourism was jeopardized and some politicians of the opposition, instead of condemning the agitators--and nobody knows what illegal interests they are serving--asked the government to withdraw the forces of order and thus let the agitators have a field day.

"I now come to a third and last assertion. It is unfortunate that some people who belong to the opposition have not understood that opposition means the exercise of responsible, justified criticism. The opposition is entitled and obligated to criticize the government for its incorrect actions or omissions. However, it is not entitled to support those people who have designs on lawful order even if the opposition gains temporary political benefit through such methods. I say temporary because it is well known--the great historian from Arcadia, Polivios, said it first 2,000 years ago--that anarchy erodes democracy and finally leads to its abolition.

"Of course the anarchy which will succeed the democratic regime--if it is finally destroyed--will not last long. Experiences from similar situations in Greece and many other countries teach us, as Polivios also said, that anarchy is always succeeded by tyranny.

"Therefore, is this the aim of our political opponents? Is this why they do not condemn illegal actions and absurdities and, on the contrary, many times justify them? Do they want the democracy which we imposed with so many efforts and sacrifices to be destroyed and succeeded by anarchy and tyranny? Are they so blinded by their hatred of opposition that they cannot see how great the danger is? Or do some of them deliberately wish for democracy's abolition so that we may be finally led to tyranny?

"However, whether it is through blindness or deliberateness that they want to lead us there, we, the followers of New Democracy, will carry out our duty without exception. Our duty is to advise, enlighten and toil for calm, order, legality, progress and freedom. Our duty is to struggle to maintain the democratic regime which we resurrected with the people's help.

"This is not only the government's duty, it is the obligation and duty of all those people who truly believe in parliamentary multiparty democracy. Fortunately these people constitute the large majority of people but, in order that all may understand the reality and dangers which threaten us, your full involvement is needed.

"You, the monarchy committees of the party, must communicate with all true democrats and explain and analyze to them their duty. I am sure you will do this because I have faith in your trust and your enthusiasm.

"Therefore I call all of you to undertake the crusade for the protection of our democracy and I am sure that, thanks to your militancy, democracy will survive."

TURKISH AMBASSADOR PROTESTS 'MISTREATMENT' OF SECURITY GUARD

AT241514 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 24 Jul 80 pp 1, 13

[By G. Mavros]

[Excerpts] Turkish Ambassador Tezel made a demarche to Foreign Minister Mitsotakis on Saturday regarding the mistreatment of a Turkish diplomatic employee (member of the embassy's security service) by police organs.

Yesterday a responsible source of the Foreign Ministry stated to ELEVTHEROTIPIA the following: "An investigation has been ordered and, provided responsibility is determined, serious sanctions will be imposed."

The prison officer and policemen of the 10th police precinct of Pangrati are considered responsible for the mistreatment of the Turkish policeman, a member of the security guard of the embassy, (Cafer Butsaktsir), who was arrested last Friday at midnight for disturbing the peace.

According to his statement, irresponsible organs detained the Turkish policeman, who enjoys diplomatic immunity, from 0230 to 0430 and mistreated him. The doctor who examined him on Saturday morning noted serious bruises on (Butsaktsir).

Charges of mistreatment have been brought against the men of the 10th police precinct in the past by various Greek citizens.

(Butsaktsir) also charged that one of the policemen who mistreated him is a regular guard at the Turkish Embassy.

BRIEFS

DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH SEYCHELLES--In their wish to develop a spirit of mutual understanding and a bond of friendship and cooperation between the two countries and peoples, the governments of Greece and the Seychelles have agreed to establish diplomatic relations as of today, 16 July. A statement by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs says that the two governments are convinced that this agreement will contribute to the development of commercial, economic, cultural and other bonds between the two countries in a spirit that will strengthen peace, international cooperation and promote the principles of international law. 21ST ROUND OF MBFR TALKS CONCLUDES IN VIENNA

[Unattributed report: "Holiday for Forces Reduction Conference"]

[Text] On Thursday at the conclusion of the 21st round of the Vienna forces reduction conference, NATO and the Warsaw Pact appealed to each other to remove the last obstacles in the way of the conclusion of a first partial agreement to provide for a reduction of American and Soviet forces in central Europe. The statements of both sides, however, clearly showed that there are still many problems to be overcome before a breakthrough can be achieved at the negotiations, which have been underway since 1973. The principal point of controversy is the troop strength figures submitted by the two pact systems.

The positions of the sides in the negotiations were outlined at press conferences before the beginning of the 2-month summer break by Dutch chief delegate Willem de Vos van Steenwijk and Polish chief delegate Tadeusz Strulak. Ambassador de Vos expressed the view that an agreement on a first reduction phase would now seem within reach if the East were to make concessions in the figures question and to help clear up still-existing discrepancies. The Western representative also called for progress at the discussion on accompanying force reduction measures which, he said, in the eyes of NATO constitute an essential security element. The West is ready to carefully study the new compromise proposal submitted by the East 2 weeks ago, De Vos said. He added, however, that in the West's opinion it is a questionable attempt on the part of the East to now seek to include the withdrawal of 20,000 Soviet soldiers from the GDR in the Vienna negotiations when this withdrawal had earlier been declared a unilateral step.

Polish Ambassador Strulak declared that the negotiations had been led out of the cul-de-sac through the latest compromise plan of the Warsaw Pact.

By presenting new figures in January 1980 the East also demonstrated its readiness to bring about a solution of the figures problem played up by the West. The new Eastern proposals of 10 July, he said, are an "important concession" to the West. They not only provide for Soviet troop withdrawals at a 3-to-1 ratio to the American troops, but they have also taken into consideration the Western wish for greater flexibility within the alliances by the concept of fixing maximum national ceilings within the framework of joint pact ceilings.

LUNS VIEWS EAST-WEST BALANCE IN EUROPE, FRENCH POSITION

LD251401 Paris LE MATIN in French 23 Jul 80 p 3

[Pascal Krop and Jean-Pierre Mithois undated interview with NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns: "France Has Never Really Hoped To Remain a Sanctuary"]

[Text] LE MATIN: Do you believe that we are now seeing an increase in tension in the world?

Joseph Luns: I believe that frictions reached their highest point at the time of the invasion of Afghanistan in December 1979. Since then the USSR has taken no new action which could have increased tension except for the fact that it seems quite determined not to withdraw from that country.

In the light of German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt's recent visit to Moscow, I believe that there is a chance--a small chance--that things could improve by the end of the year, that is, once the alliance adopts a stance.

In any event, the Soviets no longer demand that the decision adopted on 12 December 1979 (LE MATIN note: NATO countries decided on that day to deploy American cruise missiles and Pershing 2 missiles in Europe) be rescinded. It was impossible to achieve this and they have resigned themselves to the inevitable.

LE MATIN: Does this mean that you believe that the atmosphere is improving?

Joseph Luns: The atmosphere is not good. However, it has not deteriorated in recent months, and maybe there is some reason for optimism. I am careful about what I say.

LE MATIN: The Soviets have recently withdrawn 16,000 men from East Germany. Has this conciliatory gesture any significant value?

Joseph Luns: It is of minimal value. We would like to know where these 16,000 men are to go and what kind of troops have been involved. In view of Soviet superiority with respect to troops and conventional arms, this has not greatly altered the situation.

LE MATIN: In your view, have NATO forces been overtaken by Warsaw Pact forces in the sphere of conventional and nuclear forces?

Joseph Luns: It is a fact that in the sphere of conventional forces the Soviets are stronger than we are. However, our defense means are such that we have good reason to believe that any attack launched by the Soviet Union would be stopped.

LE MATIN: The deployment of Pershing and cruise missiles in West Europe....

Joseph Luns: Will enable us to rectify the balance and increase the credibility of our deterrent force.

LE MATIN: The United States has been continually complaining of other NATO countries because it believes that they do not devote sufficient efforts to the defense of the alliance. Do you believe that certain capitals have a tendency toward a certain kind of neutralism?

Joseph Luns: This is unrealistic. No NATO country has any tendency toward a certain kind of neutralism. As far as the question of our forces is concerned, it can be said that NATO countries have kept their promises to increase their defense budgets. The Netherlands is doing this. Norway, the FRG, Portugal, France--which is not a member of the integrated command--Greece, Turkey and Great Britain are doing this. There is some room for doubt as far as Belgium and Denmark are concerned.

LE MATIN: In Detroit, Ronald Reagan has just been chosen by the Republicans as their candidate for the presidency. Do you believe that if he were elected U.S. president, he would play a more or less important role in the defense of the Western world? In the FRG, for instance, people have often complained about a certain softness on the part of President Carter.

Joseph Luns: In my view, you can no longer talk about American softness. The U.S. defense budget has been increased in an impressive manner by some $25 billion. I have recently noticed what Mr Reagan said about defense and it cannot be ruled out that if he were elected he would contemplate making an ever bigger effort in this sphere. Much will depend on his choice of department secretaries.

LE MATIN: If Mr Reagan were elected, would his political ideas not clash with the policy of detente which the FRG and France favor?

Joseph Luns: I feel reluctant to express my views on the subject. Fortunately, there often is a lot of difference between what a candidate says at the time of elections and what he does once he is elected.

LE MATIN: The United States and President Carter were obviously annoyed by the recent visits of Helmut Schmidt to Moscow and Giscard d'Estaing to Warsaw.

Joseph Luns: I must tell you that the Atlantic alliance has not really been annoyed by Mr Schmidt's trip. Mr Schmidt behaved in an exemplary manner--he consulted with his NATO allies, especially the United States.

LE MATIN: Giscard d'Estaing did not consult with other members of the alliance.

Joseph Luns: Let me tell you that this caused some surprise.

LE MATIN: Do you believe that the results achieved were satisfactory?

Joseph Luns: It seems to me that there was more content in Mr Schmidt's talks in Moscow...

LE MATIN: And that he achieved more results?

Joseph Luns: Maybe.

LE MATIN: Did General de Gaulle's decision in 1966 to withdraw from NATO and adopt a policy of national independence harm the Atlantic alliance?

Joseph Luns: I would say that General de Gaulle's decision was understood by some but not by others and that, generally speaking, countries allied to France would have preferred to see France remain a member of integrated command. Having said this, France's freedom of action in no way depends on whether French forces are or are not integrated in the alliance of which it is a full member. It has liaison missions in every high command, and cooperation--which is not integration--is satisfactory.

LE MATIN: Hasn't France become Atlanticist again since 1974, that is, since the election of Valery Giscard d'Estaing?

Joseph Luns: No, this is an exaggeration. Georges Pompidou when he was president said that it was inconceivable that in the event of any crisis or war France would not be at the side of its allies.

LE MATIN: You expressed great satisfaction with Giscard's press conference on defense.

Joseph Luns: I have been pleased with the fact that France has started considering the possibility of acquiring the neutron bomb, and I said this on my own behalf, not on behalf of NATO. Anything that increases France's military power is welcome and desirable from the allies' viewpoint.

LE MATIN: Insofar as the neutron bomb is a "battleground" weapon, does this decision not appear to be contrary to "dissuasion" as it was defined until then?

Joseph Luns: This is true, but I have always had some doubts about the "sanctuarization" doctrine. Is it realistic and does it represent France's real position? Since it is a member of the Atlantic alliance, France could not merely remain a sanctuary.

SPANISH FOREIGN MINISTER OREJA MEETS WITH PAHR

[Summary] Spanish Foreign Minister Marcelino Oreja Aguirre arrived in Vienna yesterday, 24 July, for a 2-day official visit, to be followed by an unofficial stay in Salzburg on Saturday and Sunday. Foreign Minister Pahr, who met Oreja at the airport, gave a luncheon for his Spanish guests. Oreja was then received by President Kirchschlaeger, after which he held a 1-and-1/2-hour talk with Pahr at the Foreign Ministry. At 1800 Oreja delivered a lecture before the Society for Foreign Policy.

Pahr Comments on Talks

AU251143 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 25 Jul 80 p 2

[Excerpt] The talk held yesterday afternoon between Spanish Foreign Minister Oreja and Austrian Foreign Minister Pahr focused on topical international issues and bilateral questions. As Pahr told DIE PRESSE, the views of the sides are largely identical as far as the major political problems are concerned. On the Middle East issue, Vienna and Madrid hold nearly identical views. Both sides will continue to pay great attention to the situation in Latin America. In Pahr's opinion the developments in this region in the coming years will be of great importance for the world situation in general. Pahr stressed that Austria, which has contributed to the best of its ability toward Spain's admission to the Council of Europe, fully and unreservedly supports Madrid's endeavors to become a member of the European Communities.

Departure for Salzburg

[APA, People's Party press service report: "Oreja Talked in Vienna With Pahr and Mock"]

[Text] Vienna--In discussing international topics at their Vienna talks, Spanish Foreign Minister Oreja and his Austrian opposite number Pahr paid special attention to preparation of the Madrid CSCE followup conference scheduled for this fall. Pahr outlined the Austrian position that participation of foreign ministers could improve the prospects of success of that meeting due to the resulting greater pressure of public opinion. He advocated a thorough discussion of the developments in all three "baskets" and outlined the Austrian proposals regarding confidence-building measures for intensified cooperation in the energy sector and regarding working conditions for journalists.

At their second meeting on Friday morning the two ministers discussed the situation in Latin America and in the Middle East. On Friday Oreja also met with Austrian People's Party Chairman Mock, who briefed him on the resolutions of the party leaders conference of the European Democratic Union, of which he is chairman. At the conference, held on 11 July 1980, the leaders of more than 20 European political parties unanimously advocated the expansion of the European Community to include Spain, Portugal and Greece, Mock said.

On Friday afternoon Oreja and his delegation proceeded by plane--the same special plane that took them to Vienna--to Salzburg for an unofficial visit, which will end today, Saturday. During his stay in Salzburg, Oreja will, among other things, attend the opening ceremony of the Salzburg Festival.

FRG, FRANCE'S POSITION ON AFGHANISTAN STATED

LD251142 Hamburg DPA in German 1105 GMT 25 Jul 80

[Text] Bonn--The Federal Government still considers a political solution of the Afghanistan problem "highly desirable." Speaking at a news conference in Bonn today Government Spokesman Boelling added: "We take the problem of Afghanistan very seriously."

According to Boelling the Federal Government has noted "with regret" that Western suggestions to draw up a timetable for the complete withdrawal of Soviet troops have not been taken up by Moscow thus far. The West has made its position clear to the USSR. The federal chancellor made a contribution to this in Moscow. Boelling made the statement in reply to several questions about Bonn's present position on the Afghanistan question.

According to a statement released by the information service of the French Embassy in Bonn today, France's attitude is characterized by "firmness and dialogue." France can neither accept the Soviet intervention nor approve of a situation "created by force." Although the world is moving along a dangerous knife edge, the dialogue must be maintained. France will continue to contribute to the search for political solution of the crisis.

BOELLING ON SCHMIDT'S UPCOMING TALKS WITH HONECKER, GIEREK

LD260920 Hamburg DPA in German 0707 GMT 26 Jul 80

[Text] Bonn--At his forthcoming meeting with SED General Secretary Erich Honecker Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt plans to discuss "sensible cooperation between the two German states." In an interview for DPA today Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling outlined the chancellor's aims and expectations as follows:

"First and foremost it is necessary to discuss a clear outline for sensible cooperation between the two German states and to improve the preconditions for alleviating the hardships caused by the division of our country for the citizens here and over there, and for taking advantage of all realistic opportunities to achieve a relationship of good-neighborliness. There is still a lot of work to be done here." [passage indistinct]

The Federal Government does not consider what has been achieved so far in contacts between people in the two states to be adequate. "We are certain that the vast majority of all Germans are not prepared to give up the idea that we are one nation. The chancellor's trip is aimed at strengthening the cohesion of the Germans at a practical level."

This cannot be achieved through (?unreasonable demands by the opposition) "which are intended to force the GDR to its knees." Efforts should rather be made to achieve further settlements "which directly help to make people's lives easier." Sensible CDU/CSU politicians admit that since the signing of the basic treaty "a tremendous amount has been achieved." [passage indistinct] Boelling said that the Federal Government is assuming that there will be discussions on the crisis-ridden (?international situation), especially on the (?need) for arms limitation and progress in arms control. The two German states have a special responsibility here. "The GDR and the FRG cannot permit themselves the role merely of interested observers," he said.

In Bonn's view the further development of European cooperation will be the dominant topic of the talks between the first secretary of the PZPR, Edward Gierek, and the federal chancellor (?which are planned) to take place about 20 August in Hamburg.

According to Boelling the two politicians will discuss at length "how the military balance in Europe, which has been upset in our view, can be restored and what can be done by the individual European governments to continue the discussion on disarmament measures positively and to reach agreement on additional confidence-building measures, at the MBFR negotiations in Vienna or at the forthcoming CSCE conference in Madrid, for example."

In this context Boelling underlined the great expertise and particular commitment of the Polish leadership in questions of arms control policy, which have "always been acknowledged" by the German side. He said that Gierek and Schmidt will discuss these topics "with a precise knowledge of the views of their partners in the two alliances to which they belong."

AMBASSADOR TO BOLIVIA RECALLED; 'DOORS OPEN' TO REFUGEES

LD251122 Hamburg DPA in German 1026 GMT 25 Jul 80

[Text] Bonn--The Federal Government has recalled its ambassador in La Paz, Johannes von Vacano, to Bonn for a report on events in Bolivia. Foreign Ministry spokesman Juergen Sudhoff told a news conference in Bonn today that the Federal Government wants an exact picture of the situation following the military putsch and to draw the necessary conclusions on the basis of its analysis.

According to the spokesman the ambassador, who is expected in Bonn at the beginning of next week, was recalled following intensive consultations with the EC partners. It is not known at the moment whether the other EEC countries will follow the German example.

The Foreign Ministry spokesman emphasized that the German Embassy in La Paz will not turn away persecuted Bolivians. "Our doors are open to refugees," he said. It is not known whether the embassy has already admitted opponents of the regime.

The Federal Government also welcomed Nicaragua's announcement that it intends to play a "very active role" within the Organization of American States in dealing with the Bolivian question. Nicaragua's Foreign Minister Miguel d'Escoto Brockmann, who has postponed his visit to Bonn because of the coup in Bolivia, informed the Federal Government of this in a letter.

A spokesman of the Federal Development Ministry added that Bolivia will receive no further promises of economic cooperation. Negotiations which had been planned to actualize recent promises have been suspended. Nor will any more experts be sent to Bolivia. At present 85 experts and development helpers are working in Bolivia. However, Bonn will not stop work on development projects which are of benefit mainly for the population in order "not to impose additional punishment on the people."

FRG ATTACHES 'GREAT SIGNIFICANCE' TO EUROPEAN-ARAB DIALOGUE

LD261100 Hamburg DPA in German 0713 GMT 26 Jul 80

[Excerpts] Bonn--The European-Arab dialogue is to be activated as soon as possible by the EC foreign ministers. This was how Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling outlined the standpoint of Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt on a European contribution to a settlement of the Middle East problems in an interview with DPA today.

From the very beginning the Federal Government has attached great significance to this dialogue. Arab League Secretary General Chedli Klibi, who was in Bonn this week, the federal chancellor and Foreign Minister Genscher were all of the opinion that this dialogue should be activated as soon as possible and that a political dimension should be added to it so that possibilities of wide-ranging cooperation--economic, cultural and political--between the two groups of states could be opened up. This could be seen as an example to other groups of states and as a "fundamental contribution" to stability in the Near and Middle East.

TERRORISTS' PLANNED ATTACK ON SCHMIDT REPORTED

LD272025 Hamburg DPA in German 1908 GMT 27 Jul 80

[Excerpts] Hamburg/Stuttgart--Tomorrow's edition of DIE WELT, quoting information from the Federal Criminal Investigation Office (BKA), reports that BKA officials believe there is an "acute danger" of a terrorist attack being planned to murder a political or business leader or security official. Investigations after the fatal accident of alleged terrorists Juliane Plambeck and Wolfgang Beer demonstrated that both had been acting as couriers in connection with a planned assassination.

SPIEGEL magazine in Hamburg reports that security officials possess tangible evidence that preparations were afoot to attack Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt. It says that experts believe that the terrorists are able to strike at only one leading politician or high official. Their hard core numbers only about 20 men and women. A Federal Interior Ministry spokesman refused to "join in speculations about the targets of terrorists or to reveal relevant information."

SPIEGEL reports that security experts had concrete indications that terrorists were preparing to bomb Federal Chancellor Schmidt. Security officials were confirmed in this theory by evidence found in the Paris apartment of five alleged German women terrorists.

DIE WELT also reported that the BKA believes in the wake of the Paris arrests that the terrorists planned to set a booby trap and try to blow up a passing car by remote control.

DIE WELT: SCHMIDT MOSCOW TRIP FOILS ARMS GAP CLOSURE

DW251125 Bonn DIE WELT in German 25 Jul 80 p 7

[Hans Ruehle article: "Schmidt Passed the Buck to America"]

[Text] When somebody takes a trip somewhere he usually has tales to tell. This is not true for the German chancellor after his return from Moscow. His government statement, especially with respect to the field of the medium-range [missile] problem, was so sparse that not only the opposition had a hard time coming up with a detailed reply, but the Soviet Union too found itself forced to supply explanatory statements nearly day by day.

The more specific the Soviet Union became, the more modest was the rhetoric of the chancellor in this matter. And not only that, ever since DIE WELT publicized the minutes of the Moscow talks and thus shed light on questions of substance of the visit, it has also become obvious that Helmut Schmidt's report on the tone of the talks was plainly done up in his favor. Granted, as reported in the Bundestag, Schmidt lived up to his Venice mandate and spoke with the Soviets in no uncertain terms about Afghanistan, but then he came to feel what it means to negotiate with representatives of a world power which feels superior militarily and which believes in its political mission.

The uncompromising language of the Soviets in the negotiations and reliable reports on the feelings of the German delegation alone would have demanded an analysis of the only thing that could be sold as a success, at least after the publication of the minutes: the new offer of talks of medium-range systems. Then it would have become obvious earlier that the new offer is in substance what the tone in which it was advanced was bound to convey: a tall order.

The Conflict With Washington Is Programmed

Prior to the chancellor's trip to Moscow the potential landscape of negotiations in the field of nuclear medium-range systems was this:

In his East Berlin speech of 6 October 1979 party boss Brezhnev had declared his readiness to negotiate on medium-range nuclear weapons in Europe, provided no additional medium-range U.S. weapons were stationed in Western Europe, meaning that the NATO decision on the closure of the arms gap not be adopted. Consequently, the Soviet Union reacted in the expected negative manner to the NATO decision of 12 December 1979 which, apart from the intention to close the arms gap, contained an offer to the Soviet Union to negotiate on the ground-based nuclear medium-range systems. The Soviet Union demanded as a precondition for the opening of corresponding negotiations the retraction, or at least the de facto suspension, of the decision to close the arms gap.

In the same speech Brezhnev formulated the alternative hinted at several times earlier, namely to negotiate the whole problem of nuclear medium-range systems within the framework of SALT III. But the condition for this was the enactment of the SALT II treaty which U.S. President Carter shelved for the time being following the Soviet Union's invasion of Afghanistan. Besides, the Soviet Union had pointed out several times that in the event of a round of negotiations by the big powers on the whole medium-range problem, the corresponding weapons systems of the alliance partners (especially France and England) would have to be included.

It has been established in the meantime that the two offers continue to be valid in their specific forms. What has been added as a new offer is the Soviet proposal to negotiate in bilateral talks between the United States and the Soviet Union on the nuclear medium-range weapons of the two big powers with the inclusion of the so-called forward based systems, meaning the forward based nuclear means of attack which the United States has. What will not be included in the talks, in contrast, are British, French and Chinese nuclear weapons. Agreements resulting from these bilateral talks, however, can be put into force only after the ratification of SALT II.

If we compare the old offers with the new proposal with respect to the negotiations and/or the course of talks, then it becomes evident that the procedure decisive element is inherent in the changed conditions. While the offers to date contained preconditions to be fulfilled essentially by European NATO states--the suspension of the decision on closing the arms gap in one case and the inclusion of the French and British nuclear weapons in SALT III negotiations in the other--the offer of bilateral talks which has been advanced, requiring the ratification of SALT II to be the first agreement, thus depends only on a precondition to be fulfilled exclusively by the United States.

By this trick the United States first of all is saddled with the responsibility for the implementation of NATO's decision on closing the arms gap which hitherto rested with the European NATO states (which has been noted in the United States, to be sure). But this is not all. In this manner the Schmidt government has succeeded in burdening the implementation of the decision to close the arms gap with a precondition of which it must assume, in view of the current situation in the United States, that it just cannot be fulfilled. [paragraph continues]

For the foreseeable future there will probably not be a majority in Congress for the ratification of SALT II. Hence the new offer is an almost definite guarantee that the disliked decision on closing the arms gap need not be implemented.

The positive assessment of the Soviet proposal by the German chancellor can be understood in the United States only in such a way that this involves a German-Soviet consensus for enforcing the ratification of SALT II or for hollowing out NATO's decision on closing the arms gap. Viewed against this background it will probably be hard for U.S. politicians in the future--and the initial reactions illustrate this--to demand seriously and publicly the ratification of SALT II. Since the responsibility for the implementation of the decision on closing the arms gap has been shifted in the manner shown, the next German-American conflict is probably already programmed. CDU defense expert Manfred Woerner has pointed out that in the future the Soviet Union and the Federal Republic will jointly demand the ratification of SALT II in an "unholy alliance." And in the event that SALT II is not ratified, the same "unholy alliance" will state that the implementation of the NATO decision on closing the arms gap is not possible because the United States has failed to fulfill preconditions and, therefore, has prevented the success of negotiations.

But it is more than uncertain whether the ratification of SALT II will be the last obstacle to the conclusion of a treaty on the problem of nuclear medium-range systems in Europe. Regardless of the fulfillment of this condition for the conclusion of the bilateral talks, the contents of these conditions have been so expanded by the inclusion of the U.S. forward based systems (FBS)--an inclusion which the chancellor received with "understanding" and termed "logical"--that a conclusion cannot be anticipated in view of the complicated matters involved.

To this day there has not even been a common definition of these systems between East and West. Opinions differ already on the roughest classification. While the Soviet Union includes among the U.S.' FBS airplanes carrying nuclear weapons of the United States in Europe, nuclear weapons carrying planes aboard U.S. aircraft carriers in European waters and U.S. submarines carrying missiles subordinated to the European NATO Supreme Command, NATO rules the latter category out totally. So far agreement has only been reached on one single characteristic definition feature: The systems must be able to reach the Soviet Union directly--and in the case of planes they must be able to fly back to their own alliance territory.

But this is only where the problems begin. On the one hand, there are different ideas between East and West about the range of individual types of airplanes. But how should this question ever be solved without letting the Soviet Union either have all technical details about the airplanes in question or even such a plane for test purposes? And what is more, if we take Western data as a basis, then U.S. carrier airplanes in the Mediterranean can reach the Soviet Union only if the carrier cruises in the eastern Mediterranean. The F-4 planes capable of carrying nuclear weapons can reach Soviet territory only from air bases in Italy, Greece and Turkey. Thus under the definition to date, the U.S. aircraft carrier planes would not be FBS if the carrier is not in the eastern Mediterranean. And consequently the F-4 would not be FBS if they are not stationed at air bases in the countries listed above.

If we proceed from the premise that any U.S. airplane with nuclear weapons capability in Europe and even overseas can be ordered to Italy, Greece, or Turkey at comparatively short notice, a definition of the problem loses any reasonable dimension completely, meaning a dimension capable of negotiation. Therefore it is not surprising that there is not a single Western expert right now who seriously advocates the view that the inclusion of the FBS can be incorporated into acceptable negotiating positions even on a medium-term basis, let alone that it is possible to achieve an accord on this with the Soviet Union within the time schedule for the closure of the arms gap beginning in 1983.

Naturally the Soviet Union is aware of this as well, the Soviet Union which has demanded the inclusion of the FBS in the SALT negotiations since 1969. For it now to propose the FBS for negotiations in primarily in order to fix for negotiating policy purposes the price wrought from Schmidt in Moscow for future talks. This means that now and in the future the FBS will be part of the Western negotiating substance without the Soviet Union having to enlarge the contents of its offer in the field of nuclear medium-range weapons.

Beyond that the Soviet Union has concrete goals in negotiation policy which it pursues on a long-term basis--as always. When PRAVDA on 15 July points out in connection with the FBS discussion that the United States is capable of relocating nuclear airplanes on short notice to places from which the Soviet Union could be attacked, then the primary goal of the Soviet Union becomes evident: a ban on specific West European bases for use by U.S. nuclear planes and thus in effect control over flight movements and deployment decisions in the NATO area.

The same applies to the problem of nuclear planes aboard aircraft carriers in the Mediterranean. In that respect it is the Soviet intention to achieve the banishment of U.S. planes from the eastern Mediterranean and thus not only to obtain a control right over U.S. ship movements, but also to accelerate the military destabilization of that region.

But this is not all. Finally and above all the Soviet Union obviously feels that the creeping deterioration of the U.S.-European relationship might produce the chance for initiating Europe's nuclear separation via an isolation, reduction and finally elimination of the U.S. nuclear attack potential in Europe. It is especially for this reason--but also for the sake of ensuring approval for its offers of talks by the parties not involved--that the Soviet Union has waived the demand for inclusion of the British and French nuclear weapons.

But why did the chancellor accept this offer in view of these problems? The answer is easy. Schmidt wanted negotiations--and the FBS were the price. There was no haggling over that. Thus the chancellor did not counter by calling for the inclusion of corresponding Soviet weapons systems.

In view of Schmidt's actions in Moscow, the Soviet Union may assume that in the talks that have been offered all NATO nuclear medium-range systems including the U.S. FBS will be on the negotiating table while the Soviet Union on its part need only contribute the SS-20, the old SS-4 and SS-5 missiles and perhaps in addition the Backfire bomber.

This means that on NATO's part in effect the whole nuclear attacking systems which have a penetrating depth of about 800 kilometers on are up for debate while the whole Soviet medium-range nuclear bombers (450 Blinders and Badgers), parts of the Soviet Union's tactical air forces with nuclear armament (200 Fencers), and the new "short-range missiles" SS-22--all of which have a penetration depth of 1,000 kilometers and thus can operate beyond the Rhine from the Soviet Union--are not counted. This is part of the lasting gift which Schmidt brought back from Moscow.

Granted, the people around him have been trying lately to remove the impression that the chancellor purposefully meant only the SS-20, the SS-4, SS-5 and the Backfire bomber when he referred to "corresponding Soviet systems." Yet this is beyond any doubt. Besides, the Soviet Union would never have allowed any other interpretation of "corresponding systems" since Soviet FBS are currently nonexistent (all Soviet systems which can reach the United States have been subject to negotiation under SALT).

These considerations necessarily lead to a comparison of the numerical bases for the old and new negotiation proposals. [paragraph continues]

No matter how the old starting base was computed, the superiority of the Soviet Union always amounted to more than the 572 additional systems demanded under the NATO decision. Hence the Soviet argument that the existing power ratio must be upheld can always be countered by the effective argument that this ratio is imbalanced to the disadvantage of the West.

This starting situation has drastically changed as a result of the new Soviet offer. Since the offer on both sides relates only to "medium-range missile weapons in Europe" (PRAVDA of 15 July 1980) and U.S. FBS, what now exists--projected to the year 1983, the year the arms gap closure begins--is a ratio of 650 eastern systems (200 SS-20, 450 SS-4, and SS-5) and at least 350 Western systems (160 F-111, 200 F-4 and/or carrier planes). Even now the Soviet Union claims that the number of U.S. FBS is near 500. Even though the West has always rejected this mode of counting and the criteria of definition on which it is based, one will realistically have no alternative but to have about 350 U.S. systems classified and counted as FBS.

This means no more nor less than that even in the event of the inclusion of the Backfire bombers, the West's requirements for closing the arms gap in this round cannot be set at more than 300 systems. The chancellor thus in effect cut the material part of the decision on the arms gap closure in half in Moscow, since nobody can seriously assume that the West European states could be persuaded to seek more than "parity" in the medium-range sector and engage in an "overarmament." Thus when one speaks of closing the arms gap in connection with the new offer of negotiations, it is at best 300 systems and not 572 which will be at stake in the future.

But anyone who believes that Schmidt allowed himself to be outsmarted in Moscow is wrong. The chancellor wanted negotiations at nearly any cost--and he got them. Meanwhile, he is not concerned that the envisaged talks will proceed from a starting basis which he has essentially worsened. The complicated matter of the FBS guarantees him the necessary beginning and signals to him a late--or even no--end to the negotiations. And as long as negotiations are underway, no closing of the arms gap is done.

Though this is being denied, and though it is being recalled at every opportunity that the old schedule for the implementation of the decision on the closure of the arms gap will remain unchanged, that is to say that the deployment of the first systems will be started in late 1983, this is not even a good intention, because even the chancellor knows that none of the NATO states participating in the NATO decision will deploy new weapons systems of a special military and political quality if even a vague negotiating success is in sight--or which is more probable, if the Soviet Union makes a modest concession but at the same time threatens to discontinue negotiations if the closure of the arms gap is begun. Hence a potential closure of the arms gap has been shifted to a remote distance.

It will be shown very soon that all other West European states share this assessment of the situation. Hence what people in the opposition assume will not happen: that the governments that had hitherto held a critical attitude toward the decision on closing the arms gap will no longer approve of the material part of this decision. The opposite will be true. This has been clearly evident since the Bonn visit by Luxembourg Prime Minister Werner last week. In harmony and to a massive extent all West European states will in future demand the full implementation of the decision on closing the arms gap, being perfectly aware that the procedural preconditions and the inclusion of the FBS have created a negotiating situation which probably cannot be resolved in a positive manner in the foreseeable future.

It turned out on the occasion of the Bonn and Brussels visits by U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Christopher that the United States has indeed noticed the cuckoo's egg which Schmidt dropped in its nest with the inclusion of the FBS. Obviously irritated, he let everybody know that the positive reception of the Soviet proposal on Schmidt's part is not at all to the liking of the United States. He stated at a press conference that the United States continues to be convinced "that in the course of the introductory talks one should concentrate on the ground-based, long-range Eurostrategic systems."

POLL SHOWS SCHMIDT LEADING GERMAN ELECTION RACE

[Gottfriend Capell article: "Poll: Schmidt Cannot Be Beaten"]

[Text] Bonn--Mannheim political scientist Prof Rudolf Wildenmann is convinced that Chancellor Schmidt cannot be deprived of his election victory on 5 October. Schmidt and therefore the SPD-FDP coalition, can hope for a maximum of 55 percent of the votes as against a mere 42 percent for the CDU/CSU. Wildenmann's survey for the lates edition of the economic journal CAPITAL showed a great lead for the government and the coalition, especially in political fields in which the CDU/CSU had been considered particularly trustworthy and competent up to now. Wildenmann's survey dates back to April/May this year and covers 2,000 people interviewed. This circle of people has remained essentially unchanged for the past 5 years, so that in Wildenmann's opinion the result clearly indicates any change in the development of opinion;in the FRG. In this connection the following can be considered sensational: 53 percent of those interviewed saw the SPD as "more likely to maintain a good relationship with the United States." Only 45 percent said so for the Union. The proportion was the reverse a year agao: SPD 41 percent, CDU/CSU 45 percent.

This development becomes even a bit plainer in the question on which party is more likely "to guarantee security against a Russian attack": SPD 48, Union 41 percent. The 1976 figures were SPD 45, Union 51 percent. The question concerning the guaranteeing of price stability today is answered by 55 percent in favor of the SPD and only 42 percent in favor of the CDU/CSU. The situation 4 years ago was that the SPD received only 40 percent whereas the CDU scored 54 percent. As for combating unemployment, 58 percent have more confidence in the SPD while 40 percent anticipate more from the Union.

This is strikingly at odds with the conviction of the CDU leadership in Bonn's Konrad Adenauer house who continues to advocate the view that the voters accord them the greater "competence."

Details became known in Bonn yesterday of an Imnid poll which, like Wildenmann's survey, was made in April/May and which involved the same number of people interviewed, namely, 2,005. According to this poll, the Union with regard to the friendship with the United States continued to be in the lead with 12 percent ahead of the SPD. Likewise, 13 percent more citizens had more confidence in the CDU and the CSU with regard to the overall field of external security. In safeguarding pensions the Union is 4 percent ahead of the SPD, and in combating inflation 7 percent. Bonn quarters explain the different results by saying that Professor Wildenmann, unlike other pollers, does not "weight" his "rought data" from the surveys.

Wildenmann, by the way, made a point of stating that the statements concerning the outcome of the Bundestag elections are orientation figures. The 49 percent for the CDU/CSU and the 7 percent for the Free Democrats are a minimum. He stated the margin of error to be 2 percent. Despite being asked, he failed to solve the contradiction that by making the maximum for the SPD relative and including the margin of error, the strength of the SPD and the CDU/CSU could be approximately equal. He insisted that the lower limit for the SPD was 46 percent. For this reason it is as good as certain that the social Democrats will become the strongest party.

Wildenman attributed this state of affairs to the popularity difference between the two top candidates Schmidt and Strauss, among other things. Answering the questions as to who should be chancellor, 70 percent voted for Schmidt and only 21 percent for Strauss.

KING HUSAYN ARRIVES IN PARIS ON UNOFFICIAL VISIT

NC271702 Paris AFP in English 1651 GMT 27 Jul 80

[Text] Paris, July 27 (AFP)--King Husayn of Jordan arrived here today for a two-day unofficial visit that will include talks with French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing. After his visit here, King Husayn will travel to Bonn and then to Rome. Sources in his entourage said he did not intend to go to Cairo Tuesday for the funeral for the ex-shah of Iran.

FRENCH-ROMANIAN COMMUNIQUE ON CEAUSESCU VISIT CITED

LD260832 Paris Domestic Service in French 0600 GMT 26 Jul 80

[Text] Romanian President Nicolae Ceausescu ended his official visit to France last night. The international situation--Afghanistan and European disarmament in particular--was discussed, and the summit enabled the drawing up of very close analyses. Regarding important international matters, the French and Romanians drew up extremely close analyses, a fact which prompts them to continue the established privileged dialogue which, moreover, will make them soon emerge as the ones with the proposals to lessen tension and bring about a reduction in the accumulation of arms. It will be a coordinated action, (?first in Paris), and soon after also in Madrid. The Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe [word indistinct] will meet a third time after Helsinki and Belgrade, and Paris, which insists strongly on observance of all aspects of this security and cooperation including human rights, will require that the 35, and the big powers, first of all, show goodwill in facts and actions to demonstrate their desire to succeed in eliminating the significant arms surplus.

Also noted after the visit by the Romanian president to France was the paragraph of the joint communique regarding Afghanistan: A problem to settle without foreign interference, the text states, that is without Soviet troops. A few words on trade between the two states: It will have to be doubled by 1985. Finally, the problem of divided families: The French line consists in efficiency rather than publicity being used to settle these human dramas.

FRANCOIS-PONCET'S VISIT TO TANZANIA REVIEWED

LD250919 Paris LE MONDE in French 23 Jul 80 p 4

[Jean-Pierre Langellier dispatch: "Mr Francois-Poncet's visit to Tanzania Has Confirmed the Normalization of Paris-Dar es Salaam Relations"]

[Excerpts] Dar es Salaam--"Dialogue has been resumed... Misunderstandings have been dispelled....A good understanding now prevails between us." These statements picked out of a speech made by Mr Jean Francois-Poncet expressing satisfaction are fully consistent with the cordiality prevailing during his 3-day official visit to Tanzania which ended on 21 July.

Before meeting [Tanzanian Finance Minister] Jamal and being received Monday afternoon by President Nyerere, Mr Francois-Poncet had two talks with his Tanzanian counterpart. The future of Southern Africa is causing special concern to the Tanzanian leaders who have long been engaged in the struggle for the continent's complete decolonization. During his talk with Francois-Poncet, Nyerere emphasized the need for a quick solution to the problem of Namibia--a prerequisite, in his opinion, for a reduction in the tensions prevailing in the region.

As a "frontline" state, Tanzania relies on France to exert, in conjunction with its Western partners, pressures likely to persuade Pretoria to accept the plan prepared by the United Nations. It has been encouraged in this by France's condemnation of the recent South African raids into Angola.

President Nyerere urged Mr Francois-Poncet to pursue the negotiations started between Pretoria and the "contact group" (Canada and France) aimed at ensuring free elections under international control with the participation of the South-West African People's Organization [SWAPO], the Namibian liberation movement. In his traditional 14 July message Nyerere paid a tribute, which attracted considerable attention, to France's role within the group of five. Tanzania's moderate and conciliatory attitude toward this problem stands in contrast with some sharper statements--especially during the recent OAU summit in Freetown--by representatives of several other frontline countries, in particular Angola and Mozambique.

Mr Nyerere expects mainly financial and technological aid from France. Having neglected Tanzania too long, and, for that matter, English-speaking Africa as a whole, the French Government has recently concluded two important financial protocols with it. The first, signed in September 1979, concerns the outfitting and enlarging of Dar es Salaam airport (worth FR125 million), which have been entrusted to the Paris "Aeroport" company. It includes 10 percent in grants and 40 percent in loans from the treasury, granted at very favorable rates. The second, concluded in February, will finance the construction of a glassworks in Mwanza. Creusot-Loire has cooperated in the construction of a textile factory to be opened in a few days' time at Musoma. The Scee-Alsthom company has built the link between Zanzibar's electricity grid and the rest of the continent.

On the other hand, trade diminished by 30 percent in 1979. France is only Tanzania's 11th-most-important trading partner and its 14th supplier. This decline is largely a result of the restrictive measures adopted by Dar es Salaam in foreign trade. The extremely favorable payment and credit terms demanded by the Tanzanian Government are making the French small-and medium-sized businesses, whose means are often limited, hesitant.

Cultural and technological aid is still very modest (less than FR3 million). There are 15 French teachers in Tanzania. This country therefore hopes for strengthened cultural cooperation as a means of rapprochement with French-speaking Africa. "The Tanzanian leaders have taken the French-speaking aspect into consideration," Mr Francois-Poncet points out. "They realize that Paris has much closer relations with its former colonies than London does." As he left Tanzania Mr Francois-Poncet had the feeling that French policy was "better understood" there by interlocutors who are now "willing to heed us."

LE MONDE SEES WEU AS VEHICLE FOR FRG ARMAMENT, EUROPEAN DEFENSE

[Editorial: "Encouraging German Armaments"]

[Text] The decision adopted by the Western European Union [WEU] Council on 21 July to do away with restrictions imposed on FRG warship tonnage in 1954 is bound to give a new impetus, especially in France, to the perennial polemics about German armaments. In Tuesday's L'HUMANITE, Seine Senator Boucheny expressed his anxiety by asking "what attitude will the Elysee adopt toward this?": Obviously the attitude to adopt has already been decided since the WEU decision was made unanimously by the seven member states (the FRG, Belgium, France, Britain, Italy, the Netherlands and Luxembourg).

The seven believe that no parliamentary ratification is necessary and that their action is not inconsistent with any treaty. They had not abrogated the protocol by which restrictions were imposed on FRG armaments but have merely abrogated some of these restrictions. This they are entitled to do by voting unanimously in favor of such a change.

This is not the first time that the FRG has obtained such relief authorized "in stages" but this time it is a question of a "stage" of much greater significance than the previous ones. It is an entire category of restrictions that is disappearing. According to the Brussels Treaty, which was modified by the 1954 London and Paris agreements (whose purpose was to provide a framework for German rearmament), the FRG was not allowed to build warships of more than 3,000 tons or submarines of more than 1,800 tons, the only exceptions being eight destroyers of up to 6,000 tons and a training ship of 5,000 tons. These provisions have now been scrapped.

However, the Germans are still forbidden to build long-range missiles and strategic bombers and to acquire any nuclear, biological and chemical arms.

The Bonn government was not short of arguments in support of its demand that naval restrictions be abolished. First, a political argument: The WEU Council has emphasized that its decision will lead to an improvement in the "Atlantic alliance's defense capability." Since the FRG contributes most to allied defense in Europe as far as conventional forces are concerned, how can it be forbidden in this period of tension to further increase its contribution? By intervening in Afghanistan, the Kremlin has facilitated German rearmament in the same way as it did during the "cold war" period.

An economic argument: As a result of having to ask for regulations to be altered so that it could build certain types of ships, Germany has found itself handicapped in foreign markets.

And, finally, a psychological argument: Any "discriminatory" provision limiting German armaments is humiliating.

Do people want--yes or no--to see a truly European defense progress? Let us recall that such a defense was given an important place in General de Gaulle's European plans which, however, have not been implemented and have remained a dead letter of the Franco-German cooperation treaty. Only one European defense organization--the WEU--is capable of progressing.

However, any reactivation presupposes technical and political changes of which former FRG Defense Minister von Hassel has become an advocate. Since France is more sensitive than any other European country to anything that relates to German armaments, would it not be to its advantage to take some initiatives toward activating an organization which it wanted; which, in accordance with its wishes, is not supranational, but which has remained inactive for the past 25 years?

USSR TRADE OFFICIALS BREZHNEV, OSIPOV MEET MANCA ON GAS TRADE

Brezhnev Meeting on Credits

LD251625 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 23 Jul 80 p 14

[Unattributed report: "Soviet Deputy Minister in Rome; We Are Buying More in the USSR but Not Selling Much There"]

[Text] Rome--In the first half of the current year Soviet exports to Italy underwent a much greater increase than Italian exports to the USSR. If this trend in exchanges continues at the same rate by the end of 1980 the balance of trade between the countries could be $1.5 billion in the Soviet Union's favor. This was stated by Yuriy Brezhnev, USSR first deputy minister of foreign trade, at a meeting with Foreign Trade Minister Enrico Manca, at which problems of trade and cooperation between the countries were examined.

Having stressed the importance of the new agreement signed a few days ago with the Italian Iron and Steel Finance Corporation, Brezhnev announced that the Soviet Union will be building the world's largest gas pipeline in the next few years and expressed the Soviet Government's interest in Italian industry's assuming a substantial share of the work. Last, Brezhnev and Salimowski [not further identified] expressed the hope of being able to enjoy more flexible credit terms and within this framework they stated the Soviet government's interest in the granting of another line of Italian credit to the USSR.

Minister Manca said he was convinced that the tensions that have emerged on the political plane "must not have automatic repercussions on the plane of economic relations, whose development can indeed contribute to the resumption of the hoped-for international detente process." Manca stressed Italy's great interest in trade with the Soviet Union, "both with regard to the quality of our imports, which are mainly energy materials, and with regard to the characteristics of our exports to the USSR (technology, plant, industrial machinery)." "The foreign trade minister," Manca said, "is studying the possibility of a new line of credit and will submit future proposals in this connection for joint examination by the government."

Last, the minister recalled the considerable increase in credits which were granted to the Soviet Union in past years and strongly emphasized the need for the granting of possible further credits to be balanced by a specific Soviet commitment to buy more in Italy, so as to drastically reduce our present balance of trade deficit. In the next few days Manca will be meeting with Soviet Deputy Minister of Foreign Trade Osipov.

Osipov on Pipeline Project

AU261425 Rome ANSA in English 0830 GMT 26 Jul 80

[Text] Rome, 26 Jul (ANSA)--The Soviet deputy foreign trade minister, Yuriy Osipov, has informed Italian Foreign Trade Minister Enrico Manca of Moscow's intention to go ahead with the construction of a 5,500 kilometer long pipeline to transport 50 billion cubic meters of natural gas from Siberia to Western Europe annually.

The Soviet note indicated that ten billion cubic meters of the fuel will be earmarked for Poland, Czechoslovakia and East Germany, three countries that the pipeline will pass through, and that the remaining 40 billion cubic meters will be for sale to Western Europe. The Soviets expect to sell the natural gas to Italy, France, West Germany and Austria, countries which already receive Soviet natural gas.

The communique added that the immense project, slated for completion in the three-year period 1981-83, might be of interest to a number of Italian companies. Osipov mentioned Finsider, the state-owned steel company which produces pipes capable of withstanding 100 atmospheres pressure, and Nuovo Pignone, a part of the national energy agency holding which could bid on the 42 booster stations called for in the pipeline project.

By 1986, the target date for operations for piping 40 billion cubic meters of natural gas per year, a part of the fuel sent to Italy could be swapped for Italian hardware for the Soviet oil industry.

Deputy Minister Osipov has held talks with Italy's state industries minister, Gianni De Michelis, the chairman of the IRI state holding, Pietro Sette, the chairman of the Ente Nationale Idrocarburi, Elio Grandi and the Finsider chairman, Aldo Capanna.

In his note to Manca, the deputy minister took up the issue of credits connected to the pipeline project. The Italian minister responded with a statement of his nation's "keen interest" at the prospect of new natural gas supplies from the Soviet Union and in connection with possible participation in the pipeline construction job for Italian industries.

Manca assured the Soviet official that the entire issue will be discussed by the Rome cabinet and voiced the hope that bilateral discussions could begin in the near future for sounding out the technical and financial aspects of the project.

PARLIAMENT REJECTS SECRETS CHARGES AGAINST COSSIGA

AU271930 Rome ANSA in English 1830 GMT 27 Jul 80

[Excerpt] Rome, July 27 (ANSA)--A joint session of the Italian Senate and lower house voted Sunday 535 to 370 to shelve allegations that Premier Francesco Cossiga disclosed official secrets..

The vote came at the end of five days of debate on the Donat-Cattin affair involving charges that the premier had tipped off former Christian Democrat (DC) Party Secretary Carlo Donat-Cattin that his son, Marco, was sought by police on terrorism charges, thus enabling the alleged terrorist to escape capture.

In rejecting the charge that Cossiga had violated the official secrets act, Parliament also preempted the second request, one charging that the premier aided and abetted the escape of Marco Donat-Cattin, thought to be an activitst in Italy's Prima Linea (Front Line) terrorist organization.

The request to continue investigation into the entire affair was also rejected Sunday by a vote of 507 to 416.

The case broke two months ago when Turin magistrates sent the statements made to police by Roberto Sandalo, an alleged Front Line terrorist, to the special parliamentary commission with the responsibility for parliamentary immunity.

Sandalo's confession indicated that Cossiga met with the ex-deputy secretary of his party in April on the request of Carlo Donat-Cattin, who was seeking information on his son, Marco. According to Sandalo, Donat-Cattin senior asked about judiciary proceedings against his son and was told, by the premier, that it [would] be timely for Marco to leave the country.

CABINET-FOREIGN MINISTRY NOTE ON ALGIERS COMMUNIQUE

LD252224 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1900 GMT 25 Jul 80

[Text] In connection with a communique released in Algiers yesterday following the release of 15 Portuguese fishermen detained by the Polisoria Front, the presidency of the Council of Ministers and the Foreign Ministry have issued a joint note making it clear that they only subscribe in part to the joint communique signed yesterday in the Algerian capital.

The note adds: In view of the very special circumstances in which the negotiations over the fishermen's release took place, the communique signed in Algiers overstepped, in some aspects and in the way it was couched, the general guidelines laid down by the Portuguese Government. In these circumstances, the ministerial note states, the Portuguese Government considers itself bound only to those parts of the communique which reflect its stand on the matter, that is, the nonrecognition of the Saharan Democratic Arab Republic or of its government. The Portuguese Government also does not subscribe to any passage in the said communique likely to be viewed as a hostile or unfriendly attitude toward Morocco, whose acceptance of the need for a negotiated settlement of the Saharan conflict deserves the approval of the Portuguese Government.

The note further states that while accepting a stand in favor of self-determination for the Western Sahara and its people, the Portuguese Government decided, after having twice analyzed the situation of the Portuguese fishermen, not to accept any conditions likely to imply, directly or indirectly, the recognition of the Saharan Democratic Arab Republic or its government because such a recognition would be premature, in that it would also deviate from a stand of strict neutrality and might, on the other hand, be regarded as a hostile act against Morocco.

Meanwhile, Morocco was quick to react to the joint communique released in Algiers yesterday. Thus, Jose Joaquim Mendonca, the Portuguese ambassador in Morocco, was this morning summoned to the Moroccan Foreign Ministry where he was asked to explain Portugal's move. After the meeting, the Portuguese ambassador said that he had explained to the Moroccan authorities the circumstances under which the Algiers joint communique had been signed, the terms of which, he underlined, went beyond the instructions given by Lisbon to Luis Fontoura.

Moroccan official circles, while appearing to be satisfied with the explanations provided by the Portuguese ambassador, have so far declined to comment on the matter, and indicated that a detailed report on the whole affair is to be handed to King Hassan II today.

GOVERNMENT PREPARING FOR NEGOTIATIONS ON U.S. MILITARY PACT

ID241446 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1130 GMT 24 Jul 80

[Text] The Spanish Government is now preparing the basic criteria it will defend during the forthcoming negotiations with the United States for an extension of the military cooperation treaty which expires in September 1981. The first deputy prime minister dealing with matters of defense and security, Lt. Gen. Gutierrez Mellado, chaired a meeting last Tuesday devoted to the topic, which was attended by officials responsible for Spain's defense policy. Present were Lt. Gen. Alfaro Arregui, the ministers of foreign affairs and defnese, Spanish ambassador to the United States, Jose Llado and Spain's representative at the forthcoming Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, Javier Ruperez.

The subject of Spain's joining the EEC was also discussed at the meeting since this is closely linked to the renewal of the Spanish-U.S. agreements. The negotiations between Spain and the United States will begin formally next September.

The Spanish Minister made this statement shortly before leaving for Salzburg, after a 2-day official visit to Vienna. Marcelino Oreja added that to establish diplomatic relations with Israel now would introduce an imblance into the situation.

PCE'S CARRILLO COMMENTS ON EXPLOSIVES THEFT, NATO ENTRY

ID262211 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1800 GMT 26 Jul 80

[Text] In the presence of a group of journalists, PCE Secretary General Santiago Carrillo, who today is visiting several towns in Albacete Province, criticized the present government with regard to the robbery of nearly 8,000 kilograms of Goma-2 plastic explosives in Santander. Carrillo said that terrorism is the main problem faced by the government, regarding which it has shown its complicity or stupidity. The PCE secretary general later said that one cannot understand why only two rural policemen were guarding the explosives depot.

In these statements to journalists the PCE leader also emphasized that his party is achieving its objectives in the eyes of the Spanish public and he forecast that in the next elections, the PCE will win 4 million votes at the expense of the Spanish Socialist Workers Party and the Union of the Democratic Center.

Referring to his well-known thesis of a government of consensus, the PCE leader said that being a minister does not appeal to him, but it is necessary for capable people of various political tendencies to enter the government.

Another subject touched upon by Carrillo was the desirability of Spanish entry into NATO. The entry of our country into NATO is a folly, above all if our neutrality during the two world wars is taken into account. This position of neutrality would also favor us, Carrillo said in conclusion, in our relations with the Arab countries and would prevent our national economy from becoming like a Third World economy, thus adding a series of problems to those we already have.

GOVERNMENT PROTESTS TO WALDHEIM OVER TURKISH STATEMENTS

NC261852 Nicosia Domestic Service in English 1630 GMT 26 Jul 80

[Text] The Cyprus Government has brought to the notice of the UN secretary general the recent inflammatory and provocative statements by the former Turkish foreign minister, Mr Gunes, and the Turkish Cypriot leader, Mr Denktas.

In a letter to Mr Waldheim, the acting permanent representative of Cyprus to the United Nations, Mr Sierifis, said Mr Gunes' statement reveals beyond any doubt Turkey's expansionist aims since he made in clear that the 1974 Turkish invasion of Cyprus was carried out because of the island's strategic importance. Mr Sierifis said the Turkish statements created new insurmountable obstacles to Mr Waldheim's efforts for the resumption of meaningful intercommunal talks. The Cypriot delegate also said that Mr Denktas on 23 July raised a number of issues which were anything but conducive to the resumption of the talks.

Mr Sierifis remarked in his letter: While strongly protesting on behalf of my government against the content and purport of these statements, I wish to reiterate our full support for your excellency's efforts for the resumption of the intercommunal talks on the basis of the 10-point agreement of May 1979, which incorporates the February 1977 guidelines, as well as the UN resolutions on Cyprus.

MITSOTAKIS STATES U.S. BASES WILL ONLY OPERATE UNDER NATO

AT251230 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 25 Jul 80 p 1

[Text] Operation of U.S. bases in Greece is only understandable within the framework of NATO. This well-known position of the Greek Government, with the addition that expansion of the role of U.S. facilities in Greece has not been discussed, was reiterated by Foreign Minister K. Mitsotakis as a result of an afternoon press report published yesterday.

According to this report:

The Americans are asking Greece for bases which will provide the maximum of facilities but without any exchanges on their part;

The Americans refuse to accept that the question of Greece's return to NATO is connected to the question of bases; and

The Americans consider that they have undertaken no obligation for the preservation of the Aegean balance of power.

Mitsotakis made the following statement:

"The Greek Government has made its position absolutely clear. According to this position the American facilities in Greece are only understandable and can operate as part of the joint allied defense within the framework of NATO. This position has been understood and accepted by the U.S. side. In reference to reports about the intent of the U.S. side to 'expand' the role of U.S. facilities in Greece, no such request has been presented today."

TO VIMA REPORTS U.S. DENIAL OF COMMITMENT ON AEGEAN BALANCE

AT271408 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 27 Jul 80 p 1

[Text] New York, 26 July--The United States is not "officially" committed to give military aid to Turkey and Greece in the ratio of 10.7 as was claimed--and officially stated recently--by the Greek Government.

A State Department spokesman to whom the relevant statement of a "responsible Greek source" in Athens was put for consideration, today made the following statement:

"This issue of a 10:7 ratio for aid has never and in no way been formalized, that is, there is no written agreement. Such a ratio (the giving of aid at the ratio of 10:7) that can be considered formal has never been made."

It is well known that the Greek Government has repeatedly claimed that the United States "has committed itself" to maintain the balance between Greece and Turkey in the Aegean and, commenting on reports which questioned this commitment, "responsible Greek sources" categorically stated on Wednesday: "There has been a bilateral agreement between Greece and the United States according to which military aid will be given to Greece and Turkey in the ratio of 7:10. Greece considers this agreement to be valid and binds the United States to respect the ratio."

"No, the United States is not bound in any way" the State Department spokesman answered and, in the discussion which followed, he claimed to TO VIMA:

"There is no such official agreement and, as is well known, the Congress could not possibly accept anything that would commit it with concrete numbers and length of validity."

Indeed the Congress steadfastly refuses to approve legislation of an economic nature that can bind Washington for a period of longer than a year and, in this specific instance--concerning aid to Turkey and Greece and so forth--it has systematically rejected repeated efforts both by the U.S. administration and some of its members to specify amounts of aid with a duration longer than the financial year to which these refer.

The State Department spokesman expressed the opinion that the Greek Government's "understanding" about a U.S. "commitment" to give military aid to Turkey and Greece in the proportion of 10:7 is based on the fact that "in 1976 the United States made a multi-year agreement with Turkey envisaging military aid worth $1 billion and made a similar agreement with Greece in 1977 envisaging military aid worth $700 million. Those agreements, however, were never approved.

The State Department spokesman reiterated rather emphatically:

"Consequently, no such official agreement exists."

The recent rather categorical statement of "responsible Greek sources" about a U.S. "commitment" on the issue of the ratio of aid to Turkey and Greece and, by extension, on the existence of a U.S. guarantee for maintaining balance in the Aegean has caused surprise and embarrassment.

In this connection State Department sources noted to TO VIMA everything which Secretary of State Muskie said on 26 June during the NATO conference in Ankara. At the time, in reply to a question by reporters who had asked him to explain "whether or not Washington and Athens had ever signed an agreement" stipulating the ratio of 7:10--the base which the Greek Government uses when it "asks for aid in this ratio"--Muskie, according to official indications, stated:

"I do not think there is any foundation for such a mathematical calculation. I did not discuss the issue in the bilateral talks I had with the Greek and Turkish ministers...."

PAPANDREOU REITERATES OPPOSITION TO NATO, BASES

AT261300 Athens EXORMISI in Greek 26 Jul 80 pp 1, 13

[Text] Two senior U.S. officers, emissaries from General Rogers, are expected in Athens during the second half of August in order to hand to the government the draft plan on new operational arrangements in the Aegean which automatically presuppose Greece's return to NATO's military wing. As reported, this new formula is nothing but a "formal" alteration of the second Haig-Davos plan of Verona which completely abolishes the status which applied for 60 whole years in the Aegean up to 1974 on the basis of international treaties.

Majority opposition leader and PASOK Chairman Andreas G. Papandreou made a statement as a result of the above report and underlined the dangers arising for our country. He added:

"There are increasing indications that both our country's return to NATO's military wing as well as the signing of the new Greek-U.S. agreement on bases are being pushed under pressure. PASOK is naturally resolutely positioned against our country's return to NATO's military wing. It is equally immovable on its resolve on the removal of foreign bases from our territory.

"We, however, wish to remind the government that:

"1. According to the constitution the responsibility for contracting international treaties and agreements, the implementation of which requires a law (articles 27,28 paragraph 2-3, 36 paragraph 2), exclusively rests with the representative of the legislative authority--the representatives of the nation [chamber of deputies]. It does not rest either with the president of the republic (article 36, paragraph 2)--whose authority, in any case, to contract international agreements is, in parliamentary democracies, purely formal--nor does it rest with the government which simply conducts the preparatory discussions. It has been concluded that the government which conducts these negotiations has a duty to brief the chamber of deputies in every stage of its discussions and to submit every single action by it to parliamentary control. Secrecy on negotiations related to agreements which the chamber must decide is not only unthinkable but is also a violation of the constitution and shows contempt toward the representatives of the nation.

"2. Only the chamber of deputies which will emerge from the next election will have the authority to decide on options which affect our very national foundations. This is because the present chamber of deputies has ceased to express the will of the electorate.

"3. The New Democracy government has proclaimed that it accepts return to NATO on the basis of the Haig-Davos agreement but neither the people nor the immediately appropriate body--the chamber of deputies--have been informed on the content of this agreement.

"In any case the prime minister has the obligation to make a clear statement on whether the Haig-Davos agreement alters or whether it has the potential to alter the status of the Aegean in respect to its provisions prior to the withdrawal of Greece from the military wing of the 'alliance.'

"According to the opinion of Greek military experts, this amended and generally accepted edition does alter the entire Aegean area into a joint allied air and naval area from the Gulf of Thraki to the south of Crete and from the east shore of continental Greece to the shores of Asia Minor."

This entire sea and air space will be commanded as provided by "Kinsouth" in other words U.S. Adm William Crow of Naples headquarters who visited Athens a month ago.

On the basis of the new plan Greece is being called upon to limit its sovereign rights in the Aegean, to limit its control over airspace from 16 to 6 miles and it will have to conform to operational facts which will, however, permit Turkish air and naval forces to easily reach Evvoia and Crete in accordance with the scenario of the maneuvers which will be approved in advance by NATO.

Such arrangements, according to the view of Greek experts, not only fail to put a stop to Turkish claims over the continental shelf of the Greek islands and to the undersea division, but on the contrary they encourage the expansionist desires of Ankara over sea zones of national sovereignty west of Mytilini.

A foreign source in Athens also revealed that within the framework of the Rogers draft plan which will be handed to the government there is a last "imperative" diplomatic warning from Washington which announces the necessity for "circumventing" the process for modernizing and expanding, in a first phase, of the military communications station at Nea Makri, the support system for surveillance flights and electronic surveillance base of Iraklion as well as of the base of Souda which is considered the most important support and supply base for the 6th Fleet in the Eastern Mediterranean.

This last U.S. "note" to the government, as it was revealed, makes settlement of the Greek-U.S. defense agreement on bases imperative within a specified time limit within 1980.

Another impressive fact of the last few days are the strong rumors in the foreign press and particularly in French newspapers about faits accomplis, about the enclavement of Greece within NATO's military wing which will be accomplished the latest by October by which time the new operational control over the Aegean is scheduled for a test.

At the same time and in accordance with the forecasts of the U.S. magazine NAVY, 1981 will be a critical and decisive period of U.S. interests in the Persian Gulf and the broader area of the Middle East and for this reason it was considered imperative to reinforce U.S. air and naval forces in the Eastern Mediterranean.

At this point it is added that the U.S. military presence in the area could be involved in insurmountable difficulties unless it first guarantees immediate support for U.S. bases on Greek territory.

In any case, according to the views of political observers in Athens this furor of the last few days as expressed by the Greek press as well as by the repeated reaction of the Greek majority opposition party does not influence the government, which continues its efforts to a return to NATO and ignores the country's experience within the alliance to date.

The Mitsotakis statement during the Ankara meeting when he placed the interests of the alliance over those of our country is characteristic of the climate which the government is cultivating.

BRIEFS

DIPLOMATIC CONSULTATIONS--Foreign Minister Mitsotakis was today visited in succession by Romanian Ambassador Brad, Algerian Ambassador Ibrahimi Melli and by Messrs (Ali Baria) and (Ashur al-Imam) of the Libyan People's Bureau. Mitsotakis discussed with the Libyan representatives the issue of granting visas to the citizens of both countries; it was agreed that procedures by both sides would be accelerated and simplified. With the Algerian ambassador, Mitsotakis discussed possibilities for supplying natural gas and oil; it was confirmed that a mission of Greek experts will visit Algeria next September to study these issues. The minister accepted the invitations of the ambassadors of Romania and Algeria to pay official visits to their countries. [Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 16 Jul 80 AT]

DELEGATION RETURNS FROM CYPRUS--The parliamentary delegation which had attended activities in Cyprus to condemn the coup and Turkish invasion has returned to Athens. President of the chamber Papaspirou, head of the delegation, met with President Kiprianou, president of the Cyprus House of Representatives Mikhailidhis and Archbishop Khrisostomos. Before departing from Nicosia this morning, Papaspirou stated that the Greek parliamentary delegation was returning satisfied because it had been able to once again ascertain the indomitable courage of the Cyprus people and their faith in struggle. DEMIREL, ECEVIT HOLD MEETING WITH ACTING PRESIDENT

Caglayangil Statement

TA251117 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1100 GMT 25 Jul 80

[Text] Acting President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil issued a statement today on his talks yesterday with Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel and main opposition leader Bulent Ecevit. The statement says that Demirel and Ecevit have agreed to enact as soon as possible the five bills that are on the agenda of the Grand National Assembly. The statement adds that it was also agreed during the talks that contacts should continue in a bid to provide an urgent solution for other outstanding issues.

Caglayangil's statement issued by the press and public relations office of the presidency is as follows: I had beneficial talks with Prime Minister Mr Demirel and main opposition leader Mr Ecevit for more than 4 hours in the Cankaya Mansion yesterday. Problems facing our country were reviewed and assessed. Both the prime minister and the main opposition leader agreed during these talks to enact as soon as possible some of the bills on the National Assembly's agenda. They pointed out that they would immediately proceed to do what is necessary. These bills are: An amendment to the law pertaining to trials of offenders caught redhanded, amendments to law 1402 pertaining to [rights and authorities of] the martial law, an amendment to the military penal code, an amendment to the law pertaining to the proceedings in criminal courts and the bill concerning the payment of financial compensation and salaries [for victims of violence].

During the talks it was decided that contacts should continue in order to examine and urgently solve other issues that were discussed among us.

Demirel Comments

TA251712 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 25 Jul 80

[Text] In a press conference after he emerged from his weekly meeting with Acting President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil today, Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel commented on his talks yesterday with the acting president and with the chief of the opposition, Bulent Ecevit. Demirel said:

[Begin recording] Acting President Caglayangil invited me last night, in my capacity as the prime minister, as well as Bulent Ecevit, as the chief of the main opposition party, to meet for talks. National issues were discussed during the talks. Primarily curbing the incidents of anarchy, terror, divisiveness and destructiveness were discussed.

Martial law has been declared in 20 provinces for a period of more than 18 months or for a shorter period in some provinces. Imposing martial law is a measure which the state takes if conditions stipulated in article 124 of the constitution exist. These conditions create the prospect of dragging the country into a very grave situation. It is because the country was facing great difficulties that martial law was declared. Despite the brave, heroic efforts of all the members of our armed forces, under the government's responsibility, for more than 18 months, bloodshed in Turkey could not be prevented and murders continued.

This means that it is time for introspection. Much has been accomplished during this time; nevertheless bloodshed could not be halted. Let no one mistakenly ask why martial law has been declared. It is impossible to imagine what would happen in Turkey if there was no martial law. We do not want to even make a guess. Despite everything, peace and security is prevailing in Turkey.

But the situation has not reached a point where martial law would not have any function at all. We must now look for new remedies, new measures and new approaches. Both the National Security Council and the Martial Law Coordination Committee have examined the issue at length. The conclusion was reached that the rights and authorities of the martial law commands must be revised and that some legal amendments are necessary. It is true that the government, as the executive instrument, can supply the necessary equipment, tools manpower and finances. However, laws are enacted only by parliaments. The only way to curb anarchy is to revise the rights and authorities of the martial law commands, to provide for speeding up procedures in certain courts, to transform the state into an institution that will catch and punish the culprits, instilling in them the fear of justice and serving as an example and deterrent.

The deterrent power of the state must be established based on legal and democratic means and not in force. That is why new legal measures are needed. Some of the bills which provide these amendments have already been enacted and the rest are still on the agenda of the Grand National Assembly. On 11 June 1980 our party asked for a special agenda that would permit the passage of these bills. As you know, in a letter I addressed to the leaders of all the parties as well as the Assembly leader last week, I made the same request. Two days ago in a statement at parliament I discussed the subject of the functioning of the parliament, and stated my views.

No one can stand idle at a time when blood is being shed in the country and a time when the martial law commands that are doing their best to stop this bloodshed are asking for further legal authority and rights. It is true that no one wants this bloodshed to continue. However, it is out of the question to say so and do nothing about it. Whoever wants to halt this must do what is necessary. As the new amendments and laws are aimed at bringing peace and order in the country, they must be dealt with and enacted as soon as possible.

In our talks last night an agreement was reached for the preparation of a special agenda in the National Assembly for amendments to five laws, to be topped by the amendments in law 1402 relating to the rights and authorities of the martial law commands. I believe that this decision will be realized, and if these amendments are enacted during the next week I am convinced that this will heighten the Grand National Assembly's prestige and will provide the state security forces--which are waging a determined fight against Turkey's enemies, murderers, conspirators and the various gangs of bandits that are trying to disrupt the country--will continue to fulfill their tasks with a renewed zeal and enthusiasm. This will also enhance our democratic system. That is why I can clearly state that talks held last night will provide beneficial results for our country. The issues of establishing the state security courts and of the state of emergency will have to be discussed further. We have not achieved any results on these issues.

[Question] Was any progress (?made)?

[Answer] It was discussed.

[Question] Has Ecevit (?brought up) the subject of a restoration government?

[Answer] Yes, Mr Ecevit has mentioned the idea of a restoration government. He has reiterated what he already said at the National Assembly. We believe that the problem of a restoration government is not an urgent question. First the Grand National Assembly should enact the amendments in question. No matter which government assumes power, these amendments are necessary. In a country in which 10 persons are being killed daily, providing those fighting to curb these incidents with the necessary rights and authorities must precede the discussions of a new government.

[Question indistinct]

[Answer] Five amendments are in question, these are amendments that were mentioned in my letter to political party leaders on 11 June 1980.

[Question] Is [words indistinct] included in these amendments?

[Answer] We have not discussed the contents of the bills of amendment. What we have asked for is a discussion of these bills by the National Assembly in accordance with a special agenda and their enactment. This is the point on which an agreement was reached. We were looking for an agreement in order to have a special agenda and provide for the enactment of these bills.

[Question] Was the issue of the election of the president (?discussed)?

[Answer] It was taken up and was discussed briefly.

[Question] Was progress...

[Answer] Only points of discord were mentioned. That is all.

[Question] Was the issue of early elections also (?discussed)?

[Answer] Yes it was. It was discussed within the framework in which I presented this issue at the National Assembly. If this Assembly is not capable of enacting the necessary laws, early elections should be held without losing a day. Lives are being lost in the country. Things cannot go on under the present circumstances. Let us immediately go to the polls. This is the way I presented the subject. However, no results were reached.

[Question] Since this is the case, is the issue of early elections being taken off (?the agenda)?

[Answer] No, it is not. Now, look, we have not sought to find out on which issues we do not agree. We sought to find out on which issues we could reach an agreement. The most important and urgent among these issues is passing the bills that provide the security forces--and primarily the martial law command forces--with the necessary rights and authorities.

[Question] Will (?these talks) continue tomorrow?

[Answer] Yes, they will. [end recording]

Ecevit Statement

TA251728 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 25 Jul 80

[Opposition leader Bulent Ecevit's press conference in Ankara on 25 July following his meeting with Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel and Acting President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil at the Cankaya Presidential Mansion on 24 July--recorded]

[Text] The JP minority government has three contradictions. The first one is as follows: this government has been established after rejecting the support of the RPP. Although we did offer such support, this government was established after rejecting the support of the RPP.

It was established with the support of certain groups outside the RPP and it is surviving through this support. However, this support is inadequate and cannot deal with the necessities created by the circumstances so that the government is seeking the cooperation and support of the RPP in all the legal measures it wants to implement. In actual fact, regarding its attitude and actions which would damage the state and the democracy, the government is relying on the support of its partners and it is expecting assistance and support from the RPP in a bid to alleviate the extent of these damages.

The second contradiction is as follows: The JP is pointing to the RPP as the source of instigation and mischief--as formulated by the prime minister. It is accusing the RPP of provoking anarchy and terrorism. The RPP is becoming the chief target of terrorists because of these unjust accusations. However, the same government believes that it can wage the struggle against terrorism and anarchy only with the assistance and cooperation of the RPP.

The third contradiction is that the government is claiming that the problems have gone beyond the government, that they have become state problems, that Turkey is facing extraordinary conditions and that therefore extraordinary measures are necessary. However, it is consistently evading the establishment of a government necessitated by such an extraordinary situation.

In our view, Turkey cannot be saved from its current crisis unless these contradictions are eliminated.

Mr Demirel has frequenly mentioned that the RPP was not able to surmount Turkey's problems--which are becoming graver--by itself. Now he is saying that the minority government which he established is not able and will not be able to overcome these problems on its own. When we say: In that case, let the two parties meet and establish a government by joining their forces in order to overcome these problems, Demirel rejects this idea but is not able to give satisfactory reasons for rejecting it.

In our opinion, the necessary legal measures recently mentioned by the government can be divided into two categories. The first category includes bills which are compatible with democracy and the second category consists of bills which could--in essense and especially in the hands of this government--damage democracy. The RPP has never created difficulties regarding the bills in the first category. For example, the bills that were debated in the assembly and went into effect at the beginning of this year were, in any event, prepared by the previous RPP government and were enacted through the support of the RPP from the opposition. Among the draft bills which the government wants to enact now, there are bills that are compatible with democracy. These bills were either prepared by the RPP government or they have been passed by the parliamentary committees with the support of the RPP and thus included in the assembly agenda.

If, for the past 4 months, the government had not obstructed the legislative functioning of the assembly after the presidential election rounds, if the JP has exerted the same efforts exerted by the main opposition party in a bid to secure a quorum at the assembly and if it had not vacated its seats while the RPP was exerting these efforts, then the draft bills, which they are now insisting on, would have been ratified a long time ago. I do not see any harm in the speedy enactment of these bills at this stage. These bills consist of the bill amending the martial law bill, the bill on the payment of financial compensation and salaries [for victims of violence] and the bill pertaining to the trials of offenders caught redhanded. If the government ceases to obstruct--as in the past few months--the legislative work of the assembly, I do not foresee any difficulty in enacting these bills as soon as possible.

I will submit a request to the authorized bodies of our party at the beginning of next week to make the necessary contribution to insuring that these bills are reviewed in the final forms passed by the committees and speedily ratified. I will call a meeting of the RPP General Administrative Council on Monday and of the RPP parliamentary group at 1000 on Tuesday in order to submit this request and brief them on the talks.

As for the second category of bills which are not compatible with democracy and which could damage democracy, these bills consist of the law envisaging the reestabilishment of state security courts and the state of emergency law. The support of the RPP for both these draft bills is out of the question and I reiterated this during yesterday's meeting. I feel the need to stress this following certain commentaries in today's press that the RPP could in the future discuss these two bills as well. These commentaries are without foundation. The RPP is definitely opposed to these two bills due to reasons which I will explain soon.

Why is the RPP opposed to these laws? The article in the constitution of the state security courts was inserted in our constitution during the 12 March [1971] period under extraordinary conditions and as a result of outside pressures and is like a patch on our constitution. It definitely contradicts the basic articles of our constitution which guarantees the independence of the judiciary; so much so that, according to the article on the state security courts, the judges and prosecutors of these courts will be chosen by the government. It is out of the question for us to grant the authority to appoint judges and prosecutors to a government which we have witnessed making very partisan appointments and causing the escalation of terrorism through these appointments.

However, there is also a definite necessity, particularly at a time when terrorist crimes have greatly increased, it is necessary to insure faster and more effective functioning of the judicial organs and courts. We prepared a draft bill on this subject because we saw this necessity even when we were in power. This draft bill envisaged the designation of certain courts to deal with incidents of political violence and the speedy functioning of these courts. In other words, only last year we prepared and submitted to the assemblies a draft bill which would fully satisfy the goal of the state security courts, but would be free of all the antidemocratic shortcomings of the state security courts.

Mr Demirel says that we cannot pass an additional law when the constitution already includes an article on state security courts. However, the same Demirel proposes to amend the constitution when he wants. In that case, let us cooperate to abolish the contradictory patched article in our constitution concerning state security courts and pass the bill we prepared as soon as possible.

The constitution does not make allowances for a law pertaining to the authorities allowed in a state of emergency and therefore a constitutional amendment is necessary. We cannot grant the authorities of a state of emergency to the current administration. This would be tantamount to terminating democracy in Turkey. At a time when we are seeing the kind of governors [the government] appointed to certain very problematic provinces and how these governors caused the problems in these provinces to increase and the incidents of terror to escalate, we cannot grant the governors of this government the additional authorities of a state of emergency. This is out of the question. Even if our dialogue is continued, no change should be expected in our view regarding this issue.

The government, which desires conciliation and cooperation with the RPP and considers it necessary, is for some reason evading cooperation on the issue of the presidential election although the only solution to this problem consists of such a conciliation and cooperation.

As I have been declaring for some months, the establishment of a restoration government under the leadership of the two major parties as soon as possible is, perhaps, the only way to rapidly save Turkey from its present crises within a democratic system. However, Mr Demirel is consistently avoiding such a government partnership. I believe that those who avoid this will be responsible for the future consequences.

PHOTOGRAPHER RELEASED BY IRAN RETURNS TO TURKEY

TA281002 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 0900 GMT 28 Jul 80

[Text] Hamit Sami Cosar, a photographer working for the TURKISH NEWS AGENCY [THA] who was released yesterday, has returned to Istanbul. His return to Turkey was made possible following the efforts of the Foreign Ministry. In a statement at Yesilkoy Airport, Cosar said that he had been arrested as a result of a misunderstanding. Cosar had been arrested in Tehran, where he had gone on duty, on 21 July on the grounds of spying for the United States.

IRANIANS TAKE BACK HELICOPTER; IRANIAN WORKER DEFECTS

TA251534 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 25 Jul 80

[Text] The military helicopter two Iranian officers used to come to Agri on 11 July to seek asylum in Turkey was returned to Iran today. According to information received from Agri Governor Enver Kazanoglu, an eight-man delegation arrived from Iran, conducted the necessary inspections and took the helicopter back to Iran at 1320. Kazanoglu said that another 18-year-old Iranian worker sought asylum in Turkey the day before yesterday and that an investigation into the incident is under way.

DEMIREL CONDEMNS ISRAELI DECISION TO MAKE JERUSALEM CAPITAL

TA241440 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 24 Jul 80

[Excerpt] In a statement after the Council of Ministers meeting today Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel referred to Israel's decision to make Jerusalem its capital:

[Begin recording] We harshly denounce Israel's attempt to make Jerusalem its capital and we regard it as a very serious matter. At a time when the maintenance of peace and stability in the region and in the world has become so important, we declare that moves to disrupt stability through such decisions constitute acts of irresponsibility vis-a-vis world peace. We are extremely sorry that Israel is trying to create a fait accompli. We will continue to follow the matter within the framework of the decisions of the Islamic Conference and the Islamic foreign ministers conference. The Turkish Government cannot accept such a fait accompli. Let us hope that Israel will not insist on such a decision, which would cause great unrest in this region of the world. [end recording]

CHANCELLOR KREISKY INTERVIEWED ON MIDEAST SOLUTION

LD290747 London AL-MAJALLAH in Arabic 26 Jul-1 Aug 80 pp 12-16

[Interview granted by Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky to Muhammad Ishaq Yunis in Vienna--date not given]

[Excerpts] [Question] Israel's pretext for refusing the establishment of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza sector is its fear for its security and existence. One of its arguments is that the creation of a Palestinian state would be tantamount to a Soviet base and a time bomb that could explode and destroy Israel. Your long experience of what goes on in the Soviet Union and the inclinations of Soviet leaders since Stalin enables you to discuss Israel's allegations from this standpoint. Is it possible to do so?

[Answer] I would like to say that according to information available to me--this is my personal opinion--that the superpowers are inclined to divide their spheres of influence and have actually done so in Europe, where they divided Germany. They succeeded in this and it became two Germanies. They tried the same in Korea and also succeeded. They tried to do the same in Vietnam, but the people there resisted them. In fact, as long as the Americans were in control in Iran nobody cared about Afghanistan or what happened there. After the Americans lost their control in Iran the Soviets immediately tried to prevent anything similar from happening or being repeated in Afghanistan. I can imagine that the picture has now become clear to the West as to what happened in Afghanistan. I believe that there is some sort of inclination in international politics to divide the spheres of influence in the Middle East region. But in my opinion it is not too late to try to stop such a development in the region. Stopping this kind of division of spheres of influence can be achieved only through some kind of detente, through a peaceful solution to the Middle East problem.

[Question] What is the formula you see for this peaceful solution?

[Answer] This peaceful solution can be achieved only if the Palestinians are granted the right to establish a state of their own, provided that they coexist side by side with Israel. Otherwise I see no solution.

[Question] How can this be done?

[Answer] I can imagine that any new government in Israel could submit new proposals. I would like to go back to your first question regarding the view that a Palestinian state would be a foothold for communism. This is an allegation used by some circles in Israel and the United States to convince public opinion on this matter and to raise fears in this regard.

I personally do not believe such a thing and believe that the number of communists among the Palestinians is no different from the number of communists among the Israeli people. The Soviet Union, as we know, has footholds in the area in any case and has good relations with some Arab states such as South Yemen and Syria. This is evidence that the allegation is baseless.

[Question] What will the Soviet Union's attitude be then?

[Answer] I believe that if the conflict between the Palestinians and the Israelis continues, this will give the Soviet Union the opportunity to get its foot in the door. But if things are stabilized and the problems we know about are solved, the Soviet Union will be compelled to accept a lessening of its control and influence in the area.

[Question] Russia's dream of reaching warm water is, as everybody knows very old. The invasion of Afghanistan is being interpreted as a step toward realizing this dream, especially since the Gulf waters are not just warm but hot, in view of the importance of oil. What, in your view, can the West do, if not to make the Soviet Union withdraw from Afghanistan then at least to check its drive toward warm waters?

[Answer] In my opinion the superpowers are not inclined to the idea of a major war and do not want an armed clash, although they now feel that tension is heightening. Nevertheless we must understand the attempts by these countries to narrow the gap which now exists. War between the two superpowers would be destructive and both sides would suffer seriously in such a war. I do not believe that the United States and Russia will risk a third world war between them.

[Question] Obviously the Camp David accords are threatened if not by failure then by stalemate or even being stopped in their tracks. Do you think that the Israeli attitude could change if Egypt finds itself forced to retreat or at least to freeze the normalization of relations?

[Answer] I believe that all the parties to Camp David are very interested in the continuation of these agreements, even if they have not yet achieved any tangible results.

But it seems to me that the present Israeli Government--Begin's government--does not want to solve the Palestinian problem, and As-Sadat is now facing that reality, although I am quite sure that he is hoping for the arrival of a new Israeli Government that will seek to offer something.

I believe that As-Sadat prefers to wait so that there can be a new beginning for these agreements, and Carter himself does not want the Camp David agreements to fail. As far as Menahem Begin is concerned, I imagine that he is not prepared to give anything or make any further concessions. Therefore, I cannot imagine that there will be dramatic changes in the near future. The Egyptian-Israeli talks will continue until the end of the U.S. presidential election. We must wait to see the outcome of the election and what happens in Israel as well.

[Question] It is said that you are going to visit Egypt at the end of the month and that you will consult with President as-Sadat regarding the context of a new peace initiative involving the Palestinians and the Israelis which you intend to submit after the Begin government falls. Is this true?

[Answer] No, I am not carrying any new initiative for mediation between the Palestinians and the Israelis, because such mediation requires a degree of "sympathy" and in this case there is no sympathy, which makes me say that there is no initiative. Personally I am not interested in this and I will not be a party to it. I have no intention of visiting Egypt now, but I could visit it in the fall.

[Question] Finally, do you imagine that in view of all this the Middle East area is about to witness a new Arab-Israeli war?

[Answer] There are many reasons that make me believe that a new war will break out in the Middle East, in view of the presence of some ultraextremists in Begin's government. If we take a look at the Arab world today we find that it is living in a state of disruption and division. For example, Iraq and Syria, Tunisia and Libya, Algeria and Morocco, South Yemen and North Yemen are all at loggerheads, and all these countries are against Egypt. As I have already said, the Arab world is divided against itself. Nevertheless, if Israel deals a blow to the Arabs or wages war against them, the Arabs would then stand in solidarity against Israel, even if temporarily.

KREISKY INTERVIEWED ON ARMS DEAL WITH CHILE

AU290729 [Editorial Report] Vienna Domestic Service in German at 1015 GMT on 28 July carries a 6-minute report by Michael Kerbler on a pending arms deal with Chile, with recorded excerpts from an interview with Austrian Chancellor Kreisky, the time and place of which are not given. Kerbler begins by giving details about the 2 billion schillings arms deal. According to him, the Austrian Steyr-Daimler-Puch Corporation on 7 July sent a letter to Chancellor Kreisky urging him to authorize the exportation to Chile of 100 SK-105 "Cuirassier" tank destroyers, some Steyr "Greif" salvage tanks [bergepanzer] and another 6 unspecified tanks, along with "equipment" including 360 submachineguns. Delivery is to be made to the Chilean Defense Ministry.

Kerbler points out that Chancellor Kreisky, who has the final say regarding such politically sensitive arms exports, is faced with a very difficult decision because the Chilean Government is known to violate human rights, and Austria is one of the countries that has granted asylum to refugees from Chile; moreover, by exporting the arms to Chile Austria would side with Mrs Thatcher's Tory government which has recently lifted the arms embargo imposed on Chile, and was sharply attacked for it by the Labor Party.

Thus, Kreisky is seeking a special assurance on the part of the Chilean Government.

He says: "We want to obtain an absolute assurance that these units--let me stress again that only the chassis is supplied by us, the equipment mounted on it is French, as you know--that these units must not be used in any internal conflicts. They must exclusively serve purposes of national defense."

Asked to clarify whether these weapons may be used only in the event of an aggression from outside, Kreisky says: "Only for purposes of national defense; not in any internal conflicts. And in this respect, we are still waiting for a message."

Kerbler then provides the following additional information: The Chilean Government has offered to pay cash since there was too much opposition to an Austrian loan for this arms deal; there was also considerable opposition to this arms deal within the cabinet but it was apparently overcome last week largely through the massive support of the project by Trade Union Federation Chairman Benya.

According to Kerbler, Kreisky has set three criteria for the decision: "First, we need the mentioned declaration by the Chilean Government; second, it is a question of safeguarding jobs--a question that has already been answered in principle some time ago; and, third, it is a question of our own national defense: our army says we want to be equipped with Austrian products, but the firms argue that this is possible only if they are permitted also to export such products, since otherwise they could not produce them all by themselves."

Kerbler notes in conclusion that the Austrian Socialist Party youth organization "Young Generation" today appealed to Chancellor Kreisky not to authorize the arms deal with the "fascist military junta." The Steyr-Daimler-Puch Corporation has refused to comment on the matter.

KING HUSAYN TO MEET WITH LEADERS ON MIDEAST SITUATION

LD28114 Hamburg DPA in German 1022 GMT 28 Jul 80

[Excerpt] Bonn--King Husayn of Jordan will arrive in Bonn tomorrow, Tuesday, for talks with the Federal Government. The discussions between the monarch and Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and Federal President Karl Carstens will center above all on German efforts within the framework of the European Community for a peace settlement in the Middle East. The Federal Government will make clear here its standpoint of finding a balanced and lasting solution in the Middle East which takes into account both the interests of Israel and those of the Palestinians.

Spokesman Issues Statement

LD281550 Hamburg DPA in German 1436 GMT 28 Jul 80

[Text] Bonn--Foreign Ministry spokesman Juergen Sudhof described King Husayn as a "highly esteemed and important" partner in talks. In a press statement he said that in the present situation the "working visit" is of particular significance in view of King Husayn's great authority and Jordan's direct interest in the solution of the Middle East question. Jordan is making constructive efforts towards this. Sudhof said that the Federal Government is looking forward to the talks "with great expectations." He outlined Bonn's position regarding the talks by pointing to the Venice statement of the European Council in which the nine EC heads of government set out the principles for a Middle East settlement.

PRESS ON CARTER'S TROUBLES OVER BROTHER'S ACTIVITIES

DW281030 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 28 Jul 80

[Press review on investigations into Billy Carter's activities]

[Text] KOELNER STADT-ANZEIGER writes: We are gradually gaining the impression that everything is at sixes and sevens not only in President Carter's family but also in the White House. What is solemnly stressed today is no longer valid tomorrow. At first the word was that Billy was a brother whom Jimmy could not control. Then it turned out that security adviser Brzezinski activated Billy Carter as a go-between in the hostage affair. The President reportedly had nothing to do with that, or did he? First Lady Rosalynn came up with the same idea as Brzezinski. She, too, had thought of Billy. And since they had gone that far they thought they might as well go even a bit further: The latest version has it that it cannot be ruled out that Brzezinski did not hit upon the idea all on his own but only after Carter's hint. Much of this is reminiscent of Watergate. Only this time it is proceeding faster.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE has this to say: Like ball and chain, Jimmy Carter has always dragged along his origins from Plains, the peanut trade and his brother Billy who is 14 years his junior and an enfant terrible incarnate. Now all this threatens to cause his downfall. What could have been treated as a provincial prank at some point and with Christian charity is now assuming the character of a state action as a result of the Senate special committee and the demand for written information by the House of Representatives. But what is even more remarkable than the great investigative zeal of Congress is the initiative of a group of Democratic congressmen aimed at preventing Carter's nomination as the presidential candidate, something already decided upon. This reaction shows what should have been assumed all the time, namely that enthusiasm over a renewed candidacy by luckless Carter is not worth much.

[Press review on ramifications of Billy Carter's dealings with Libya]

[Text] SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG makes the following comment: Just 2 weeks prior to the Democratic nominating convention the President is in the middle of an affair which no longer is exclusively that of his younger brother Billy. The source from which Billy derived his wealth seems to have been known in the Carter family for some time, but the President and his attorney general, Civiletti, admitted a bit belatedly that they had discussed ways of legalizing Billy's way of making a living. What will give the President even more trouble is the fact that he used his brother to set up a contact with the Libyans from whom he expected mediation in Tehran for the release of the U.S. hostages. This is the point at which the limits of naivete have been passed. Panic has erupted in the Democratic Party over such an amateurish way of leading the country. No doubt about it, the President is no longer an attraction.

MANNHEIMER MORGEN writes: Unlike his predecessor Nixon, Carter cannot be charged with the responsibility for the machinations of his imaginative brother. But his way of dealing with the case, his helplessness or, as Senator Jackson put it, his blundering is allowing the serious doubts of the Democrats about the President's leadership abilities to develop into certainty. What elicits panic, however, is the obvious consideration that the nation will hardly judge these cases differently just a few months prior to the elections. Carter threatens to fall without a convincing alternative being available for presentation.

The editorial of the Duesseldorf RHEINISCHE POST says in part: Following the latest revelations about the President's brother Billy, a front of Carter's opponents in the Democratic Party is beginning to take shape. Names of potential presidential candidates are being circulated. The Americans alone have to decide on their future president. The Europeans, however, desire a man who can convincingly lead the superpower America and the crumbling Western alliance again.

KOELNISCHE RUNDSCHAU notes: The Americans have a fine sense for finding out if and when political business is not conducted in a kosher way, and as soon as they smell injustice they react with the mercilessness of the moralist. Jimmy Carter is coming to feel this now. Nixon fell over Watergate; is Carter now threatened by a Billygate? Surely the comparison is not quite appropriate, yet even loyal followers of the President have displayed irritation lately. New names are being mentioned already. Must he run against his own vice president during the selection of candidates, or against a fellow party member whom he appointed to his cabinet only recently? An adventurous idea indeed. The fact that influential Democrats think nothing of contemplating this idea aloud shows how serious the situation has become for Jimmy Carter. During the 4 years of his term he seldom managed to gain worldwide respect. How he is running the risk of being denied this respect even by his friends, says KOELNISCHE RUNDSCHAU.

NEUE HANNOVERSCHE PRESSE states: The scandal over Billy Carter, though of far lesser caliber than Watergate at the time, threatens to cast shadows that are just as gloomy over the domestic American scenery as did Watergate, which plunged the nation just past Vietnam into an abyss of resignation and doubts about itself. It is possible that Jimmy will now fall because of Billy, that Kennedy will not be elevated to the nomination, and that a nomination tug-of-war will erupt at the last minute between alternative runners such as Muskie or Mondale--this would be an erosion among the Democrats which would be bound to abet the Reagan/Bush team which indeed has a menacing effect.

This next presidential election, which approaches like the twilight of the gods in a phase of explosive international crisis, is building up into a fun house ride in which the American voters are not the only ones to get the creeps.

And the KONSTANZ SUEDKURIER has this to say: Even the richest imagination is not sufficient to place the affair surrounding Billy Carter on the same level as the Watergate scandal. Still, even the slightest doubt about the integrity of the President, who started his term in 1976 with the loftiest moral claims, in the present heated atmosphere will be enough to make panic erupt. Only if viewed against this background is it understandable why a number of Democrats are looking around for other candidates.

MINISTER OPPOSES STOPPING BOLIVIAN AID PROJECTS

LD281104 Hamburg DPA in German 1006 GMT 28 Jul 80

[Excerpt] Lima--Development Aid Minister Rainer Offergeld has come out against discontinuing development aid projects in Bolivia because of the military putsch on 17 May [date as received]. Today in Lima Offergeld told DPA: "It is true that in this situation we will not decide on any new projects. But we will not abandon any projects already started, will not withdraw any development helpers and not leave any development projects half finished. Were we to act in this way, we would not hit at the military junta but rather at the poorest of the poor whom the projects are designed to help by developing opportunities for earning their own income."

LAMBSDORFF INTERVIEWED ON FRG's ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

DW281335 Cologne Deutschlandfunk in German to East and West Germany 0905 GMT 27 Jul 80

[Reporter Bittermann interview with Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff--place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Mr Minister Lambsdorff, until recently we could be quite satisfied with the economic development in our country. In the first 6 months economic development was clearly better than had originally been anticipated. But data about the labor market as well as orders received show that we will probably have to expect a decrease in the second half of this year. We heard this week from your ministry, the Federal Economics Ministry, that an economic decline would have to be expected, but a recession similar to 1974-75 was very unlikely. What is the reason for this optimism?

[Answer] The reason is that first of all we had a better starting position for tackling the energy price crisis in 1979 and 1980 than in 1973-74. You know that at that time it hit us at the climax of an inflationary price trend. This was not the case this time. Second, we have come to realize in the meantime that the inclination of the German economy to invest has grown considerably and continues to grow despite the decreasing economic trend. In this context investments in energy conservation and alternative energy resources play an important part as a promoting factor. All this, together with better international coordination of what is necessary in economic policy terms to respond to further rising energy prices, is a reason for us to assume--and justifies our assumption--that this time we will not experience a recession like 1974-75. We have always anticipated an economic decline in the second half of 1980. Early this year we said that the economic growth rate will be about 2.5 percent. In the first 3 months it was between 3.5 and 4 percent. This means that from the beginning we expected that a somewhat weaker second half of this year would be bound to follow a better first half.

[Question] Is it perhaps only a temporary decrease which will possibly be followed by a recovery in 1981?

[Answer] At this point I do not want to be that optimistic, because it also depends on international developments which largely influence the Federal Republic. Two things are very important in this respect: First, the question as to how the recession will develop in the United States and, second, the question as to what effects energy prices will have on the purchasing possibilities or the balance of payments developments of our customers in world markets.

[Question] But the economic scientists of the Kiel Institute for World Economy are much more skeptical than you are. They fear that a recession is inevitable unless the Federal Bank loosens the credit brake. The central bank council this week again decided to very cautiously loosen the brake but did not give a real signal on interest rates. Mr Minister, what do you think about the demand for introducing a clear change in our monetary policy?

[Answer] Mr Bittermann, we have here in the Federal Republic five economic research institutes, and the research institute which has the most pessimistic attitude always enjoys the largest attention amongst the public. The forecasts of the other four are in line with the economic expectations shared by the Federal Bank and the Federal Government. One institute always plays the pessimistic role. Some years ago it was the Essen Rhenish-Westphalian Institute. Now it is the Kiel Institute which has arrived at its results on the basis of a way of seeing monetary problems which in our view is not correct. In fact the Federal Bank set an initial cautious signal to ease the interest market and the capital market.

Frankly speaking, I would have preferred a larger step. I did not expect it to come following the recent public discussion in which experts and nonexperts demanded that the Federal Bank and the central bank council take drastic steps. My experience tells me that the central bank council does not react at all or reacts sourly to such public recommendations. This body does not like public advice or public demands. Perhaps its decisions would have been different if public discussions had been more reserved.

[Question] For the second half of this year we will have to expect a slower rate of price hikes. Doesn't this mean that the Federal Bank will also have more latitude?

[Answer] The Federal Bank was certainly only able to justify the measures it resolved upon because its stability policy has been successful and because prices have gone down. Anyway this is the most important prerequisite for every step aimed at easing the situation which the central bank can and will take.

[Question] Mr Minister, in which way will the recession influence the labor market? Do we have to assume that unemployment based on economic developments will be added to the existing largely structural unemployment, so that the number of jobless in the Federal Republic this year will be higher than last year?

[Answer] I do not think that the average number of unemployed in 1980 will be higher than last year, and you know that we have an extremely divided or split labor market. On the one hand, there are the unemployed who are recorded in statistics, and the importance of these statistics must not be played down by anybody. On the other hand, there is a demand which is not possible to meet, not only for skilled workers in certain regions and certain branches but also for unskilled workers. Recently some industries asked us again to let some additional guest workers come into the country. We will not do so, but this shows again that the labor market suffers from specific irregularities which cannot be dealt with successfully by economic policy instruments alone, but regarding which the Federal Government will have to continue its very consistent labor market policy which has been successful in many fields and is oriented toward specific problems.

[Question] But these adverse prospects in the labor market are reason enough for the trade unions, the chairman of the Metalworkers Union, Loderer, for instance, to contemplate and demand a change in our economic policy. You, Mr Minister, are known not to be among the proponents of an early economic policy program. Why not?

[Answer] We have not always had good experiences with economic policy programs in the past. By the way, the consolidation of the 1981 budget at present is being given priority in our fiscal policy considerations. As I said, there are also exceptions to these experiences. They include the program on future investments, the so-called 435 billion program. The Federal Government has always said in this respect that it will consider a prolongation as soon as this program has been carried out. This is not so at present and therefore that is not a problem. Otherwise the tax package, which fortunately also was approved by the Bundesrat, is our necessary answer regarding our economic policy in 1981. This program means tax relief worth roughly DM11 to DM12 billion in 1981. In our discussions within the cabinet I held the view from the beginning that the essence of this tax package, meaning wage and income tax relief, might be important for 1981--also for economic policy considerations. This seems to be so now. Thus our considerations and hence also our decisions have been correct. The necessary measures have been taken; other economic policy measures are not necessary.

[Question] What would the economic situation have to be like, how negative would economic development have to be to make you an advocate of economic stimulation programs?

[Answer] I do not think we should speculate on this at the moment. On principle I advocate the view that improvement of framework conditions--not mere confidence in the self-healing forces of the market, as Mr Loderer of the Metalworkers Union believes--is more sensible than any economic stimulation programs for specific economic branches or of a general nature. Our experience with these economic stimulation programs is that they proceed with hesitation, that they take effect at a time when economic development shows an upward trend again anyway and that they thus contribute to an overheating of the boom. Our experience should teach us that this instrument for steering economic development policy can be applied only with care and reserve.

[Question] Minister Lambsdorff, people often claim that even if an economic development program were necessary, the Federal Government, the laender and the communities would hardly be capable of financing such a program simply because the financial leeway has become narrow. The opposition, the CDU/CSU, time and again can be heard charging that the upward trend in economic development has not been utilized for consolidating the budgets, that no reserves are available in case of an economic decline if and when it occurs. What is your opinion on the subject?

[Answer] I think this charge is unjustified, and I have repeatedly and quite clearly said so. It is up to the opposition to come up with the answer as to the year in which the measures of consolidation it demands were neglected. It simply cannot mean 1979 in earnest. That was when we had to put the decisions of the Bonn world economic summit into practice in economic and political terms, meaning specifically additional cranking-up measures of about 1 percent in the gross national product. We indeed took those measures and they were quite sound as it turned out. Perhaps we might say that the 1980 budget could have been planned a bit more restrictively. All of us know that this was done in the case of the supplementary budget. And taking a look at the budgets of the laender, in particular the budgets of the minister-presidents who are the loudest advocates in this debate, meaning the land budgets of Bavaria and Schleswig-Holstein, I just cannot say that they have saved in greater earnest or consolidated more seriously and earlier than the Federal Government. People in glass houses should not throw stones.

[Question] You too admit, however, that greater successes in the reduction of indebtedness would have been desirable and conceivable? Perhaps this task was not tackled consistently enough. Would being serious about budgetary consolidation not require cutting subsidies to a greater extent than heretofore?

[Answer] This is absolutely right. The federal finance minister once said: There will be weeping and gnashing of teeth in connection with the 1981 federal budget. And let me tell you right now, Mr Bittermann, that the debate on the cut in subsidies will take the following course: It is necessary to cut subsidies but please, not mine but those of the others. And then, as I said, we will experience weeping and gnashing of teeth in the country. I think this is necessary. I stated and explained that for the spheres under my budget, under the budget of the Ministry of Economics, I am prepared to take painful cuts. But I do see, and anticipate even now, the cries of protest of those affected.

[Question] Could you cite from your sphere of responsibility any examples where cuts could be made?

[Answer] To cite two examples, I can visualize the field of mining and the field of shipyard subsidies where some cutting has been done and where additional cutting might perhaps have to be made. This has been mentioned in public before and, besides, has become inevitable under the supplementary budget. We will have to await developments, but there can be no taboos. False consideration, or I might say rash considerations, are not justifiable. Everybody has the best arguments as to why his subsidies must be upheld, yet the general interest of the state requires that we scrutinize everything without bias and without any advance commitment.

[Question] The balance of payments in the next several years will probably turn into a difficult problem. This year already we must reckon with a deficit of roughly DM25 billion, a deficit which is primarily caused by the high level of oil imports. But we can hardly do without oil for the foreseeable future. How could a balance in the balance of payments be regained on a medium-term basis?

[Answer] You are right in terming this a medium-term task. On a short-term basis international financial policy responsibilities dictate that even strong countries--among them Japan and the Federal Republic--tolerate greater balance of payments deficits, because it would not benefit them if they were to further impair the weak countries and their balance of payments situation. Nobody can be interested in anything of that sort.

You also identified the main key for solving this problem, namely the oil imports. The basic evil of the balance of payments deficit can be remedied only through a purposeful, consistent policy of energy austerity and energy busstitution. This means that we must get away from oil more and more, away from these energy imports and from dependence on oil through the intensified utilization of coal and nuclear energy in the Federal Republic. Besides, we must insure that our competitiveness in international markets, meaning in the export of German commodities to foreign countries, is not only maintained but even improved where it might perhaps have been imparied. This is a task confronting primarily the companies, the employers organizations and the trade unions. The government, however, will do its part to render assistance to that end.

[Question] Oil consumption this year so far has dropped, as have oil imports. Is this the result of the energy conservation appeals from many sides or is it merely a consequence of the declining economic boom?

[Answer] It is not a consequence of the declining boom. The first half of the year, after all, did not show any economic decline. You said so yourself a while ago. Nor is it the result of appeals alone. You will not attain energy austerity through appeals alone.

This is the consequence of high prices; a consequence of the fact that the private consumers as well as the economy consider carefully where they can save gasoline and fuel oil--thus primarily oil, but also natural gas as well. Our energy austerity policy has been successful indeed; this has been recognized internationally as well. We could well add a few other aspects. I very much regret that the long-distance heat supply program, for example, has failed because of the incomprehensible objection of the minister-president of Schleswig-Holstein, the only CDU minister-president. I hope that he will learn better, because there is no expert who would not advocate the view--shared, by the way, also by branch colleagues in the Schleswig-Holstein cabinet--that a long-distance heat supply program is definitely a part of energy policy and of energy austerity policy.

[Question] Mr Minister, just recently you pointed out that if the German economy wishes to retain its competitiveness or--in comparison with the Japanese--wishes to reclaim it, then the German workers and employees must work harder, smarter and just plain more. This is a recommendation which earned you rather harsh criticism from the trade unions and also from the employers. Do you consider the social conditions in Japan--long working hours and short vacations--so exemplary that they should be recommended for emulation in our country?

[Answer] I do not consider them exemplary, nor have I recommended them for emulation at all. But we have to define our stand based on the results of this situation. Anyone who believes that we could call on the Japanese to change a situation which they definitely do not wish to change--the Japanese have just confirmed the Liberal Democratic Party with a two-thirds majority, this being the political force advocating the system currently prevalent and valid there, a system which will definitely not change in the foreseeable future--is a dreamer. You rightly pointed out that this has earned me harsh criticism. I called on both the companies and the workers to face up to this situation. But, Mr Bittermann, I neither said that the German workers are lazy, nor did I say that they lack diligence or are unreliable. Nor did I say that the German companies fail to make investments and that they are nor prepared to take risks. I did say, though, that they ought to push more innovations, invest more, make more capital input available to cope with this problem.

One discussion waged so far is disappointing to me. I heard from DGB [German Trade Union Federation] Chairman Vetter and Metalworkers Union Chairman Loderer that I know nothing, that I was talking nonsense, living on the moon and deriding the German workers. Apart from these rather pointless invectives, I did not, unfortunately, hear a single objective argument on the question of how we propose to deal with the consequences of this competition, with the consequences of our reduced competitiveness in the world markets.

It is not just the bilateral problem of Japanese automobile imports to the Federal Republic that is at stake, even if this directly threatens jobs. And I think the chairman of the world's biggest individual trade union must come up with more than just invectives if and when jobs are in jeopardy. He should contribute arguments. He must contribute proposals for a solution. He is expected to think. The Federal Government and the federal economics minister will be happy to talk with him about it and to discuss the issue with him. What is at stake is our competitiveness not only, as I said, in the Federal Republic but also internationally in world markets, because that is how the Federal Republic exists.

I will take the liberty in the future as well to draw attention to dangers, and not only when it is already too late, when we have to concern ourselves with unemployed people, when we have to pay unemployment benefits and the great lamentation begins. But I will speak out if possible at a time when I think I see in good time that developments are forthcoming for which we need to seek answers jointly, not in foolish debates but in concerted considerations and efforts on how to cope with the situation.

[Question] If I understood you correctly--leaving erroneous interpretations of your remarks aside--you do advocate the view that cuts in worktime, enhancement of social security and perhaps also the different wage hikes of the past few years have weakened the competitive position of German companies. What conclusions must be drawn for the future?

[Answer] Let me refer to one of the points: In the past, and also for 1980, I said repeatedly that the wage claims by the trade unions were economically justifiable on the whole. I stand by that today as well. But over the years burdens have accumulated, not so much in the field of wages set down in contracts, but in the field of fringe benefits in addition to wages. This gives us a lead--or a disadvantage, as I would prefer to call it--in comparison with our competitors. I do believe that a further cut in worktime with full wage payments, and thus an increase in the wage costs per item produced and an ensuing increase in the prices of our products in world markets, is out of the question at this time and cannot seriously be taken into consideration. At this time we definitely cannot afford any further cost increases.

[Question] Let us assume, Mr Minister, that the social-liberal coalition will continue to exist after the Bundestag elections and that it will form the government. Do you think that these ideas will be accepted by the larger coalition partner, the SPD?

[Answer] Mr Bittermann, we managed quite well in the past few years in the fields of economic and tax policy, which have always been considered the supposed breaking points of the coalition. Nor do I have any cause to complain that the leading representatives of the Social Democratic coalition partner wanted to, or have, completely deviated from market economy principles and deprived us of the opportunity of organizing the framework conditions in such a way that the market economy system in the Federal Republic keeps working well and shows better results than the countries around us.

This makes me assume that we will also come to terms in the future and that we will agree on the basis of our understanding of world economic interconnections. I think nobody has contributed more toward awakening and strengthening the realization of the people in the Federal Republic that we are not living alone in the world but that we are competing with others and that we also must help others than the social-liberal Federal Government. And I do want to mention the chancellor at this point because he has done so time and again in the past several years. We will bridge our differences of opinion and find the required compromises. We will discuss these issues completely in coalition negotiations, and we will definitely come up with a joint government program again. It is necessary to keep in mind all the time that all differences in individual questions notwithstanding, the great, common, durable platform for the social-liberal coalition is the common view on foreign policy and policy on Germany, policies on which the opposition still has nothing to offer.

[Question] Let us stay with economic policy for a while yet. The SPD, after all, is pursuing the 35-hour workweek, and in the next legislative period it might aspire to an amendment to the worktime order in which the 40-hour workweek is to be fixed. On this issue you advocate different views than your colleague, Labor Minister Herbert Ehrenberg, for example.

[Answer] The 35-hour workweek, Mr Bittermann, is not a matter concerning the Federal Government but a matter concerning the wage-negotiating partners. I have always advocated the view that it is an honorable objective if you view it under the aspect of the humanization of the worker's world; but definitely it is not a sensible objective if you believe that you might thereby get a grip on the labor market conditions and thus the problem of unemployment. And I repeat, taking costs into consideration this is absolutely wrong at this time. As for the worktime order, the endeavors to amend the worktime order and to change the legal worktime have never ceased. In that respect we have been adamant and will be adamant in the future.

[Question] In matters of codetermination, Mr Minister, you do not always see eye to eye with your coalition partner. What I have in mind is the most recent discussion on the coal-steel codetermination issue in the Mannesmann Corporation. Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has stressed that operational necessities in the Mannesmann Corporation could be granted along with retention of the coal-steel codetermination system. Do you share this view?

[Answer] I cannot comment on this because I do not have such an exact and detailed idea about the operational necessities of the Mannesmann Corporation as the chancellor obviously has. This is a matter concerning the board of directors and the corporation management. If the chancellor knows more about the matter than I do, then I cannot and will not contradict him, because we could only welcome the existence of such possibilities.

[Question] What tasks, for example in the legislative field, would you consider to have priority in the next legislative period?

[Answer] What I have planned, Mr Bittermann, is not to introduce any bill from the Federal Economics Ministry in the next Bundestag, if at all possible. We have enough laws as it is, and we do not need to produce new laws just for their own sake. I will admit that viewed from the angle of the Federal Economics Ministry this is easy to say because we are not a specifically legislative ministry. But I do not think that legislative initiatives in this field are urgently necessary for the new Bundestag, at any rate not on the basis of the present state of our findings.

ADMIRAL ADVOCATES CONCERTING WEST'S NAVAL OPERATIONS

[Ruediger Moniac article: "Navy Inspector: The West Must Secure Seas Jointly"]

[Text] Bonn--"Owing to the Soviet armament, we must reckon with developments which compel an organized presence of the Western industrial nations with their navies in maritime areas other than the conventional NATO areas. The Japanese Navy, too, must be part of this." This is what the inspector of the Federal Navy, Vice Admiral Ansgar Bethge, stated in an interview with DIE WELT.

The admiral reported that an alliance study group has been working for many months on an overall maritime concept tailored to this very purpose. The result was submitted to the NATO commanders a few days ago. Bethge did not discuss the details. In general he stated, however: "It is up to the Western alliance and the free world together to find an answer to the challenge of Soviet naval armament, and without any reference to the territorial boundaries of NATO."

The admiral explained as follows what such a concept might be like and what "presence at sea" means: "This does not mean just a few missiles kept in floating stock somewhere or warships; what this involves is the proper composition of the forces at sea in general. Are aircraft carriers needed? Are destroyers adequate? Are minesweepers required as well? How much supply tonnage is required; is a shipyard capacity needed? Must it be floating, can it be set up on shore? Who owns the required bases on the coasts of Third World countries? Do the Americans have access there, or the British, or the French? All this must be considered, organized and finally compiled in a plan. This plan needs to take time, space, armament, logistics and leadership into account. Doing all this takes time."

The naval inspector favors a "pragmatic course of action" for this "organized presence" of the Western world at sea outside the NATO area. The Western naval powers especially are called upon to act in specific regions of the seas where they have been present for quite some time. [paragraph continues]

"A reinforcement there," Bethge said, can be achieved without numerical enlargement of the Western fleets only if the use of their overall potential is coordinated. Within this framework it will be the task of the German Federal Navy to make a greater contribution in the maritime areas along Europe's northern flank."

The decision by the Federal Government to ma the ships of the Federal Navy available to NATO for missions up to the European Arctic Sea without any additional inquiries in Bonn must also be seen in this connection. This is the alliance's reply to the greater flexibility in the Soviet Navy's deployment and combat power and has nothing to do directly with the topical events in developments after Afghanistan.

Bethge: "The NATO Supreme Commander Europe (SACEUR) jointly with the pertinent Supreme Commander Atlantic (SACLANT) is responsible for the mission planning of all naval forces of the alliance from the Northern Cape down to Turkey. He wants to, and must, be able to assign the units at sea wherever the situation is most dangerous. The justification is quite simple: Since the main characteristic feature of the naval forces is their mobility and flexibility, it would be wrong to draw their mission line on an imaginary line such as the 61st latitude (parallel to the Norweigan city of Bergen)." Under the prevailing circumstances the admiral does not see any need for changing the number of large warships of the Federal Navy (their number currently being 17) and its personnel (a total of 38,000 men including 11,600 at sea and 7,100 with the air forces). Neither does he deem it necessary for the German shipyard industry to build larger warships than hitherto planned after the abolition of the construction restrictions for warships now ordered by the West European Union (WEU). The Soviet news agency TASS has already attacked Bonn, contending that the Federal Republic wants to exploit the abolition of the prohibition and now put in an appearance with its Federal Navy on all world oceans.

Bethge said in this connection that the German Navy does not need any larger warships than those already under construction, the F-122 frigates. The navy does have the means commensurate with its mission and, besides, merely sees its sphere of mission on the northern flank of Europe. Bethge further said that on the basis of a secured financing plan up to 1984, six warships of the Bremen class (the prototype bears this city's name) will be readied for their mission as planned. He hopes that directly afterwards the seventh and eighth frigates will be built. Ultimately this depends on whether or not the question concerning funds can be answered favorably.

The WEU had come to terms on dropping all restrictions which impeded the German shipyard industry in the construction of warships. In this connection the admiral stated: "This was the result of a process lasting several years in which the Foreign Ministry rather than the Federal Navy was the moving force. What was primarily at issue was to eliminate the discriminating effect in restricting German industry. This process, too, has no connection with the topical situation that has emerged following Afghanistan."

On a long-term basis the abolition of the construction restriction will produce advantages for both the Federal Navy and for industry. According to Bethge, the navy can order its supply ships at home. Owing to the restriction on construction to 6,000 tons of water displacement, it had to purchase its two supply ships "Spessart" and "Rhoen" in Denmark. There they had been called "Okapi" and "Okdne."

EDITORIAL CRITICIZES LACK OF NATO PREPAREDNESS

DW291022 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 29 Jul 80 p a

[Adelbert Weinstein editorial: "Time Is Running Away From NATO"]

[Text] The Soviets are exploiting the strategic factor of time. At intervals of 5 days a new SS-20 missile is installed. [paragraph continues]

More than 150 of these missiles are now ready for use. This weapons system is MIRVed, meaning that with every launch three nuclear warheads are fired. In 1983, about 650 of these missiles will threaten nearly 2,000 objectives in the strategic rear area of the Atlantic states.

The first Western counterweapons are supposed to be available in 1983. In De ber 1979 NATO decided to introduce 572 new missiles into its arsenal. These missiles are intended to equalize the Soviet superiority. This involves the Pershing 2 and the cruises missiles. Even last winter it was uncertain whether Western planning would lend itself to implementation in practice any time soon. There is reason to fear that at this year's NATO winter conference, too, no agreement committing all Atlantic states will materialize.

This loss of time could still be accepted. Great Britain has declared its readiness to station one-third of the new weapons systems. Italy and the Federal Republic will (hopefully) keep their word and set up launching pads. But what makes the introduction of the so-called Eurostrategic weapons so problematic is the technical schedule. Unlike the East, the West neglects the time factor as a strategic element. It is improbable that the closure of the arms gap can become reality within barely 3 years. Technical developments just cannot be ordered. Even the rapid production of such weapons cannot be enforced by any government. The question is justified whether the missiles can be introduced to the troops by 1983 even if their future has been politically ensured. And should they be (partially) available, will they be ready for theater use? The cruise missiles, for example, must be stockpiled on covered and secured bases. They must shift position often and, in doing so, they must be able to cover distances of up to 150 kilometers. The 5-meter missiles, which are packaged in mobile, boxlike launching devices, require highly qualified personnel for their operation. Depots need to be set up. Ammunition reserves must be stockpiled. Considering the chronic shortage of funds of some of our allies we can hardly assume that the missile will be present in 1983 as in a parade. The dates of 1986 or 1987 are more realistic.

The alliance, however, ignores such time differences. Be it in London or in Paris, people are thinking in time categories which ignore the stormy advance of the Soviets toward becoming a military superpower. The modernization of the British nuclear force is envisaged for a period of 13 years. Who would dare judge the situation in 1995 strategically? The conversion of the French nuclear weapons in the Albion mountains to mobile pads, too, requires a decade. Our partners pretend that they could, as before, calmly look forward to their strategic future in the nuclear shadow of the United States.

But there is no longer any such timing as a U.S. military superiority. The Soviets have caught up. In some fields they are even ahead of the Americans in strategic armament. The Russians have been leading in conventional armament for quite some time. Granted, there are some American beginnings toward eliminating the backlog. But only a little headway is being made in struggling against the clock. The new U.S. tank will be produced in alarmingly small numbers. The output per year will amount to as many units as the Soviets turn out in a month. The explanation is simple: U.S. industry, above all the electronics industry, prefers other orders.

Surely, it is understandable that in a country in which the rules of market economy apply certain sectors are preferred and others neglected. What remains incomprehensible is the fact that the politicians and the military planners do so little to change this reality. Could it be that the strategic factor of time has not been recognized? Some plannings by the Pentagon substantiate this suspicion. Alarmed by the events in the Persian Gulf, the Americans concentrated a naval unit in the Indian Ocean. Improvisation is necessary to be sure. But in all planning the goals that are to be achieved are sometimes built into the strategic picture ahead of time in such a way as if they had already been attained. Fiction is being taken for reality. Diego Garcia will become a strategic base--as far as the Pentagon is concerned it already is one. [paragraph continues]

Four aircraft carriers have to be given technical overhauls, which will take 2 years--yet on the whole they are being counted already as part of the reinforcement potential in the Indian Ocean. Negotiations on bases are in progress--in the strategic concept these bases are already solid coordinates of an enlarged security system.

This as-if strategy is characteristic of the military-political thinking of our biggest partner. Draft registration is equated with the reintroduction of general conscription. The intention to dispatch a U.S. Army corps to Europe which would reinforce the European central front is being weighted as an operational fact. Meanwhile, neither is the troop contingent available nor does the transport capacity exist for it. In the meantime time is running away from us, and we pretend to be ahead of it.

HAMBURG MEETING OF EXPERTS ON NATO STRATEGY VIEWED

[Adelbert Weinstein article: "Treaties Wilt Like Roses and Young Girls"]

[Text] The question provokes a counterquestion: "Is NATO strategy about to be changed?" This was the subject of the security policy meeting which the Hans Seidel Foundation held in Hamburg this time. The question should actually have been whether NATO has a strategy at all.

For 3 decades Atlantic security policy has been U.S. foreign policy. As long as the United States led the alliance as its strongest partner there was perhaps something like a strategic concept. The position it enjoyed because of its political power and military preponderance allowed the United States to pass off technical projects and schematic operational planning as strategy. The so-called "flexible response," a defense policy of graduated military response (in the event that deterrence failed) had to be imposed on the Europeans with gentle force, because "flexible response" was neither doctrine nor strategy. It was and is a military film relating to technical procedures, a film in which fiction is passed off as reality.

Time and again resistance arose to this concept. The decision by General de Gaulle to create a national military instrument of deterrence is ultimately attributable to the introduction of "flexible response." In the Federal Republic, too, the discussions on the sense of this military policy's nonsense have always been lively. It was no coincidence that the British have maintained a nuclear force of their own. It goes without saying that prestige played a role here in London as well as in Paris. Basically, however, they wanted a strategic fire department because they distrusted the fundamental Atlantic thesis--deterrence through graduated response.

Granted, the "flexible response" is but a partial segment of Atlantic security policy. It reflects an internal attitude. The West wants to preserve the situation of no war. War is supposed to be prevented and not waged. If possible the unthinkable should not be thought. True, to the industrial nations this is almost a compulsory attitude. As long as the Americans were superior this doctrine could even be justified. But in view of the Soviet strategy of global expansion, and in the era of new and constantly changing weapons systems the NATO theories need to be corrected, otherwise the West will stagger toward capitulation even without war.

At least one's own ideas should be somewhat adapted to those of a potential antagonist. Ferdinand Otto Miksche said this most plainly at the meeting. The French military theoretician drew attention to the decisive difference between the mission of the NATO forces and that of the Warsaw Pact. In the East the divisions, the air squadrons, the armed forces potential as a whole form the basis of an offensive policy. Arms superiority is being used for worldwide blackmail and threat. [paragraph continues]

In so doing the Kremlin flexibly shifts the key points of military pressure. In the West, in contrast, the divisions have the mission of producing security. They are supposed to deter. But it is impossible to counteract a dynamic policy which constantly changes fronts through deterrence, let alone through a deterrence with inadequate conventional means. The other side is pursuing a change in the status quo. We wish to preserve that status quo. The Soviet Union has hundreds of divisions. The Atlantic West, however, on the European central front maintains hardly two dozen operational components.

What Miksche said was not necessarily new. But the interpretation was meritorious: Here, in our case, stagnation, military weakness, spiritual indifference, partition and lack of leadership. Over there, in the Warsaw Pact, mobility, a variety of armament, desire for ideological and material offensive, the law of the strong in Moscow vis-a-vis the weak in the satellites belt. Miksche did not present the other side as a model at all. But he did show up our weaknesses: for instance, the attempt to replace the divisions we lack with nuclear force. But the nuclear weapon--and in this respect Mao was right--is strategically sterile. It is needed as a political weapon, to be sure, for deterring each other. As a military weapons system the nuclear force on the battlefield, however, constitutes an advance into unknown dimensions--and therefore it causes uneasiness. Nuclear weapons are no good at all, however, as a diplomatic instrument that might be of help in conquering the Third World. The Soviets did not use nuclear weapons in Angola, Ethiopia and Afghanistan. From this Miksche drew the following conclusion: The Soviet strategic dynamics cannot be curbed with a pure deterrence policy and a policy solely adapted to nuclear force. This is why he demands at least 60 divisions for central Europe.

This of course is more easily said than done. What is lacking is the readiness of the governments to arm conventionally. Besides, the divisions are expensive. In the next decade, moreover, there will be a shortage of recruits. The consequence will be that the existing divisions will maintain their personnel levels, but that the numbers of men in the operational units will not increase. But it is necessary to call for more NATO divisions. After all, the West cannot want to decline to even think about its weaknesses.

Colonel Miksche as a speaker unfortunately abridged some of his trains of thought in his lecture. This led to misunderstandings. But as a result the discussion became more lively. Another speaker, too, provided additional inspiration. Retired Major General Pilster discussed the threat from the Warsaw Pact. His careful analysis of forces showed two things: 66 percent of the communist armed forces are concentrated in the western Soviet Union. The military concentration allows the interpretation that the armed Red power wants to keep the West in check politically. Brezhnev's arrogant offensive against the so-called Eurostrategic weapons must be viewed against the background of the absolute Soviet superiority in conventional arms.

The Weakness of the Communist Bloc

But Pilster also proved that the communist bloc has its weaknesses. The military and constant ideological presence of Soviet communism is being increasingly felt as unbearable in the satellite states. The speaker hinted that the burden of Afghanistan is becoming heavier and heavier on the Soviet military apparatus. They require more leadership staffs. And there are excesses by the Soviet bureaucracy which are somewhat odd: Russian reservists can be assigned to Afghanistan only conditionally. A law prescribes that the reservist may be used merely for a limited period of time, and functionaries watch over the observance of this regulation with eagle eyes.

The organizers of the meeting allowed an advocate of the official NATO theses to take the floor first, which was fair. Lieutenant General Domroese, deputy chief of staff of NATO headquarters (SHAPE), defended Atlantic planning. Being polite, cool and more a military manager than an engaged general, his remarks did not fail to have their effect. NATO has had many years to formulate its theory, and there are positive aspects to "flexible response." Domroese pointed out that it is absolutely necessary to do the defending far forward. The Federal Republic will remain a credible partner only if every inch of German soil is defended. Though the general did not say so, the strategic logic allowed the assumption that what is meant by forward defense is actually "forward" [vorne] if not even "onward" [vorwaerts].

The internationally attended forum reacted in a contradictory way to the remarks. As a supplement former U.S. General Richardson lamented the inactivity of the Carter government. Richardson is an expert on the Bundeswehr. He is also familiar with the German military-political scene. He warned against excessive hopes which Europe might harbor for an election of Reagan as president. Granted, the catalogue of demands on a Republican in the White House is long. Everybody is aware of the low ebb in U.S. military matters. The will for changes does exist, but the welfare state runs away with billions.

Richardson as well as his fellow lecturer, the former U.S. ambassador to Bangkok and president of the "Foreign Policy Research Institute" in Philadelphia, Robert Kintner, urged the Europeans to do more for their security. But these admonitions were not advanced in the form of a demand. They rather sounded as though people in the United States would be happy if the alliance were to "continue to exist" at all. The eighties will become a period of testing.

This meeting did not produce a real discussion. Too many experts had been invited to attend. The inclination toward a narcissistic representation of their own strategic findings was great. Whoever succeeded in having his say came right out with plans and combinations, because nearly each of the participants had already debated the subject a hundred times in speeches and in writing. It was only thanks to the understanding conference management that it was possible to "bundle" opinions at all.

One of the "bundles": The complexion of the extension of the NATO boundaries. Most participants did not want to leave protection of the raw material resources to the Americans alone. The big partner is entitled to collective assistance by the alliance. Retired General de Maiziere, the former inspector general of the Bundeswehr, was an unyielding opponent of this thesis. He declared with assurance that no majority can be had in the alliance for such planning. His arguments were logical, too logical: Whoever approaches this alliance with reason will fail to comprehend it.

Another "bundle of opinions": Many speakers voiced concern about the lack of political concert in the alliance and about the absence of a firm political will. French participants stressed that the West lacks moral strength. Nobody contradicted them.

The third "bundle of opinions": The United States must take its leadership role seriously again. Criticism in that respect was reserved, yet the fear was quite obvious that continued paralysis of U.S. military power would be bound to aggravate the NATO crisis. There were but few opinions about the "alternative proposal" of retired General Loeser. He advocated an area distribution in central Europe and met with icy disapproval.

Thus what remains is the question whether such meetings are "worthwhile." The advantage of such meetings is that the institutions become aware of one fact in the hour of intellectual debate: Nowhere in strategy are claim and reality congruent. It was possible, furthermore, to derive from this conference for NATO the finding of General de Gaulle: "Treaties wilt like roses and young girls."

KING HUSAYN, GISCARD REVIEW MIDEAST ISSUES, EUROPEAN INITIATIVE

LD281604 Paris Domestic Service in French 1500 GMT 28 Jul 80

[Intercepted in progress]

[Text] The president of the republic and the Jordanian king have discussed the situation in the Middle East, world problems and bilateral relations. The king and his wife will meet the president of the republic and Madame Giscard d'Estaing again at the Petit Trianon in Versailles at 2030 tonight. Tomorrow morning the two leaders will meet again for another working session at the Elysee.

Jordan's Position on Palestinians

JN281311 Amman Domestic Service in Arabic 1200 GMT 28 Jul 80

[Text] The first round of talks between His Majesty King Husayn and His Excellency French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing began at the Elysee at noon today. His majesty and the French president exchanged viewpoints on the Middle East issue and on the current international situation and developments. They also discussed Jordanian-French relations. During the talks, His Majesty King Husayn reiterated the importance of both France's and the French president's role in building the European stand on the Arab-Israeli conflict. His majesty also asserted the importance of positively developing the European Community's stand toward clearly realizing the just and complete solution of the Palestinian cause, particularly since the Venice statement has indicated the positive line. His Majesty King Husayn explained Jordan's principles and convictions. These emphasize that the basis of the just solution should be founded on the Israeli withdrawal and the ending of the Israeli occupation from the occupied Arab territories--foremost of which is Jerusalem--on granting the Palestinian people their right to determine their future in their land; and on the need of the participation of the PLO, their legitimate representative, in achieving the just solution.

King Husayn's Comments

JN281942 Amman Domestic Television Service in Arabic 1800 GMT 28 Jul 80

[Excerpts] The first round of talks between His Majesty King Husayn and His Excellency President Valery Giscard d'Estaing began in the Elysee Palace at noon today. Following the discussions His Majesty King Husayn said: [Begin videotape] [Husayn] All of the important subjects pertaining to the Middle East and to the world, in addition to relations between Jordan and France. [sentence as heard]

[Question] Your Majesty, what about the European initiative?

[Answer] The European tour comes within the context of contacts and consultations with friends. Naturally we highly appreciate the development that has taken place in the positions of our friends in Europe, based on principles and the quest for a just and comprehensive peace in the Middle East, based on sound foundations.

[Question] Your Majesty, no doubt you discussed the European initiative with President Giscard d'Estaing. What are the hopes raised by the European initiative at present?

[Answer] I personally have welcomed these initiatives several times. The same is true of my brothers in the Arab homeland. We believe that this is a very good and encouraging beginning, which makes us hope for the future. [end videotape]

His Majesty King Husayn held another round of talks this evening with the French president. The last round of talks between them will be held at noon tomorrow.

ELYSEE ISSUES COMMUNIQUE ON SHAH'S DEATH

LD281316 Paris Domestic Service in French 1100 GMT 28 Jul 80

[Excerpt] A communique from the Elysee says that France will be represented at the funeral of the ex-shah of Iran by Mr Andreani, the French ambassador to Egypt.

At this time, with the passing away of the former shah, the Elysee spokesman said, the French Government recalls the interest he always took in the relations of his country with France. Just after the war, spokesman Blot added, the shah came to learn about defense problems from French forces. On many occasions he made efforts to develop relations and exchanges between the two countries. The former sovereign, like his family, the spokesman went on, was marked by French culture in which he took a personal interest.

TOPICS OF GISCARD-CEAUSESCU 'PRIVATE' SESSIONS DETAILED

LD290755 Paris LE MONDE in French 26 Jul 80 p 4

[Excerpt] Mr Ceausescu, the president of the Romanian Republic, who returns to Bucharest Saturday, 26 July, in the morning, had a third private meeting with President Giscard d'Estaing this Friday followed by a meeting attended by others. The North-South dialogue, the Middle East conflict and Third World development were to be examined during these talks.

The day was to end with a dinner at the Chateau de Ramboullet attended only by the two presidents and Mrs Giscard d'Estaing and Mrs Ceausescu (the latter is first deputy prime minister and number two in the regime).

During their second private conversation Thursday the two presidents discussed bilateral relations and the international situation.

Bilateral relations: Romania and France are anxious to extend their relations to new spheres, particularly the nuclear sphere. Romania, whose oil is growing scarce, is beginning to encounter serious energy problems. It envisages installing 12 nuclear power stations between now and 1990. The first will be supplied by Canada, but France is in line for the following round and especially for the supply of "paranuclear" equipment, notably turboalternators. France is competing with the United States and Switzerland for the Fr2 billion contract. When he entertained Mr Ceausescu at lunch Thursday Mr Barre said with reference to this prospect: "The French nuclear electric power station building program and your own country's decision to use the atom for energy production are based on a convergent view likely to lead to broad and lasting cooperation strengthening our two countries' independence."

Toward a "Convergence of Views"

Friday morning the Romanian president visited, among other industrial enterprises, an Alsthom-Atlantique factory capable of supplying turboalternators and the Marcoussis (Essonne) general electricity company research center.

The international situation: Wednesday's private meeting related to East-West relations, the forthcoming Madrid CSCE conference and disarmament. Elysee spokesman Blot said that the French-Romanian positions are "very close" and we are moving toward a "convergence of views."

SOARES CARNEIRO CONFIRMS INTENTION TO RUN FOR PRESIDENT

LD290725 Lisbon DIARIO DE NOTICIAS in Portuguese 24 Jul 80 p 3

[Excerpts] "After the elections Portugal will be able to have 4 years of stability, hard work, social justice and progress," Dr Sa Carneiro stated yesterday, closing the rally commemorating the Democratic Alliance's first anniversary which was held in the Praca do Rossio in Lisbon. But "the Democratic Alliance's Lisbon festival," as the prime minister called it, also served for the first presentation of the majority's candidate in the presidential election, General Soares Carneiro, to the people of Lisbon.

"We are fulfilling without making promises and achieving without speaking much," the Social Democratic Party [PSD] chairman began, and then stressed the importance of yesterday's date, which marked "joy at the success of a political blueprint and the starting point for the next 4 years."

The results of the last elections, which gave the Democratic Alliance parties a parliamentary majority, were then used by Sa Carneiro to explain that the Portuguese people voted for the Democratic Alliance because it was clearly stated what was being sought: "A stable and coherent majority, a suitable candidate for the presidency of the republic and the revision of the constitution."

The internal logic of this political blueprint is incompatible "with a president of the republic who uses the post to split parties," as a result of which Sa Carneiro reaffirmed his intention not to be prime minister if Eanes wins the presidential elections, "since there is no possible agreement between the two political blueprints."

"The Democratic Alliance is the utmost and only consensus possible among the democratic political forces" and "our adversaries only the Democratic Alliance and prevent it from regaining the absolute majority of votes," Sa Carneiro said, referring to the coalition that will be contesting the elections and which "do not even have a suitable presidential candidate." [sentence as published]

Next the PSD chairman discussed the past 7 months' government activity, the various attempts to weaken the executive, "the lies about individuals which emerged with strange complicities which will one day become clear" and the "successes achieved, namely, increased purchasing power, lower taxes, greater increases in incomes than in prices, increased welfare benefits and the reconciliation of economic growth with social justice and controlled inflation.

"We have succeeded and not given up," Sa Carneiro concluded, optimistically confirming his determination to "struggle to the last to realize the basic conditions of the Democratic Alliance's blueprint: a double election victory this year," more than half the votes at the general election and the election of the Democratic Alliance presidential candidate on the first round--"a president who will not be hostile toward the government and who will, indeed, cooperate with it on the same national blueprint."

Soares Carneiro's Speech

The first speaker at the Democratic Alliance meeting, General Soares Carneiro, said that if some candidates "have in their heart of hearts already decided to run as candidates but have not said so openly to the Portuguese people," he, Soares Carneiro, on the other hand, is now confirming his commitment to run as candidate for the presidency of the republic "with the resolute aim of clarifying and making possible our options, our national blueprint, in harmony with the Portuguese people.

"I will always remain loyal to the voters who elect me," stressed the presidential candidate supported by the Democratic Alliance, adding that this loyalty will be reflected in his not allowing himself to be attracted by the "exercise of power for its own sake," in steadfastness in dealing with "the antidemocratic forces," since, he said, "in a national blueprint we can only be subject to Portugal's interests, not to Soviet imperialism," and in "building in Portugal a democratic stability within which the state bodies can work in harmony, with no duplication of functions."

In Soares Carneiro's opinion, only thus can we "build and modernize," respect "those who have no bargaining power" and begin to build "a real national blueprint" in which "our approach to Europe must be an achievement supported by the wishes of all of us."

General Soares Carneiro concluded by emphasizing "the challenge" he has accepted and which will oblige us to "rebuild the state and have the awareness of a moral foundation for building Portugal."

Before Sa Carneiro's speech, Professor Diogo Freitas do Amaral, who received enthusiastic applause, said that in the presidential elections the Democratic Alliance is aiming "not only at General Soares Carneiro's victory" but also at "General Ramalho Eanes' defeat."

The Social Democratic Center Party [CDS] leader began by saying that the parties of the Democratic Alliance have not only avoided misunderstandings, thus disproving what many people believed a year ago, but "in fact understand each other better and better."

Next he said that "after 7 months in government we have already given sufficient evidence of our ability to govern, since no wave of strikes has managed to bring us down and since we are now stronger than when we started," apart from which "the educational year was particularly peaceful, and as far as the agrarian reform is concerned we have managed to pursue our policy," adding that it was not under the present government but "under the most leftwing government since 25 April that the workers died in the Alentejo."

Thus, as you can see, Freitas do Amaral declared, "we have proved ourselves in government," pointing to the "substantial financial backing" that the EEC has just decided to grant us for preparing for our entry into the Common Market in 1983, which "was a victory for the Democratic Alliance, since it was the Democratic Alliance government that submitted the membership application."

In conclusion the CDS chairman said with regard to the October general election: "We do not want just a majority of votes, but the absolute majority of votes."

NEW NATIONAL FRONT PARTY TO RUN IN OCTOBER ELECTIONS

LD271540 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1300 GMT 27 Jul 80

[Excerpt] A new political party is to contest the coming 5 October legislative elections: At the beginning of the first congress of the National Front [Frente Nacional] being held in Estoril over the weekend, it was announced that this movement has decided to apply for legal registration as a political party in order to contest the coming elections. A communique issued by the National Front coordinating committee, amounting to a veritable declaration of principles, was also read at the beginning of the congress. It states, for instance, at one point: We want to be the active voice of the national right muffled by the 25 April revolution. We stand for clear opposition to the party rule system [sistema partidocratico] accepting the rules of the game imposed by the armed forces movement at machinegun point.

RELATIONS RESTORED WITH SAUDI ARABIA; CARRINGTON TO VISIT

LD281346 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1259 GMT 28 Jul 80

[By Paul Fuller, PA staff reporter]

[Excerpts] Exporters are hoping trade with the Saudis will pick up following the announcement today of the restoration of full diplomatic relations between Britain and Saudi Arabia.

Britain's export trade with Saudi Arabia fell after the film "Death of a Princess" was shown on television in April although the overall export figures between January and May increased over the same period last year. The Department of Trade said today that the fall off in trade could not be directly linked to the showing of the programme. But a spokesman added: "There might be some nervousness among British exporters who think it is going to be a harder market."

The breakthrough in restoring diplomatic ties came at the end of a three-day visit to Saudi Arabia by junior Foreign Office Minister Mr Douglas Hurd. Mr Hurd said that it was agreed that the Saudi Government would arrange for the early arrival of their new ambassador in London and that British Ambassador Mr James Craig would return to Jidda. "This decision demonstrates the agreement of both governments to conduct all aspects of their relations in accordance with the traditional friendship between them."

As a result of today's decision, it was announced that Lord Carrington will visit Saudi Arabia on August 26.

Britain has been eager to restore full relations not least because of the critical political situation in the Middle East and Afghanistan. These issues are certain to be on the agenda when Lord Carrington visits Saudi Arabia.

GOVERNMENT ISSUES STATEMENT ON SHAH'S DEATH

LD271542 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1354 GMT 27 Jul 80

[Excerpts] London, 27 Jul (PA)--The British Government today expressed its sorrow on learning of the death of the former shah of Iran in Cairo. An official statement from 10 Downing Street said: "Her Majesty's Government have learned with sorrow of the death of the former shah of Iran. During his long reign, successive British governments enjoyed close relations with the shah, and his friendship for this country will not be forgotten." The queen has sent a personal message of sympathy to the shah's widow, a Buckingham Palace spokesman announced.

JOURNALISTS 'UNWELCOME' IN IRAN ARRIVE IN LONDON

LD251724 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1448 GMT 25 Jul 80

[Text] Four journalists accused by the Iranian authorities of being spies of the American Government flew into London today after being told to leave Iran. The men, John Connor and Simon Maxwell of UPI-TN of Britain, Scott Chisholm, a New Zealander who works for Britain's Visnews, and Doyle Memanes of the Los Angeles TIMES were held during the time of the attempted coup in Iran. They were taken to the revolutionary headquarters for questioning. Mr Memanes said: "We were not expelled as such, but it was made quite clear to us that we were not welcome in the country any longer. We were formally denounced as spies working for the U.S. Government." A fifth denounced journalist Jay Ross of the Washington POST, flew to Rome.

DENKTAS CRITICIZES KIPRIANOU FOR LODGING COMPLAINT WITH UN

TA281143 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 28 Jul 80

[Text] President Denktas has said that the Turkish Cypriot people would never accept unilateral resolutions adopted as a result of efforts made by the representatives of the Greek Cypriot people in the international field. He was commenting on reports that the Greek Cypriot leader, Mr Kiprianou, had lodged a complaint with the United Nations against the Turkish Cypriots and that Mr Kiprianou would be calling on the United Nations to take practical measures on the Cyprus problem.

Mr Denktas stressed that if the Greek Cypriots took a new initiative at the United Nations for the implementation of these unilateral resolutions, it would destroy the chance for the resumption of the intercommunal talks.

The president said that the Greek Cypriots had not been successful in their efforts during the period from 1963 to 1974 to destroy the essence of the 1960 Cyprus agreements, but now they were pretending that their efforts had been successful and that they were the masters of the entire island.

Mr Denktas said that the Greek Cypriots wanted the Turkish Cypriot people to accept their claim that they were recognized by the world as the legitimate government of Cyprus, but following the Turkish Cypriot refusal they were now lodging a complaint with the United Nations. The Greek Cypriots, he added, cannot tolerate the existence of the Turkish Cypriot people, who as partners are as sovereign as the Greek Cypriots themselves and are safeguarding the nonaligned status of the island.

UN REPRESENTATIVE MEETS DENKTAS ON INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS

TA282053 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 28 Jul 80

[Text] The UN secretary general's special representative in Cyprus, Hugo Juan Gobbi, continued his contacts in connection with the resumption of the intercommunal talks. Turkish Federated State of Cyprus President Rauf Denktas received Gobbi today for talks. In a statement following the meeting, Denktas recalled that principles safeguarding the survival, rights and liberties of the Turkish community constituted the basis of the agreement he had signed with Makarios and added that the Turkish side was making every effort to eliminate all difficulties connected with procedural matters in a bid to resume the intercommunal talks without making any sacrifices of these principles. Denktas added that he hoped that the other side would also adopt a similar stand in order to achieve the early resumption of the intercommunal talks.

DENKTAS ISSUES WRITTEN STATEMENT ON BIZONALITY

TA251351 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 25 Jul 70

[Excerpt] President Denktas has described as nonsense the Greek Cypriot accusation that if the term "bizonal" is used this will mean two states in a loose federation. In a written statement today, Mr Denktas said that sovereignty in Cyprus was shared legally and factually by the two peoples of Cyprus. He continued: That is how it was under the 1960 agreements. That is how it will be in a bizonal federal state in the future. Those who have the concept that Cyprus is a Greek island and that the 1963-74 period of aggression against the Turkish people of Cyprus can be revived will continue to be disillusioned.

Government Statement

NC252004 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1900 Gmt 25 Jul 80

[Text] The Cyprus Government has unreservedly condemned the Israeli Knesset decision to annex the Arab quarter of Jerusalem. An official statement says that this action constitutes a violation not only of the principles of justice and the UN Charter but also of the special UN resolutions on the matter. Beyond this, this action further increases the turbulence surrounding the Middle East issue and undermines peace and security.

The statement adds: The Cyprus Government's position remains unchanged. It supports the withdrawal of the Israeli troops from the occupied territories, in accordance with the UN resolutions, and the full implementation of these resolutions.

With regards to the Palestinian issue, which is an inseparable part of the Middle East problem, the Cyprus Government supports the restoration of the Palestinian people's rights, including the right to establish an independent and sovereign Palestinian state. The Cyprus Government expresses the hope that the Israeli Knesset will reconsider its decision and will not ultimately proceed with its utterly unacceptable decision on Jerusalem.

Comparison With Turkish Invasion

NC252045 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1900 GMT 25 Jul 80

[Text] Referring to the manifested intention of the Israeli Knesset to declare Jerusalem the Israeli capital, Mr Mikhailidhis, president of the House of Representatives, has declared that the Cyprus House, always firm and consistent, has supported and continues unreservedly to support the Palestinian people's struggle and backs the implementation of and respect for the UN resolutions on the Middle East problem in general and Jerusalem in particular. The house also condemns this or any other act that aims at creating new faits accomplis and impedes the Middle East solution based on the UN resolutions.

In reference to a relevant statement by the Turkish Cypriot side, Mr Mikhailidhis has stated that the Turkish side's condemnation of this Israeli parliamentary action is gratifying. It would have been right, he added, that when condemning the continuation and creation of faits accomplis by Israel, the Turkish Cypriot side also recognized that exactly the same principle applies to the Cyprus case. Mr Mikhailidhis said that the continuation of the policy of consolidating the faits accomplis in Cyprus by the Turkish occupation troops and the continued threats of creating new faits accomplis torpedo the efforts to solve the problem and are contrary to the UN resolutions.

The house president concluded: Therefore, the Turkish Cypriot side must condemn any attempt to create faits accomplis, whether these are being attempted by Israel or by Turkey against Cyprus, as actions which constitute defiance of UN resolutions, continuation of trampling of human rights as well as the creation and maintenance of sources of tension and danger to international peace and security.

Denktas Response

TA261148 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 26 Jul 80

[Text] The president of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus, Mr Denktas, has described the statement of the president of the Greek Cypriot House of Representatives, Mr Mikhailidhis, putting the Turkish peace forces in Cyprus in the same category as the Israeli occupying forces as insolent, unforgivable lack of respect and a shameful lie.

Mr Denktas recalled that it was the glorious Turkish Army that stopped those gathered under the bloody flag of Hellenism and the Greek Cypriot Orthodox Church in an effort to exterminate the Muslim Turkish population of the island and stressed that the virtue of humanity and justice of those that put the glorious Turkish Army in the same category as the Israeli occupying forces were not adequate.

Mr Denktas also stressed that it was again the same glorious Turkish Army that saved Cyprus from Greek Cypriot looters and Greek occupation and prevented the annexation of the Muslim Turkish Island to Greece by putting an end to the 11 years of cruelty and inhuman attacks aimed at exterminating the Muslim Turkish population, and finally, it was again the same army that safeguarded the independence and the nonalignment of the island. Mr Denktas said that Mr Mikhailidhis should know that, had it not been for Israeli occupation, or if the occupation could have been prevented, then the Palestinians also would have lived in freedom on their own territories just like the Muslim Turkish population.

Turkish Assembly's Condemnation

TA250551 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 0415 GMT 25 Jul 80

[Text] The Turkish Cypriot legislative assembly has called on the world parliaments, international and Islamic organizations not to recognize the Israeli Knesset's decision to make Jerusalem its capital and to take joint action to cancel this decision. In yesterday's session, the legislative assembly debated the Israeli Knesset's decision and unanimously approved a resolution harshly condemning this attitude.

The Turkish Cypriot legislative assembly resolution says that the Israeli Knesset's decision to make Jerusalem its capital constitutes a new attack against the Middle East and world peace. The resolution also says that this decision runs counter to the wishes of the great majority of world opinion, that it is a bad precedent to usurp the rights of other nations by force and that it constitutes a new and very big obstacle to the Geneva Conference, where efforts will be made to reach a just and lasting solution to the Middle East problem.

NEW TURKISH CYPRIOT MOVEMENT ISSUES DECLARATION

NC250828 Nicosia TA NEA in Greek 25 Jul 80 pp 1,3

[Text of declaration by the "Movement of Turkish Cypriot Fighters for an Independent Cyprus" mailed to TA NEA offices--date not given]

[Text] Hyprocritical England has always used the most sinister methods in implementing its two-faced colonialist policy.

It has always applied the principle of "divide and rule" in order to keep its colonies and suppress the people's struggles for independence. By using its stooges in Cyprus and inciting disputes between the Greek and Turkish communities, England has put an end to the peaceful coexistence that prevailed for centuries. For this reason, thousands of people have lost their lives.

Having realized the failure of its various maneuvers and the awakening of the Cypriot people, who demanded independence, England joined the followship of U.S. and NATO interests. It is now obvious that the consecutive plans "Prometheus," "Aphrodite" and "Attilas" were nothing but links in the same chain of the Anglo-American machinations which turned Cyprus into the "apple of discord." During the past 6 years, instead of searching for a Cyprus solution, all sorts of plots and intrigues have been used to convert Cyprus into an aggressive base of England, the United States and NATO.

We oppose and we shall continue to oppose all those who shed crocodile tears at the NATO conference in Ankara and want to impose another Camp David on us in order to recoup their lost positions in Iran.

For 6 years the Turkish community has been bombarded with promises and hopes that northern Cyprus would be turned into a mini-Switzerland and a tourist paradise.

It is evident, however, that these promises constitute a myth and aim at concealing the target, which is for Cyprus to become the 68th province of Turkey. Thus, the socio-economic crisis hitting Turkey has also been transferred to the Turkish part of Cyprus. In the past 6 years, prices have gone up sixfold; and hunger, poverty and unemployment are increasing. Denktas' fascist regime and its supporters are to blame for all of this.

In the past, plunder and violence were unknown to our society which, however, has been eroded by the 65,000 Anatolian savages who have settled here under the pretext of defending the island and have laid the foundations for the fascist idea of "Fuhrer" Turkes.

The main problems facing Cyprus today are to avoid becoming a stooge of the United States and the interests of NATO and to attain mutual trust and fraternity between the two communities, as existed in the past. These aims can be achieved through negotiations between the two sides without foreign intervention and in accordance with the UN resolutions.

We insist on the unconditional withdrawal of all armed forces and the abolition of all bases on the island.

All the settlers from Anatolia, who constitute an embarrassment with their looting and acts of violence and are detested by everybody, must be immediately removed from the island.

All Turkish Cypriot and Greek Cypriot refugees should return to their homes.

We shall struggle for an independent, nonaligned, sovereign and bicommunal republic of Cyprus without foreign bases and armies.

[Signed] Movement of Turkish Cypriot Fighters for an Independent Cyprus.

ISLAMIC ENVOYS PRAISE STAND ON JERUSALEM; ERBAKAN COMMENTS

Islamic Delegation

TA291109 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 29 Jul 80

[Text] The diplomatic representatives of Islamic countries in Ankara visited Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel today to express their gratitude for Turkey's being the first country to denounce Israel's resolution to make Jerusalem its capital. Moroccan Ambassador Ahmed Ben Aboud headed the delegation which visited Demirel. The diplomatic representatives of Saudi Arabia, Indonesia, Pakistan, Algeria, Bangladesh, Iraq, Libya, Iran, Jordan, Syria, Tunisia, Malaysia, Somalia and the PLO attended the meeting, which was held at the prime minister's office at 1100. Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen and State Minister Ekrem Ceyhun were also present at the meeting.

Erbakan on Severing Relations

TA261809 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 26 Jul 80

[Excerpts] NSP leader Necmettin Erbakan has called on the government to immediately sever its diplomatic relations with Israel. At a news conference in Ankara, Erbakan described the Israeli Government's decision to make Jerusalem its capital as the century's gravest aggression and criticized the JP government's stand on the issue. Noting that Turkey is the only Muslim country among 44 Muslim countries that has diplomatic relations with Israel, Erbakan said these relations are maintained contrary to the nation's will because of Turkey's Western-mentality government that has supported Israel.

Referring to the manner in which the Council of Ministers discussed the Israeli Government's decision and referrring to the Council of Minister's view of the issue, Erbakan said their manner was aimed at deceiving the people. He said: We will not tolerate this deception through statements. We do not want statements, we want action.

Erbakan criticized the meeting between Demirel and Ecevit at the Cankaya Mansion in connection with bills that might be enacted to prevent anarchy and terror. Noting that anarchy had not stopped but escalated as a result of bills enacted during the RPP government, Erbakan expressed the belief that anarchy and terror will escalate despite the bills to be enacted if the present government remains in power. Stating that Demirel used Ecevit as an instrument in connection with the bills he wishes to enact and that Ecevit seems to have consented to it, Erbakan added: Instead of establishing dialogues from time to time let the RPP and JP unite. Basically the two parties do not differ. They are engaged in nothing but a cockfight. If the two unite then the nation can get rid of them more easily. Two rotten parties do not make a strong and healthy one.

Noting that the unity of the state and the nation was the most important factor in the struggle against anarchy, Erbakan added that the bills that the JP government wants to enact are against human rights and aim at increasing oppression. Noting that the NSP call to establish a "national solution" restoration government was still valid, Erbakan said that this was the best solution at the present stage. He added that if the national solution restoration government is not established within the next 3 weeks then the only solution to the crisis in Turkey is early elections. Stating that the primary condition for early elections was insuring election security, Erbakan reiterated the view that a decision on early elections should be made by 19 August for elections to be held in October. He concluded by saying that the NSP General Administrative Council is to meet today and assess the developments regarding early elections and the national solution restoration government.

NEWSPAPERS CRITICIZE DEMIREL-ECEVIT MEETING

CUMHURIYET on Anarchy Laws

NC280926 Istanbul CUMHURIYET in Turkish 27 Jul 80 pp 1, 9

["The Truth Behind the Events" column: "Dining at Cankaya"]

[Excerpts] What is the outcome of the meeting between the leaders of the two major political parties at Cankaya at Acting President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil's initiative? This Cankaya initiative has many aspects. Implementing a definite tactic, JP leader and Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel managed to place a JP member in Cankaya with "de facto" powers. Honorable Caglayangil seems to be happy at Cankaya. Appointing senators from the Presidential Quota Group who are known to be JP sympathizers constituted the first stage of the planned tactic.

What results can a meeting between Demirel and Ecevit yield under these circumstances? Some newspapers contend that the dialogue has achieved positive results and that agreement has been reached on the enactment of five laws on anarchy. But, in fact, it would be overly optimistic to think that these laws, which are bound to restrict democracy in Turkey even more, can provide remedies for eradicating anarchy and terrorism.

On the other hand, honorable Ecevit appears to be attaching particular importance to the Cankaya meeting so that he may not be branded by public opinion as intransigent. The RPP leader seems to be willing to cooperate with the JP, excluding the enactment of the state security courts and the emergency laws. As a matter of fact, the RPP leader sincerely desires bipartite cooperation based on common sense and democratic principles, a desire he has frequently expressed. However, the dilemma becomes apparent at this point: Without Demirel's willingness to move away from the Nationalist Action Party [NAP] his approach to Ecevit is tantamount to drawing the RPP closer to the NAP. The prime minister of the minority government exerted efforts in this respect at the Cankaya meeting and suggested various ways of cooperating with the RPP without breaking away from the NAP.

To sum it up, all that the Cankaya dinner has achieved is an agreement on enacting five oppressive laws that are of no practical value and that will bring no solution to any of the outstanding problems.

TERCUMAN on General Elections

NC280928 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 25 Jul 80 pp 1, 12

[Article by Nazli Ilicak: "If We Do Not Want the String To Break]

[Excerpts] We must not expect much from the meeting of the leaders. A dialogue is like a building, built gradually. If a few bricks are laid every day, the building rises. If you remove one of these bricks, which has cost so much labor, the building will never rise.

How can we expect these two leaders who do not stop making the worst accusations against each other to get together and be of any use to us? Let us not have idle hopes. We believe that the best alternative is going to the polls. If the elections produce a parliamentary majority which can both function smoothly and facilitate the formation of a government which can make rapid and harmonious decisions--in other words, a stable government for the next 4 years--well and good. Otherwise, the string is bound to break at its thinnest point.

ECEVIT BLAMES GOVERNMENT FOR ESCAPE OF TWO TERRORISTS

TA271741 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 27 Jul 80

[Text] RPP leader Bulent Ecevit has said that the escape of two terrorists from the Mamak Military Prison was a scandalous incident that cannot be ignored or condoned. In a news conference he held in Ankara today, Ecevit said that the two convicts who escaped from prison were two rightist terrorists condemned to death for killing 5 persons in Balgat and wounding 12 others. Recalling that the prime minister blamed the 1974 amnesty for the present violent incidents, Ecevit said the terrorists who are active now were children then. Ecevit continued: Amnesty does not abolish the punishment, it only alleviates it. What is now happening goes beyond the legal amnesty since convicts are being permitted to escape and to go free so that they can commit new crimes. Ecevit claimed that it is clear that the rightist terrorists and their accomplices have found their way into sensitive positions within the state apparatus. Ecevit said he had hoped the prime minister would comment on the escape of the two convicts but that such a statement did not come forth and that the official statement regarding the incident was not satisfactory.

Ecevit said: This incident cannot be excused. The fact that the two convicts, who escaped by drilling a hole in the ceiling of their solitary confinement cell, could walk out of the garrison must be explained. There has also not been an explanation for the way Mehmet Ali Arca escaped from prison. The escape of Arca has not been clarified and a superficial explanation has been made. Both Arca and the convicts who escaped last night were caught while the RPP government was in power. Ecevit said he did not believe that the solution lay in the question of granting more rights and authority [to security forces] as the government claimed. The problem is, Ecevit said, that existing rights and authority are not being adequately exercised.

Noting that despite many incidents caused by rightist terrorists, the prime minister has refused to concede that rightist terrorists exist or that they have been involved in violent incidents and murder. Ecevit claimed that both the economy and state authority in Turkey had collapsed at the hands of the present government. Ecevit added: The meeting we had in Cankaya Mansion last Thursday has proved that there is no sign of a change in the government's general stand toward current issues and that the government had no intention of learning the necessary lessons from the incidents. On the contrary, the government is trying to use incidents and issues--which it aggravated--as an excuse to establish a despotic system in Turkey. Last night's bitter incident has proved how right we were in refusing to accord certain rights to this government that would facilitate this procedure.

Latest developments prove that this government must leave office as soon as possible and that it will do so, Ecevit said. He added that the RPP would continue to fulfill its task to this end. Ecevit continued: Persons who, on the one hand, keep the government in power with their votes and, on the other, claim that this government must leave office will not be able to escape their responsibilities. Ecevit noted that the escape of the two terrorists has proved how urgently the state apparatus needs repair and added: It is imperative for a government that will carry out this work to assume power as soon as possible and that the parliament must intervene in this situation without any partisan or personal considerations.

In reply to a question on whether the escape of the two terrorists would mean the end of the dialogue with Demirel, Ecevit said that this dialogue is important from the viewpoint of bridging the gap between the two big parties concerning their understanding of the state and the democratic nature of the system. He added: I do not believe that the gap between us and the Justice Party masses on these issues is unbridgeable, but a big gap exists between us and the Demirel administration on the issue of the nature of the state and the democratic system.

OFFICIAL MEETS INTERNATIONAL BANKERS IN LONDON ON NEW LOANS

TA242034 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 0000 GMT 24 Jul 80

[Text] Turgut Ozal, prime ministry under secretary and state planning organization deputy under secretary, left Paris for London after signing an agreement on rescheduling Turkey's debts to OECD countries. Ozal met with the representatives of international commerical banks in London.

According to TRT London correspondent Ovun Tezisler, the subject of extending new loans to Turkey was discussed during talks held between Ozal and the representatives of the nine big international banks. In a statement at the end of the talks, Ozal said that the deferral of Turkey's unguaranteed debts to foreign banks was not discussed during the meeting. Ozal said: We held a preliminary meeting to seek the possibilities for new loans. These talks will continue. We are hopeful about securing new credits from international commercial banks. Ozal also noted that the international commerical banks viewed the economic measures implemented by Turkey positively. Ozal will continue his contacts with the representatives of the international commerical banks tomorrow.

Talks Conclude

[Text] The talks on securing new loans for Turkey between Turgut Ozal, Turkish prime ministry under secretary and state planning organization deputy under secretary, and the representatives of nine international commerical banks were concluded in London today. According to TRT London correspondent Ovun Tezisler, Ozal held a news conference at the end of the 2-day talks. Ozal said that his talks with the representatives of the international banks were positive and that he is hopeful about the outcome. Ozal also noted that the talks in London were only preliminary contacts.

DEMIREL URGES OFFICIALS TO MEET 1980 PRODUCTION TARGETS

TA271148 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 27 Jul 80

[Text] In a directive he sent to the concerned ministries and enterprises, Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel asked them to ensure that the production targets for 1980 are achieved. In his directive, Demirel said that all measures must be taken to ensure that the production targets are reached, especially for cement, paper, iron, steel, fertilizer, coal, cigarettes, copper, aluminum, fodder and milk. He asked to be informed of the results. Recalling that the government program gives priority to fighting inflation, Demirel said; This fight can succeed if production is raised and if there are no shortages of goods in the country.

DEFENSE MINISTER CITES PLANS AT SHIP LAUNCHING

TA251901 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 25 Jul 80

[Excerpt] Ships built at Istanbul's Taskizak dockyard for the Naval Forces Command, the Gendarmerie General Command and for the Middle East Technical University were ceremoniously launched today. The keels of two gendarme boats and a landing craft were laid.

Speaking at the ceremony, Defense Minister Ahmet Ihsan Birincioglu said that strengthening the armed forces in every way is a precondition for a lasting peace. Pointing out that the defense industry plans, programs and installations are being directed toward exports, Birincioglu said: We are thus aiming to strengthen our entire economy as well as our defense capability.

JORDAN'S KING HUSAYN ARRIVES IN BONN 29 JULY

LD291634 Hamburg DPA in German 1600 GMT 29 Jul 80

[Summary of poor reception] Bonn--King Husayn of Jordan arrived in Bonn this afternoon. He was welcomed by Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher. The first talks between the two politicians started shortly after their arrival in Schloss Gymnich near Bonn. King Husayn is due to meet Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt tomorrow.

Genscher Welcome

JN292049 Amman Domestic Television Service in English 2000 GMT 29 Jul 80

[Text] His majesty the king and Her Majesty Queen Nur arrived in Bonn tonight on the second leg of their European tour. West German Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher said tonight that Jordan could play an important role in the search for a global Middle East settlement. Welcoming his majesty, Mr Genscher said the king was an important spokesman for the Arab world who is seeking a permanent peace settlement.

West German diplomatic sources said Bonn viewed the visit as particularly well timed and important since European Common Market countries decided last week to follow their Venice statement on the Middle East by sending Luxembourg's foreign minister to the region for talks from today.

Meeting With Genscher

[Text] His Majesty King Husayn met in Bonn last night with West German Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher.

A West German Foreign Ministry spokesman said that the talks dealt with the latest developments in the Middle East. He added that His Majesty King Husayn has praised the European countries' efforts in their quest for finding a peaceful solution in the Middle East. The West German spokesman added that Genscher stressed the importance of finding a solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict.

His majesty is due to meet with West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Hamburg today.

CSU OFFICIAL ON SCHMIDT-HONECKER MEETING, ELECTION ISSUES

DW300915 Bonn DIE WELT in German 30 Jul 80 p 2

[Manfred Schell undated interview with Friedrich Zimmermann, head of the CSU land group in Bonn]

[Text] WELT: The chancellor plans to meet with Poland's party boss Gierek and SED General Secretary Honecker even before the Bundestag elections. Gierek is in a very difficult domestic situation. Should Bonn come to his aid with credit guarantees or other forms of assistance?

Zimmermann: It would be better for Mr Gierek to go to big socialist brother, the Soviet Union, with his economic difficulties and induce the Soviet Union to spend more money on the people and less on armament. Besides, the economic difficulties of all Eastern bloc states are due to the faulty socialist system. [paragraph continues]

I think it is a macabre joke for the allegedly so superior socialist economic system to rely on the aid from the capitalist states which, according to the communist interpretation, are doomed to perish. But since Gierek has already outsmarted the chancellor with the treaties with Poland we might as well anticipate another horse trade. Paying out without return concessions must cease, however.

WELT: What do you anticipate from the chancellor's meeting with Honecker?

Zimmermann: The chancellor is on an Eastern tour indeed, with the actors changing but the stage setting remaining the same. They will stage a great television show, affirm to each other the will for peace and readiness for detente and, as before, Honecker will try to exchange humaneness in small doses for hard Western Deutsche Marks in bills with large denominations.

WELT: Mr Zimmermann: 10 weeks prior to the Bundestag elections the CDU and the CSU have no reason to rejoice: The public opinion pollsters continue to find them lagging behind the coalition, and no ardent fighting spirit can be found in either party.

Zimmermann: Public opinion polls never are a reason to be jubilant; election results are, at best. The two, however, have been rather far apart in the past several years. As for the alleged lack of fighting spirit in the Union, this claim is part of the subtle enemy propaganda for which many people have already fallen. The Union is perfectly aware of what is at stake, and the readiness to work, the absolute will for victory does exist.

WELT: You were the CSU politician who probably most strictly advocated the candidacy for chancellor of Franz Josef Strauss. Now we hear that many things are not coming off as planned. Where are the difficulties in your election strategy?

Zimmermann: What I have seen personally--and I definitely have gotten around in the CDU and the CSU in the past several weeks--has worked excellently. We are about to expose the weaknesses of this government, of this chancellor, and of the SPD-FDP coalition. But making it clear to the people in our country that the chancellor has shifted to the course of the Moscow faction in the SPD in both domestic and foreign policy respects remains a very essential task.

WELT: Heiner Geissler has expressly warned against an SPD state. The public opinion pollsters feel that Chancellor Schmidt on 5 October really can win an absolute majority. What conclusions must the Union draw from this development?

Zimmermann: I have said what is necessary about the value of public opinion polling. The comment about an SPD state was misunderstood in public. There is no majority for socialism in Germany. What is threatening is socialism through the backdoor, the FDP having assumed the role of doorman. Nothing will be changed in this regard even by the show battles Graf Lambsdorff has with the DGB. After all, after 11 years of continuous SPD-FDP coalition the word ought to have made the rounds that each vote cast for the FDP is also a vote for the Socialists.

WELT: The Union, or more specifically the CSU, desires a duel between Franz Josef Strauss and the chancellor. But has the Union not failed to date to support this duel by dealing with the appropriate topics?

Zimmermann: The duel, as you call it, has long been in progress. The SPD is staking all its chips on Schmidt, hides Wehner and abuses Strauss, or has others abuse him. However, Schmidt is dodging a direct debate with Strauss before the television cameras. The two top candidates represent two fundamentally different concepts. In Schmidt's case the foreign policy guideline is cooperation with the East to the greatest extent possible, ties with the West to the extent necessary. This is exactly the other way round in Franz Josef Strauss' case.

What worries me about the state of the Federal Government is the chancellor's dodging of difficult domestic issues. He takes no position on either the quarrel over codetermination or general conscription, on indebtedness or foreigners seeking asylum. He ignores the events in Bremen just as he ignores the leftist tendencies in the SPD. But he who dodges these pressing questions and instead bathes in the brightness of international meetings in an almost narcissistic way, is neglecting his actual duties.

WELT: Many people in the Union hardly consider it worthwhile to try to win the debate with the coalition solely in the fields of foreign and security policies.

Zimmermann: It is the fateful task of our era to ensure peace in freedom. When we note how the Soviet Union has become constantly more aggressive and stronger in the past 11 years and with the detente babble of the SPD, ranging from the chancellor to the last Young Socialist, still resounding in our ears, we owe it to ourselves and to our fellow citizens to oppose the SPD's course into Moscow's embrace. Nobody should be able to say later that he did not know anything about it. It goes without saying that we cannot let the Federal Government go unscathed in domestic policy as well.

WELT: State indebtedness, cyclical economic decline, the problem of the asylum seekers--these are topics which indeed concern FRG citizens, aren't they?

Zimmermann: ...Definitely, and to an increasing degree as I can state on the basis of what I find in my campaign meetings. The people have an instinctive dislike for people who run up debts in the private sphere as well as in the case of the state. Bank patrons continue to ask at tellers' windows about an imminent currency reform. In the economy people are still whispering to each other about the cyclical decline that is beginning. In the case of the last issue you mentioned, the asylum seekers, we are actually only at the beginning of a huge problem that is approaching us.

WELT: During the discussion on the influx of asylum seekers the idea came up to curtail this basic right. Are you in favor of such a course of action?

Zimmermann: All bills introduced so far will be unable to fundamentally solve the problem of the asylum seekers, let alone the Federal Government's bill that has been enacted. It is a bill which has a pure alibi mission. When article 16, paragraph 2, passage 2 was inserted into the basic law in 1949, wherein it states that "politically persecuted people shall enjoy the right of asylum," not a single member of the parliamentary council was able to visualize the situation as it is today. They proceeded from individual cases and not from migrations. And they did not mean at all that the right to asylum at the same time includes the state's obligation to grant social benefits. Everywhere in the world the states reserve for themselves the right to grant asylum, and nowhere, not even under international law, may a victim of persecution take political asylum for granted. In our country, however, any political victim may claim a legal right to asylum. The Federal Republic of Germany is obligated to admit him if he can prove his political persecution. The problems have arisen as a result of the rapidly increasing number of those who come to the Federal Republic for purely economic reasons, passing themselves off as victims of political persecution and who engage in lawsuits that last for years. The taxpayer foots the bill. In view of the continued influx of economic asylum seekers, which we must definitely anticipate will continue, we are facing the question of either letting our densely populated country become an immigration country or drawing the lines for asylum seekers more tightly. I am for a solution that will be legally unassailable. A reservation clause to article 16 will put the state in a position to protect the right to asylum against misuse.

RED ARMY LETTER TO DPA DENIES ASSASSINATION PLANS

LD291336 Hamburg DPA in German 1226 GMT 29 Jul 80

[Text] Hamburg--The Red Army Faction (RAF) has stated in a letter that it is not planning to assassinate Federal Prosecutor-General Kurt Rebmann or any politician. The letter, which arrived at DPA's Frankfurt office today, says that "Rebmann does not interest us now." It says that Baden-Wuerttemberg Minister-President Lothat Spaeth is of no interest at all and that "we also have no intention of blowing up Schmidt." The letter, which is signed "Red Army Faction", regrets the death in a car crash near Stuttgart last Friday of the two suspected terrorists Juliane Plambeck and Wolfgang Beer. It says that Juliane Plambeck was the person "whose candor and political radicalism could have shifted the muck that lay in the way." The federal prosecutor's office in Karlsruhe made no comment on the letter. It described as speculation conjectures that Inge Viett, a wanted person, was in Baden-Wuerttemberg and had been in the red BMW which had followed the car in which Plambeck and Beer crashed on Friday.

WAYS OF ARMING AFGHAN REBELS SUGGESTED

[Commentary signed Ein.: "Arms for Afghanistan"]

[Text] The idea comes from the British. British experts on the Middle East have been wondering for quite some time why the West does not come to the aid of the Afghan liberation fighters with arms deliveries. Even government members in London have loudly pondered this question. There was even a careful British probing of opinions in NATO. The alliance just could not be won over for the idea. But why should such an initiative emanate from the Atlantic alliance? It is not the West alone which has sympathies for the Afghan liberation struggle. Countries of the Third World likewise are outraged. The supplies to the Afghans could be routed via these countries. But what do the Afghan guerrillas need? Experts say they need automatic weapons for ground combat and antiaircraft missiles, because the analysts of the situation assume that the Soviets will increasingly use their air force before the end of the summer. The Kremlin might try to counteract the flexible popular warfare of the local tribes with area bombings. Whoever supplies the antiaircraft weapon will help the Afghans even better than through the Olympic boycott.

PAPER VIEWS EFFECTS OF OIL PRICE HIKES ON DEFENSE

DW291126 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 29 Jul 80 p 9

[Article signed P.O.: "Oil Prices and Defense"]

[Text] When there is talk about the consequences of continuing oil price hikes reference is made in most cases to consumers and enterprises. However, the armed forces of the NATO countries are hardly less affected. Given the present oil consumption by modern armed forces, the responsible people in the individual countries thus far have reacted very differently. In Belgium, for instance, the training hours for aircraft and vehicles have been drastically reduced to save fuel. In the United States orders for spare parts have been drastically reduced to release more money for fuel. No matter how the individual countries try to take the changed price situation into account, they will have to economize more in the future somewhere. Thus oil prices cause changes in the defense budgets, the effects of which cannot be assessed at this point.

KING HUSAYN, GISCARD CONCLUDE FINAL ROUND OF TALKS

JN291503 Amman JNA in Arabic 1420 GMT 29 Jul 80

[Text] Paris, 29 Jul (JNA)--His Majesty King Husayn and His Excellency President Valery Giscard d'Estaing resumed their talks in the Elysee Palace in Paris this afternoon. This is the third and final round of talks between them.

His majesty and the French president held the second round of talks last night, which was followed by a reception hosted by President Valery Giscard d'Estaing and his wife in the Versailles Palace in honor of his Majesty King Husayn and his wife.

The two leaders continued their analysis and evaluation of the current international issues and explained the Arab and European stands on these issues. The talks also focused on the interactions of the Palestine issue on the international arena.

Husayn Comments

JN291653 Amman Domestic Service in Arabic 1600 GMT 29 Jul 80

[Excerpt] The talks between His Majesty King Husayn and French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing concluded in the Elysee Palace this afternoon.

Following the conclusion of the talks, His Majesty King Husayn told journalists that Europe has to cooperate with the world community in order to establish a just and lasting peace in the Middle East. He expressed his conviction that Europe is following the right direction with regard to the Middle East.

His Majesty king Husayn reaffirmed that no settlement can be reached in the Middle East without Israel's comprehensive withdrawal from the occupied Arab territories, foremost of which is Jerusalem, and the recognition of the Palestinian people's legitimate rights.

On the other hand, Jacques Blot, Elysee Palace spokesman for foreign affairs, stated that His Majesty King Husayn and President Valery Giscard d'Estaing reviewed the situation in the Middle East in light of the UN General Assembly session debating the Palestine issue and in light of the task entrusted by the EEC states to Gaston Thorn, current EEC chairman, to make a tour of the Middle East.

Giscard Statement

JN291912 Amman Domestic Television Service in Arabic 1800 GMT 29 Jul 80

[Excerpt] In a statement to our correspondent in Paris, President Giscard d'Estaing lauded Jordanian-French relations which, he stated, were bolstered during his last visit to Jordan and acquired greater depth during King Husayn's current visit to France.

President Giscard D'Estaing affirmed that there was complete understanding between the two sides. His excellency stated that the Arab-European dialogue will be resumed soon, adding that there are two movements to activate such a dialogue. The first of these movements is represented by a projected meeting on the Arab and European foreign ministers' level while the second movement is represented by Arab-African-European meetings. His excellency said that there are common factors in the cooperation existing between the three sides, affirming that France will encourage any action to reach greater cooperation between the European states and the Arab homeland.

STIRN REVIEWS RESULTS OF LATIN AMERICA TOUR

LD291607 Paris LE MONDE in French 27-28 Jul 80 p 2

[Jean-Pierre Clerc report: "Europe Can Profit From Latin America's Growing Hostility to Division Into Two Blocs"]

[Text] France intends to "end its piecemeal" policy and draw up a true "carefully considered and constructive" policy toward Latin America. This policy is primarily based on "two big countries," Mexico and Brazil, "with which trade is constant." Next in line of importance are the Andean Pact countries and then the others. On the political plane France "does not hand out good and bad marks to the regimes"--which "only sparks off national reactions"--but tries to "encourage those who are moving toward democracy."

At the economic level Paris is trying to direct French enterprises "which often ignore this market" toward Latin America--a subcontinent "full of resources" and making constant progress. This is how Olivier Stirn, secretary of state to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, presented the new French "approach" toward this part of the world on his return from a new official tour of Latin America during which he visited three countries.

In Caracas Mr Stirn signed an agreement delimiting the territorial waters between this capital and France (for its Antillean departments), a problem complicated by the existence of an island, Aves (Bird Island), that is under Venezuelan sovereignty to the west of the two overseas departments. In Quito the secretary of state, who had talks in particular with President Jaime Roldos, explored the real possibilities of "reviving French-Ecuadorean relations."

In September an economic mission is to draw up some cooperation projects relating in particular to the oil-prospecting and agriculture sectors and to some durable goods in the hospital sphere, and to transportation, road infrastructures, the iron and steel industry and fishing. In Suriname, finally, the secretary of state discussed the possibilities of developing ties with a country which has 450 km of common borders with France--in other words with the Department of Guyana--while trying to assess the stability of a regime which emerged last February from a coup staged by junior officers, some of whom follow a progressive line.

Two of the countries visited by Mr Stirn, Venezuela and Ecuador, are Andean Pact members like two other countries he visited in 1969, Colombia and Peru, and like Bolivia.

Future Lies With the Center

The recent coup in La Paz is obviously a subject of grave concern for the four partner capitals. In Latin America it weakens the image of the "Cartagena Group" (Note: The five Andean Pact countries are also known as the "Cartagena Group" because the agreement creating their union was signed in that Colombian city) which had been very consistent in recent years. It is feared that it is not simply a hiatus in democracy. How much pressure will the states associated with Bolivia exert? They will certainly not go so far as to destroy the Pact, but perhaps the new regime will not be recognized. Ecuador has moreover frozen its relations. The fairly widespread conviction that Argentina may have played a role in events in La Paz is an additional source of concern.

France's political stance with regard to Latin America in general and the Andean Pact in particular is shared by its European partners, Mr Stirn thinks. A draft agreement between the EEC and the "Cartagena Group," similar to the one signed with the five ASEAN members on 7 March, has reached an advanced stage. This resumption of interest in Latin America--newer in France than in some of its European partners, notably the FRG--fortunately coincides, the secretary of state thinks, with "the growing hostility among many developing countries in the region to the world's division into two blocs."

If, according to a statement by President Roldos which Mr Stirn clearly cites with some degree of malice, "Latin America's future lies with the center," that applies not only to each state's domestic policy but also at the international level: The countries in the region, especially those bordering on the Caribbean Sea, want to "avoid becoming the theater for East-West rivalry." That is why "France is also cooperating with socialist regimes such as Cuba or Grenada."

Such an "open" attitude could moreover prevent the threat of Cuban "protection," which the secretary of state played down. Of course it is obvious that Havana is "trying to extend its political and moral influence" in the Caribbean region--notably by contacts with the trade unions and the political groups with which Castrosim has affinities. However, "that is by no means scandalous."

"The Cuban presence takes the form of highly qualified technicians and doctors. However, there is no organized plan of action throughout the region. If a situation changes through economic problems or excesses committed by governments, they are there. They are creating allies for themselves. If an opportunity arises they are quick and active. That has nothing to do with interference in states' affairs, as sending troops would be, for instance." While being passionately interested in the question of Puerto Rico which is shortly to give its verdict on its status in relation to the United States, Fidel Castro shows no desire, on the other hand, to interfere in French affairs, in other words in the Caribbean overseas departments.

Is the attempt to create a Europe-Latin America axis not likely to arouse U.S. irritation? The eruption of old world enterprises on territory which was formerly the great northern neighbor's "preserve" is clearly greatly irritating U.S. business circles--especially since many states when they have the chance are giving way to the "European temptation" out of a desire for independence and diversification.

The Washington administration, on the other hand, has no political objection to this resumption of European interest in the subcontinent. Moreover France and the United States are exchanging views on this subject. The secretary of state concluded that if European economic penetration were to become really strong in the medium term, then "political friction could certainly not be ruled out."

LE MONDE SEES NO CHANGE IN IRAN CRISIS FOLLOWING SHAH'S DEATH

[Editorial: "A Lonely End"]

[Text] It is probably too early to make a definitive assessment of the ex-shah, whom history will judge. The Iranian people, for their part, pronounced their verdict by removing him from power 18 months ago after an unprecedentedly broad uprising. The social injustices and the bloody repression perpetrated by SAVAK and the forces of order which the Iranians suffered are too fresh in their memory for them to see anything but the negative aspects of a reign which lasted almost 40 years.

Few Iranians probably regret the end of the Pahlavi dynasty, despite the upheaval their country has been experiencing since the Islamic republic's establishment. Even those who are being hounded or persecuted under the new regime did not fare any better under the old. The ex-shah also repressed any opposition from ethnic minorities--whether Kurds, the Arab-speaking population of Khuzestan, the Baluchis or Azarbayjanis--and he had more means at his disposal.

Despite the severe restrictions decreed in recent weeks, the "non-Islamic" press and various "non-Islamic" political parties now have more opportunities to express their views than under the empire. In any case the game is not yet over in Tehran and everybody can still hope to maintain or recover the social and political advantages won outright during the 1978-1979 peoples uprising.

In the Third World the ex-shah has been condemned without appeal. Aside from President as-Sadat, no Arab of state--including the monarchs with whom he had good relations--has presented his condolences or, according to the press agencies, will attend his funeral. President Carter, who defended him to the end, has sent his family a message which does not include any praise for the man who was the United States' "loyal friend and ally" for several decades, to cite President Nixon.

One of the White House chief's considerations was probably a desire not to aggravate the conflict between Washington and Tehran over the hostages. The Iranian parliament is, in principle, due to decide the question in the next few weeks. Since opinions are clearly divided among Iranian leaders as to what should be done with the captive diplomats, the feeling in Washington is that their release is not entirely out of the question.

Observers are, however, much more skeptical. The dispute between the two countries is much too serious for it to be settled merely by the death of the former sovereign whose extradition was demanded by Iran. The Islamic students holding the hostages quickly announced that they would now demand the return of the Pahlavi fortune, part of which is invested in the United States.

That is not all. In order to draw a veil over the past once and for all President Bani-Sadr has demanded on several occasions that the U.S. Government admit the "crimes" committed by the United States in Iran and that it promise no longer to interfere in the Islamic republic's internal affairs.

The hostage question is particularly difficult to settle since it constitutes a bone of contention among the two factions now vying for power in Tehran. One faction, accused of being "pro-Western," wants the U.S. diplomats to be released as quickly as possible; the other, denounced as "opportunist" by Mr Bani-Sadr is, however, anxious to maintain the conflict with the United States in order to prevent any "compromise" with "imperialism."

In other words, the ex-shah's death does not really alter the facts in the Iranian crisis.

FOREIGN MINISTRY REJECTS POLISARIO VERSION OF ALGIERS TALKS

LD300108 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2000 GMT 29 Jul 80

[Text] The Spanish Foreign Ministry's Diplomatic Information Office has issued the following note in connection with the negotiations held between the Spanish ambassador in Algiers and the Polisario Front:

The Spanish Foreign Ministry emphatically rejects the Polisario Front's untruthful and incomplete version of the conversation held on 25 July in Algiers between the Spanish ambassador to Algeria and a Polisario Front representative. That conversation was a continuation of and an expansion upon the numerous demarches undertaken by the Spanish Government to persuade the Polisario to immediately release the Spanish citizens it is holding. In these contacts the Spanish Government, which has always favored a peaceful political solution to the Sahara conflict based on the principles and recommendations of the United Nations and the OAU, has made very clear to the Polisario Front its most determined refusal to negotiate under threat or blackmail. Therefore, says the note, the Spanish ambassador carried out the instructions he had received to reiterate the Spanish position and demand the immediate release of the hostages. The ambassador went on to warn that failing such a release, the Spanish Government would draw the appropriate conclusions about this unwarranted attitude of hostility on the part of the Polisario which contrasts with Spain's repeated demonstrations of goodwill.

The Polisario Front, however, in response to these approaches, has not only demonstrated intransigence but even made fresh threats against Spanish fishing vessels going about their traditional activities in the Saharan bank waters. The Spanish Government expresses its most forceful rejection of these threats and will take all available measures to defend its legitimate interests and protect its fishermen.

DEFENSE MINISTER DISCUSSES ARMS PURCHASES, COOPERATION

LD300210 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2200 GMT 29 Jul 80

[Defense Minister Rodriguez Sahagun interview in London with correspondent Carlos Riera--date not given--recorded]

[Text] [Rodriguez] I am here in response to an invitation extended to me a couple of months ago by my British counterpart, Francis Pym. We have been able to find this gap in our schedules in order to talk at length about a whole series of things, but in particular the possibilities for cooperation between our countries in various fields, especially weapons and the armaments industry. As you know, I favor a policy which reduces Spain's strategic dependence on other countries where weapons manufacture is concerted, and which moreover allows us to take advantage of manufacturing in Spain some of the components or some of the products needed by our armed forces and even of manufacturing such items for export so as to reduce our costs and also to create jobs and assist industrial recovery in order to get out of the economic crisis in which we find ourselves.

[Riera] Am I right in taking you to mean that we will purchase some military equipment from Britain?

[Rodriguez] Not exactly. When I talk of industrial cooperation, what I have in mind is making some of our foreign armaments purchases here on the basis not simply of commercial compensatory deals, but of deals involving industrial and technological compensation which will allow us to become more independent and to manufacture more and more at home.

To such an end we have over the last year concluded a number of agreements with Italy, and I have had contacts with Germany and France. With France we already have some agreements; with Germany we will probably be signing a framework agreement in the autumn, while important agreements have recently been signed between Spanish and German firms. So we are making a serious effort to develop our industry. In this direction Britain is more of an unknown for us. The lack of such contacts and exchanges has so far prevented us from getting a clear view, and so I see the present visit as providing an opportunity for us to get to know each other better and examine possibilities for cooperation.

Naturally some of the things we want to buy from Britain have possibilities for certain industrial compensatory deals. It may also be possible to make industrial and technological compensatory deals for some of the things we need, for example, British-made weapons, and we may also be able to contemplate future participation in some of the joint projects which might be worked out by the main European countries in the armaments industry sector.

[Riera] And on another front, could this cooperation be translated into exchanges of officers or into contacts at other levels?

[Rodriguez] Yes, contacts are developing more and more. For instance, training of pilots for the Harrier, which we have in our navy, is going on in Britain. There are also study exchanges between the two general staffs. We are now making preparations for the director of the British Royal College to visit our Ceseden [Spanish National Defense Studies Center]. So contacts are being stepped up and this will lead to ever greater cooperation.

[Riera] Thank you, Mr Minister.

PRESIDENT KARAMANLIS RECEIVES BULGARIA'S TANCHEV DURING VISIT

AT281209 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 28 Jul 80

[Text] At 1030 President of the Republic Karamanlis received First Deputy Chairman of the Bulgarian State Council Tanchev, who is in Athens for a few-days' friendly visit. The Bulgarian deputy chairman gave Karamanlis a warm friendly message from the chairman of the People's Republic of Bulgaria, Zhivkov. Among other things, Zhivkov stresses the great significance he attaches to the good relations and cooperation between Greece and Bulgaria. Zhivkov also expresses the wish that these relations expand in all fields. Tanchev gave Karamanlis an invitation from Zhivkov to pay an official visit to Bulgaria. The invitation was accepted and the date for the visit will be fixed through diplomatic channels.

Conclusion of Visit

[Text] Bulgaria's Deputy Chairman Tanchev yesterday held talks with Prime Minister Rallis and Foreign Minister Mitsotakis. Tanchev also met with Yeoryios Mavros. In the evening Mitsotakis gave an official dinner in honor of the Bulgarian dignitary, who departed Athens late last night for Sofia.

SPOKESMAN DENIES 'ULTIMATUM' GIVEN ON U.S. BASES ISSUE

AT291352 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 29 Jul 80 pp 1, 9

[Excerpt] The Greek Government has not given an ultimatum to Washington on the issues of our return to NATO and the U.S. bases in Greece. In fact, replying to a question about a London TIMES report published the day before yesterday saying that "Greek Foreign Minister Mitsotakis has stated to U.S. Ambassador R. McCloskey that, unless Greece returns to NATO by autumn the Greek Government will ask the Americans to dismantle their bases," government sources stated: First, our policy on the NATO and bases issues is well known. Second, we have not set a deadline (as THE TIMES has claimed.)

At this point it should be recalled that, just as the Greek Government recently declared to all interested parties, the Greek position on these two critical problems is:

1. The suspense about the issue of our return to the NATO military wing cannot be indefinitely prolonged. After a reasonable period of time, the relevant Greek proposal (for a return to NATO) will cease to exist.

2. The operation of the (U.S.) bases is conceivable only within the NATO framework.

Consequently it is stressed that if the NATO issue is not settled within a reasonable period of time and the Greek proposal is withdrawn the U.S. bases will cease to operate. It is also clarified that one should not expect that it will be possible to continue the operation of the bases under a new bilateral (based on a Greek-U.S. agreement) status. Meanwhile, authoritative government sources yesterday stressed that Athens has no information or indication of a change in the U.S. stance on the issue of maintaining the current balance of forces in the Aegean.

The same sources added that our policy is to maintain this "balance" and that "we have almost succeeded in this field," that is, in maintaining the balance by having the United States grant aid to Greece and Turkey in the ratio of 7:10. Government sources stated the above in reply to a report that was published the day before yesterday according to which "Washington is not committed on the Aegean".

PRESIDENT'S OFFICE DENIES WARNING LETTER SENT BY MILITARY

TA301011 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 30 Jul 80

[Text] It has been announced that press reports to the effect that a letter of warning has been submitted to the acting president by the armed forces commanders are without foundation. A statement by the Presidential Press and Public Relations Office says: Reports appeared in today's press to the effect that a warning letter has been submitted to the acting president by commanders of the armed forces and that the acting president brought this matter to the attention of the two leaders during the meeting he held with them on 24 July 1980. No letter of warning has been submitted by the armed forces commanders to the acting president and no such statement was made by the acting president to the prime minister and the RPP leader during their meeting.

ENVOYS, OFFICIALS, NEWSPAPER COMMENT ON JERUSALEM ISSUE

Praise From Islamic Countries

TA291603 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 29 Jul 80

[Text] Diplomatic representatives of Islamic countries in Ankara paid a visit to Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel to express their gratitude to Turkey for being the first country to denounce Israel's decision to make Jerusalem its capital. Moroccan Ambassador to Ankara Ahmed Ben Aboud headed the delegation. The diplomatic representatives of Saudi Arabia, Indonesia, Pakistan, Algeria, Bangladesh, Iraq, Libya, Iran, Jordan, Syria, Tunisia, Malaysia, Somalia and the PLO attended the meeting, which was held at the prime minister's office today at 1100. Expressing the delegation's gratitude on this issue, Ambassador Ben Aboud said:

[Begin recording in English fading into Turkish translation] Your Excellency, on behalf of my colleagues, the chiefs of diplomatic missions of Islamic countries accredited in Ankara, I would like to thank you and express our satisfaction for receiving us and for giving us this opportunity to see you. I would like to point out that we have received with great satisfaction and respect the announcement made by Your Excellency last Thursday upon Israel's decision on 24 July to make holy Jerusalem their capital. As it was rightly pointed out in the statement, this decision represents a great irresponsibility at a time when safeguarding global peace and stability is so vitally important and it also threatens world peace. We regard this decision as a serious challenge not only to the Islamic world but the world at large. This fait accompli cannot be accepted and this fait accompli should receive a suitable, strong and fundamental reply from the whole world. If Your Excellency can provide us with more information on the statement which you made on this subject and can further comment on it, we shall be grateful to you. [end recording]

In reply to the statement made by the Moroccan ambassador on behalf of all the Islamic countries' representations in Ankara, Prime Minister Demirel said:

[Begin recording in English fading into Turkish translation] Thank you very much Your Excellency. As a matter of fact the decision by Israel to make holy Jerusalem its capital is, in our view, an erroneous resolution. This decision can create new hostilities in this part of the world at a time when peace and stability are so much needed. We also believe that this resolution contradicts international law and justice. This move represents an extension of the policy of gaining territory by the use of force. Such a stand can never lead to a valid solution. From the start we have opposed Israel's moves. In 1967, I made a similar statement on the issue of the Israeli occupation. I have repeated this view in connection with Jerusalem as well. Jerusalem, which is a holy city, should never be in Israeli hands.

If this situation continues it might lead to additional problems. Thirteen years have elapsed since I first made such a comment on Israel. Then I was a newly-elected prime minister in Turkey. After 13 years, Israel is once more, on the one hand, trying to create the impression that it is striving for peace, while on the other, it is taking such a resolution. I believe that this fait accompli should definitely be rejected. We, together with all the other Islamic countries, support Jeruslaem's rightful place in the Islamic world. Opposing this resolution and reacting to it is a matter for the whole world and not only one country. I hope that Israel will not insist on its resolution. If it does, it will lead to additional confusion, hostility and problems. We, the Turkish Government, believe that this is an irresponsible resolution which might threaten peace. It is our belief that this is a very wrong decision, which has no rightful aspect and can never be ignored. This subject will be followed up. No country--no Islamic country--should accept this, even if other countries agree to it. It is clear that insisting on this path will cause new threats and confusions. Moreover, I do not believe that this has been a wise resolution. This decision is not right. It is against international law and justice and reason. [end recording]

Denial of Break in Ties

NC3000620 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 29 Jul 80 p 10

[Excerpts] Ankara, (special)--Some Israeli newspapers reported yesterday that the Turkish Government is planning to sever its diplomatic relations with Israel, but Foreign Ministry officials have stated that these reports are definitely untrue.

A high-ranking official of the Ministry said: "The Turkish Government does not in any way harbor such an intention. It has expressed its denunciation of the proclamation of Jerusalem as a capital and it may resort to other measures as well depending on the situation. However, severing diplomatic relations with Israel is out of the question."

Criticism From NAP Leader

TA291823 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 29 Jul 80

[Text] Recalling that his party was opposed to any change in Jerusalem's status, NAP leader Alpaslan Turkes said that Israel's decision to make Jerusalem its capital seriously threatened peace in the Middle East. In a written statement in Ankara, Turkes called on Israel to reverse its decision. He pointed out that Israel's decision to make Jerusalem its capital would serve neither Israel's nor other regional countries' interests. Turkes added: As was the case for years during the Ottoman rule, Jerusalem must remain an open city to persons of all creeds who want to pray there. It should be recalled that Jerusalem is holy to Muslims, Christians and Jews alike. In addition to the Muslims, persons and countries of other religions will oppose this Israeli decision. Turkes said that they considered Israel's decision to be very dangerous and expressed his regrets. He added that the Turkish Government's moves in connection with this issue were very constructive.

CUMHURIYET Commentary

NC300740 Istanbul CUMHURIYET in Turkish 28 Jul 80 pp 1,9

["The Truth Behind the Events" column: "Ankara--Jerusalem"]

[Excerpts] Terror has assumed such dimensions in recent weeks that no one can be concerned with the country's other problems. We also seem to have lost all interest in external matters. [paragraph continues]

Interesting events are taking place in Western Europe, which is endeavoring to assume a role between the United States and the USSR. The latest event that has aroused deep concern is the decision of the Israeli Knesset--with 65 votes in favor and 12 against--to proclaim Jerusalem as the "eternal and indivisible capital."

Demirel's minority government lost no time in denouncing this decision.

There are internal as well as external problems that compelled Ankara to react without any delay. Turkey's economic relations with the Islamic countries, particularly during Ecevit's term in office, had assumed as much importance as relations between Ankara and the West. Moreover, Demirel's government must out of necessity take into account the reaction of the public and the NSP.

But unfortunately, Israel does not seem to be willing to abandon its intransigent policy. Israel's state concept can be considered a reflection of a mystic spirit inspired by the Old Testament. Israel's decision is so extreme that it could upset U.S. equilibrium in the Middle East. If the Israeli Knesset ratifies the decision proclaiming Jerusalem the capital, the steps that will be taken by the Islamic world may compel Turkey to choose between the Muslim countries and the West.

This dilemma is worsening from day to day and it seems that Turkey will encounter difficulties in continuing its role as the Western bloc's representative in the Middle East.

PARTIES TO PREPARE INTERPELLATIONS AGAINST GOVERNMENT

RPP Leader Ecevit

TA291828 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 29 Jul 80

[Excerpts] RPP leader Bulent Ecevit has said that the talks he had at the Cankaya Mansion have proved that the issues of the government and the election of the new president are still Turkey's primary and current issues. Ecevit was speaking at the joint meeting of the RPP parliamentary groups in Ankara today. Ecevit said that during the Cankaya talks Acting President Caglayangil, who was a mediator in the dialogue between himself and Demirel, had in fact expressed the same views to the prime minister and had opposed the idea of a coalition that would lead to a broad-based restoration government.

Ecevit continued: The election of the new president and the government issue are tightly intermingled. This makes it imperative to continue our constant democratic efforts for saving our country from the Justice Party minority government. That is why our party groups are currently engaged in preparing certain interpellation motions. Ecevit added that, on the one hand, the RPP would endorse bills connected with domestic security which do not damage the democratic system and that, on the other, it would make efforts to include on the assembly agenda interpellation motions aimed at toppling the government. Ecevit pointed out that it was imperative for the RPP to work very hard to win the 1981 general elections and to lead all the democratic forces of the people to this end in a harmonious way. Even if we have to risk our lives, Ecevit said, we must overcome all obstacles in our way. Recalling that every society had to pay a price to live in democracy and liberty, Ecevit said that Turkey was now paying this price with heavy interest.

NSP Leader Erbakan

TA291540 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 29 Jul 80

[Text] NSP leader Necmettin Erbakan said that the interpellation motion prepared by his party against Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen has been submitted to the presidency of the National Assembly.

In a news conference at the parliament today, Erbakan explained the decisions made by the NSP Administrative Committee. A statement by the party administrative committee said that the foreign minister has continuously misled the government. The statement adds that, taking into consideration the foreign minister's stands and views on foreign issues and on Jerusalem, which damaged our national interests, the party decided to submit an interpellation motion against the foreign minister. The announcement recalls the NSP claim that their proposal for a national solution government is valid until 19 August and adds that, if this is not accepted the necessary preparations for an early election in October will be undertaken by the party.

The interpellation motion submitted by Erbakan and his colleagues stipulates that the foreign minister has exerted efforts to separate Turkey from the Islamic world in a bid to make it join the EEC and that he has not been able to safeguard Turkey's rights in the Aegean. The motion adds that the foreign minister neglected Turks living in western Thrace and joined the Western countries in the embargo imposed on Iran; that he failed to provide the necessary support to the Afghan fighters; and that he tried to promote relations with Israel. Erbakan added that his party has submitted a bill to the National Assembly's presidency envisaging the breaking of diplomatic relations with Israel.

BLACK SEA GOVERNORS, SECURITY DIRECTORS MEET ON PUBLIC ORDER

TA261711 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 26 Jul 80

[Excerpt] Public order in the Black Sea region has been discussed at a regional governors meeting held in Samsun under the chairmanship of Orhan Eren, minister of state and acting interior minister. The governors, security directors and gendarmerie commanders of 10 Black Sea provinces participated in the meeting.

In an opening statement, Eren said that the struggle against anarchy will continue through legalchannels and the legal forces of the state. Noting that the primary duty of the state is to insure security and public order in the country, Eren added: It is impossible to achieve economic,cultural and social development and progress and to reap the fruits of tourism without eliminating anarchy and terror and without destroying the secessionists' and destructive forces' hopes for success. Peace and tranquillity are the basis for financial and spiritual development. Eren noted that every sacrifice will be made in the struggle against anarchy, terror, secessionism and destructiveness and that all public resources will be mobilized toward this end. Noting that, if necessary, certain state activities will be postponed so that the struggle against anarchy can be carried out, Eren said: When we are faced with various obstructive factors within the public personnel in our struggle against anarchy we will overcome them through legal channels. Eren asked the governors to act in a manner that will strengthen the citizens' confidence in the state and called on them to remain loyal to the constitution, the laws and Ataturk principles. Noting that the dialogue between the administration and the citizens should continue uninterrupted if the terrorists are to be isolated, Eren concluded by saying: The state will definitely insure the peace and tranquillity expected by the citizens by fully utilizing the authority granted by the laws within a legal framework. There is no other way of insuring the eternal continuation of the Ataturk Republic.

According to information obtained by TRT correspondents, Interior Ministry Under Secretary Durmus Yalcin; the chief of staff of the Gendarmerie General Command, Major Gen Mehmet Kiral; and Security Director General Ismail Dokuzoglu also attended the meeting. The governors of Samsun, Rize, Trabzon, Ordu, Giresun, Sinop, Artvin, Tokat, Amasya and Corum and the security directors and the gendarmerie commanders of these provinces also attended the meeting.

ALLIED AIR FORCE COMMAND CHANGES, AIR OPERATIONS CITED

[Adelbert Weinstein article: "Allied Air Forces Under a New Commanding Officer"]

[Text] Ramstein, 29 July--Change of command in the Supreme Command of the Allied Air Forces in Central Europe: On Tuesday the departing supreme commander, U.S. General Pauly, turned over command of the six Atlantic air forces combined under the Ramstein headquarters to his successor, U.S. General Gabriel. In keeping with tradition it is always an American who heads the flying units and the ground-based antiaircraft units covering the operational area of NATO's Central European front. This general at the same time is the supreme commander of the U.S. forces in Europe.

The combination of the two commands in one person is of strategic significance, because the incumbent supreme commander at Ramstein holds the "nuclear sword" of the alliance. He is the representative of the man in the White House when it comes to using the nuclear weapons. The President may delegate the implementation of the most important mission to the American general in Europe: Triggering nuclear escalation.

Naturally the Atlantic Supreme Allied Commander (SACEUR), Casteau, would be included in the chain of command. The Supreme Command at Brussels would not be ignored, either. Still, the general commanding the air forces occupies a central position as an expert. This is why the supreme commander of the U.S. air forces and the Atlantic supreme commander came to see General Pauly off. The air force supreme commanders and/or the chiefs of staff of the Canadian, British, Belgian, Dutch and German Air Forces were also present.

This ceremony had been preceded by an invitation from the inspector of the German air forces on Monday. The allied airmen and their missilemen bade their farewell at an almost private function. They were at a closed party and the few civilians, without exception, had some private meetings with General Pauly in some form: representatives of the land government, the county commissioner and the City Council members of Kaiserslautern attended.

German General Obleser, a charming host, awarded the Federal Republic's highest decoration to the general on the behalf of the federal president. Subsequently the Bundeswehr sounded the great retreat at the Betzenberg Sports Arena. The security organs of the state and of land Rhineland-Palatinate, as well as those of the Bundeswehr, had made preparations so that a recurrence of the Bremen riots was impossible.

The worth of such public functions cannot be given enough emphasis psychologically. The honoring of the departing U.S. supreme commander served to recognize the performance and work of the U.S. Armed Forces in Europe at the same time. The German people, especially the people of the Kaiserslautern and the Palatinate Forest regions, were made aware of what is hiding behind the routine of the daily flying operations in the way of political reality: Europe's largest flight installations have been concentrated at Ramstein and Sembach.

Subordinated to the Supreme Command of the Allied Air Forces Central Europe are two air fleets: the 4th ATAF (Allied Tactical Air Force) and the 2nd ATAF. The 4th is commanded by a German Air Force general, the 2nd by a British general. All the staffs are integrated. This means that the generals, officers, noncomissioned officers, and soldiers of the six Atlantic air forces act operationally like one unit. [paragraph continues]

Integration not only allows the coordination of basic tactical views, it has also contributed since 1970 to the development of mission procedures valid for all. This is important because air warfare is a war without borders. It requires uniform tactical procedures which are adapted to technology.

Besides, a uniform operational reaction is necessary because the air forces including the missile units constitute the arm "of the first hour." Being constantly combat-ready, they can hit within a short time, because they are integrated. The Supreme Command at Ramstein can thus send more than 1,400 planes on missions within a few hours. Another 800 planes could be made available and brought up shortly afterwards from the reserve stockpiles of the British, U.S. and German air forces. In addition, there are the Pershing missiles of the German Air Force and defense missiles of all the allied air forces.

This combat potential is impressive. Still, the potential adversary in the Central European sector is superior to the allied air force units in a proportion of 2:1. Airplanes of the Warsaw Pact can be above Ramstein within 20 minutes, because the military doctrine of the Red air force is oriented toward attack. A strategic rearmament program has been in progress behind the Iron Curtain since 1969. It is supposed to be wound up this year. This means that modern planes will be assigned against the Atlantic Central front which have an extended combat range and can penetrate our territory more deeply. Their mission bases are located in the Soviet rear area. In part they are outside the reach of the Western allied air forces.

Part of the first attacking wave consists of 4,000 planes of the Warsaw Pact. Several hundred medium-range bombers will be ready for missions a few days later. At least 2,000 fighters and fighter bombers could be mustered for a raid-type attack without any great preparations. It can be anticipated that one third of all air forces of the Warsaw Pact would be used for offensive purposes; at least 1,700 are kept ready for both attack and defense. However, what must be included is 500 combat helicopters. These might cover the Russian tank attacks from the air. Finally, an offensive missile arsenal exists: 4,000 missiles for short, medium, and long ranges have been assigned to the armed forces of the Warsaw Pact.

In view of this numerical superiority the quality of the Western air forces gains increased importance. General Pauly during his 4 years at Ramstein--2 years as deputy, 2 years as supreme commander--devoted major attention to the efficiency of the air forces. The older models of the allied forces were given amended assignments. The modern types were systematically trained for strategic missions.

But this dynamic general, too, could not exert any influence on political decisions made in Washington. The funds for the U.S. air forces stationed in Europe were cut by $125 million for the 1980 fiscal year. From 1977 to 1980 the U.S. air forces in Europe received 111 additional planes, and 5,000 maintenance personnel were added. The number of large repair facilities was doubled. But the cut of $125 million had the consequence that the quality of the crews decreased. Fewer "sorties" than planned were flown. By "sortie" the air force means the flight of one plane. Fewer "sorties" automatically entails less experience and less security.

Still, the number of U.S. flight hours is above that of the Soviet Air Force. Since the commands of the 3d, 16th and 17th U.S. Air Wings in Europe, with 720 operational planes, account for the major part of the allied planes, experts continue to consider the flying quality of the air forces Central Europe to be on a high level. It has to be so, too, the experts say, because the Soviets have developed three new, very modern types of combat planes. They will be reinforcing the Warsaw Pact in the foreseeable future.

BOMB INTENDED FOR IRANIAN EMBASSY EXPLODES; IRAQI ARRESTED

LD301708 Hamburg DPA in German 1628 GMT 30 Jul 80

[Text] Vienna--Six people were hurt in an explosion in Vienna's diplomatic quarter today. Much damage was caused. Initial police investigations suggest that the nearby Iranian Embassy was the target. An injured Iraqi Kurd was held as a suspect. He said an Arab he knew asked him to deliver [words indistinct] a bag quickly to the Iranian Embassy. He thought this suspicious and put down the bag in order to inform the police. The explosion followed. An Austrian postal official detained the suspect after a brief tussle as he was trying to run away.

Iraqi Diplomat's Expulsion

AU310645 Vienna Domestic Service in German 0500 GMT 31 Jul 80

[Text] Yesterday's bombing attempt in Vienna's Third District was arranged by Iraqi Embassy Secretary Sami Hana Attallah. He handed a briefcase with a bomb to an Iraqi Kurd and ordered the man to carry the briefcase to the Iranian Embassy. The man had second thoughts on the way and wanted to phone the police, but the bomb exploded at the moment. Eight people were injured and hundreds of window panes were broken. The Iraqi Embassy secretary was declared persona non grata and must leave Austria within 24 hours. The secretary general of the [Austrian] Foreign Ministry has summoned the charge d'affaires of the Iraqi Embassy to his office to protest against the involvement of an Iraqi diplomat in the bombing attempt.

FREE-TRADE ZONE PROJECT WITH SNRY ABANDONED

AU251450 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 25 Jul 80 p 7

[Summary] After several months of negotiations at ministry level in which representatives of the provinces of Styria, Carinthia and Burgenland participated, the plan to conclude a border zone agreement with Yugoslavia has been abandoned. The Yugoslav side had suggested the establishment of a 20 km free-trade zone for certain goods along the Austrian-Yugoslav border, as well as a series of economic promotion measures for that zone. Styria and Carinthia objected to such an agreement on the grounds that it was lacking in reciprocity and involved disadvantages for the Austrian side, especially regarding capital investments and the establishment of firms. An Austrian Trade Ministry spokesman expressed the hope that it will be possible, even without a formal agreement, to intensify economic cooperation between the two countries in the border region.

GROWING TRADE DEFICIT WITH USSR BLAMED ON OIL, GAS PRICES

AU220937 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 22 Jul 80 p 6

[Summary] In the first 5 months of this year Soviet exports to Austria went up 50 percent to 5 billion schillings, largely as a result of higher oil and natural gas prices, while Austrian exports to the USSR in the same period declined 6 percent to 2 billion schillings. This unfavorable trend is primarily due to the fact that the USSR has not placed any major orders for machinery and plants with Austrian firms for many years. Although the hopes for new Soviet orders based on the joint Austrian-Soviet commission meeting in May have not materialized, it is hoped that Austrian exports to the USSR will benefit from the conclusion of a new long-term cooperation program for the period 1981-90 that is scheduled for this fall.

BELGIUM

'FATAH REVOLUTIONARY COUNCIL' CLAIMS TERRORIST ACTIONS

LD301638 Brussels in French to Africa 1500 GMT 30 Jul 80

[Text] The inquiry in Belgium into the attack on the Jewish children in Antwerp seems to be progressing. The links between the two men arrested, one in Antwerp after the attack and the other yesterday in Brussels, now seem to be clear. The Tunisian student arrested yesterday in Brussels has, moreover, been transferred to Antwerp, and the inquiry is now entirely in the hands of the public prosecutor of that town.

The public prosecutor's department in Antwerp today confirmed that the alleged Tunisian intended to carry out an attack last Sunday at Zaventem Airport. It must be said that the similarities between the two men was worrying: Both of them were carrying forged passports, both possessed the same weapons, and both had identical names.

The two men seem to belong--but this is conditional--to the same organization, the Fatah Revolutionary Council, which is a dissident movement of the Palestinian Fatah and not part of the PLO. This is a movement unknown to Middle East specialists, but one which is being talked about, since in Paris this morning an anonymous telephone caller to AFP claimed responsibility for the Antwerp attack in the name of the same Fatah Revolutionary Council. The caller also claimed responsibility for the execution of an official of the Israeli Embassy in Brussels who died rather mysteriously last Friday from a gunshot in the chest. According to the embassy and the Brussels police, this was an accident.

GOVERNMENT TO BUILD THREE NEW NUCLEAR POWER PLANTS

[Own correspondent report: "Cabinet Intends To Build Three Additional Nuclear Power Stations"]

[Excerpt] The Hague, 17 July--The Dutch Government intends to build three more nuclear power stations to meet energy needs up to the year 2000. Two power stations will be built next to each other near the western northeast Polder dike and the other near the existing power station in Borssele. This will increase the capacity of the Dutch nuclear power stations sixfold.

The government is sticking to its decision to use salt strata [zoutkrepels] in the north of the country for storing the waste from these power stations. The government regrets the second chamber's decision to carry out test drilling only after the broad social discussion on nuclear power has been completed.

This was what the Van Agt cabinet wrote to the second chamber today in its third energy policy written statement which relates to nuclear energy. The statement was signed by the economic affairs, public health and environment, social affairs, and housing and physical planning ministers. The first part of the energy statement dealt with general energy policy and the second part with coal.

KING HUSAYN MEETS WITH SCHMIDT 30 JULY

Arrival in Hamburg

LD301246 Hamburg DPA in German 1104 GMT 30 Jul 80

[Excerpt] Hamburg--King Husayn of Jordan, accompanied by Queen Nur al-Husayn, arrived in Hamburg this afternoon for talks with Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt. The royal couple were received at the airport by Schmidt and his wife Loki. The king arrived in a special plane from Bonn where he had meetings on Tuesday and this morning with Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher. The talks between Husayn and Schmidt are being held at the Senat's visitors' residence and are to focus on German efforts--within the EEC framework--to reach a peace settlement in the Middle East. The guests will return to Bonn this afternoon.

Discussion on Middle East

JN301237 Amman Domestic Service in Arabic 1200 GMT 30 Jul 80

[Text] His Majesty King Husayn met with FRG Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Hamburg at noon today. During the meeting the two sides reviewed the various aspects of the situation in the Middle East and the relations of cooperation between the two countries.

His Majesty King Husayn arrived in Hamburg this morning to meet with Chancellor Schmidt, who had cut short his private vacation in the town. The two leaders' meeting lasted about 1 hour. His Majesty King Husayn and Chancellor Schmidt are expected to hold a joint press conference.

Review of Meeting With Genscher

LD301510 Hamburg DPA in German 1339 GMT 30 Jul 80

[Excerpts] Hamburg/Bonn--In connection with fresh intensive efforts to solve the Middle East problem, Jordan's King Husayn had a comprehensive exchange of views in Hamburg today with Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, centering on the European Community's initiative.

Before the meeting in the Hamburg Senat's visitors' residence, Husayn, who arrived in Bonn on Tuesday evening, had another meeting with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher in Bonn. Genscher stressed that the European countries' efforts to make a contribution to securing peace in the Middle East were aimed at securing not only Israel's right of existence but also the Palestinian people's right to self-determination. Husayn praised the EEC's role as positive and important.

Genscher further approved a European-Arab foreign ministers' conference. A meeting of this kind could demonstrate that both sides were determined on constructive cooperation. This cooperation could provide "major joint opportunities" and also serve towards the creation of trust between Israel and the Arabs.

Leaders' Positions

JN301914 Amman Domestic Television Service in Arabic 1800 GMT 30 Jul 80

[Excerpt] His Majesty King Husayn and FRG Chancellor Helmut Schmidt held a meeting in Hamburg this afternoon.

During the meeting, His Majesty King Husayn presented his evaluation of the aspects of the Palestinian issue, the situation in the Middle East and the issues which are occupying world public opinion.

His majesty also reviewed the developments being witnessed by the Arab region and the Islamic world.

His majesty affirmed that solving the Palestinian issue is first among the factors which would lead to joint cooperation and rapprochement between the Arab and European regions, which have geographic, economic and security proximity.

Mr Schmidt reviewed the FRG's stand on the current issues, stressing the need to develop Arab-European dialogue in order to reach joint stands and to find a comprehensive solution for the Palestinian issue, since instability and a failure to achieve peace in the Middle East will reflect on the joint interests existing between the Arab world and Europe.

Mr Schmidt further stressed the need to develop a world economic system balanced between the developed and developing states and based on justice and common interests.

At the conclusion of the talks His Majesty King Husayn extended an invitation to Mr Schmidt to visit Jordan. Mr Schmidt accepted the invitation with thanks. The date of the visit is to be fixed following the forthcoming FRG elections.

A part of the meetings was attended by Ahmad al-Lawzi, chief of the Royal Hashemite Court; Hasan Ibrahim, minister of state and acting minister of foreign affairs; and several high-ranking FRG officials.

Conclusion of Talks

LD301658 Hamburg DPA in German 1603 GMT 30 Jul 80

[Excerpt] Hamburg/Bonn--King Husayn of Jordan has invited Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt to visit his country. After talks with the king in the guest house of the Hamburg Senat, which lasted nearly 4 hours, Schmidt said that he has accepted the invitation and intends to make his visit after the Bundestag elections. Schmidt and Husayn, without disclosing the substance of their talks, said that broad agreement has been noted in their intensive and amicable conversation.

Husayn welcomed the Federal Government's understanding of Near East problems and its readiness to cooperate. He is taking home good and constructive impressions and will pass them on to the Arab countries. The Federal Republic, he said, enjoys a high reputation in the Arab world. Its relations are characterized by personal and political friendships.

After his talk with Schmidt, Husayn late this afternoon flew back to Bonn, where he will meet Federal President Karl Carstens tomorrow.

FRG REGRETS INCORPORATION OF E. JERUSALEM INTO ISRAEL

LD311018 Hamburg DPA in German 0949 GMT 31 Jul 80

[Text] Bonn, Jul 31 (DPA)--The Federal Government regretted today the incorporation of East Jerusalem into the Jewish state decided upon by the Israeli parliament, and the raising of the formerly divided city to the status of Israel's "united capital."

A Foreign Ministry spokesman said this step could "seriously disrupt" peace efforts in the Middle East. This was apparent already from the first reactions from Egypt.

The spokesman pointed out that the EEC heads of state and government in their Middle East statement of 13 June issued in Venice recognized the special importance of the Jerusalem question for all participants, and noted that they would not accept a unilateral change of the (?status) of Jerusalem.

STRAUSS SEES NEGATIVE RESULTS OF SIGNING CSCE FINAL ACT

LD310856 Hamburg DPA in German 0808 GMT 31 Jul 80

[Text] Bonn--CDU/CSU candidate for chancellor Franz Josef Strauss has spoken of the negative results of the five years since the signing of the CSCE Final Act in Helsinki on 1 August 1975. Strauss said today in the Union's press service that the warnings given by the CDU and CSU have been proven right that the Soviet Union would use the Final Act not as a peace document, "but as a tool for framing its policy of expansion of power."

Strauss pointed out that from Angola to Afghanistan nonaligned states had come under Soviet influence. New sources of conflict are being created by the export of arms and ideology. "The thin trickle of family reunification shows that the hope to be able to buy human alleviations by making political concessions to the Eastern bloc has come to naught," added the CSU chairman.

He called on the West to rid itself at long last of its blinkers, not to be blinded any longer by formulations, and at long last to see the facts. These include that for the Soviet Union disarmament, arms limitation and arms control are means of its power strategy. With regard to the CSCE followup conference due to take place in Madrid in the autumn, Strauss said that from a Western viewpoint it would make sense only if it were not being misused to open a fresh chapter of utopian pro-Soviet policy of detente under the pretext of military detente. He continued that it must be the task of Western policy to demand in Madrid not only from Moscow but also from the GDR and other Easter bloc states, "without any ifs or buts, adherence to the freedoms agreed in the CSCE Final Act, the free exchange of people, information and views." In the interest of all Germans the CDU and CSU would welcome it if the federal chancellor would in this field "assume that Western leadership role" which in other respects he so very much likes to arrogate to himself.

PAPER ON BROWN'S CONFIRMATION OF SOVIET MISSILE CLAIMS

[Commentary signed Mac: "Not Just a Mishap?"]

[Text] The latest information from Washington is bound to make the European NATO partners pensive. If it is really true that U.S. Secretary of Defense Brown has confirmed Brezhnev's data on a reduction in the Soviet medium-range potential without letting the Allies know about it, this would be more than just an information mishap.

After all, the Europeans are largely dependent on the information of the U.S. intelligence services in their assessment of the security policy situations which then might entail consequences in the arms sector. The findings from satellite reconnaissance, for example, are essential for the corresponding countermeasures, especially with respect to missiles.

Perhaps Washington will now try to play the matter down. Probably the hint will be forthcoming that the continued installation of new SS-20 missiles makes Brown's February remarks invalid. Or could it be that the Allies were informed after all without making this known? This can hardly be assumed. But in that case the question remains as to what game Washington is playing with its allies.

SCHMIDT'S PLANNED MEETINGS WITH EASTERN LEADERS SCORED

[Johann Georg Reissmueller editorial: "This Has Nothing To Do With Peace"]

[Text] In the next few weeks Chancellor Schmidt will see two party bosses from the East bloc: Poland's Gierek and the German Honecker. No fundamental objection can be raised against such meetings. The Federal Republic has much to negotiate on with the GDR, a bit less with Poland but still a considerable amount. Much of it may only lend itself to dealings between the respective top leaders. The catalogue of topics for such meetings can hardly be attacked because outsiders are not really familiar with it. Therefore criticism against such meetings can be advanced sensibily only if objectionable concomitant conditions so warrant.

And they do exist in this particular instance. Bonn coalition politicians have already announced that both meetings serve the purpose of promoting detente in Europe. The coalition thus continues where it left off with its praise about Schmidt's visit with Brezhnev. Just recently when FDP floorleader Mischnick was in Warsaw we heard the same thing--overcoming the absence of talks between East and West was mentioned.

This is exactly what the Soviet Union is banking on. It has occupied Afghanistan and is waging a war of oppression there--consequently the Soviet Union is interested in having everything proceed normally everywhere else. This is also what Mussolini desired after he had seized Ethiopia, and Hitler after he had seized the so-called remnant of Czechoslovakia; and true enough, the world of that time was complaisant toward them. The Soviet leaders today will think: Why shouldn't we get away with the occupation of Afghanistan in the same way? So he who pursues "detente" in Europe with conferences and visits beyond the East-West border is falling for a Soviet trap.

Granted, it is necessary to differentiate within the Eastern block. Romanian party boss Ceausescu dislikes Brezhnev's Afghan adventure, and he openly indicates so. If a West European head of government meets with him, Moscow's policy of diverting attention from Afghanistan surely does not benefit. Poland's Gierek, too, would feel better if Brezhnev had not invaded Afghanistan. But he cannot show this and must even say the opposite. Much as Gierek might dislike it, in what the Soviet Union calls its "detente policy" he is an aide without a will of his own. Honecker is that even more. Detente exercises by Western statesmen with these two at a time when the Red Army is forcing Afghanistan into becoming a protectorate are, therefore, a dubious venture.

But the chancellor's meetings with the two East bloc party bosses are not only intended to serve the dialogue, the "overcoming of the crisis" after Afghanistan, but also "peace in the heart of Europe." This is what SPD Chairman Brandt anticipates from the Schmidt-Honecker meeting. No doubt he also makes such a forecast for the chancellor's meeting with Gierek. Dozens of politicians in the Bonn coalition join this view, and not a single one of them has so far contradicted it. The coalition thus continues a policy of wrong claims and wrong reports of successes which it has been pursuing since 1970.

At the time it acted correctly in seeking a new Ostpolitik and in negotiating treaties with the East. It was a disadvantage that it showed a lack of circumspectness and patience in doing so. But the Brandt-Scheel coalition committed the most serious mistake when it claimed of the treaties with the East, of its entire new Ostpolitik, that peace in Europe would become safer as a result. Treaties of that nature were not suited for this task. Whether Western Europe, therefore, is safe against Soviet aggression and Soviet blackmail does not depend on treaties between Bonn and Moscow (or Warsaw or Prague) but on the balance of power--on whether the Soviet Union deems the great strike, or the threat to use it, adequately risky. In this respect, what matters in turn is the military strength of the West and its will to defend itself. The safety of peace, unfortunately, has no casual connection with Bonn's Ostpolitik.

This does not say anything against treaties with the East, but a lot against a propaganda which attributes a peace-securing effect to Bonn's treaties with the East, Bonn's Ostpolitik. Such a wrong representation has done a lot of damage. It has lulled millions into dreamily believing that peace has become more and more solid since 1970 and that the Soviet Union has ceased to be a threat.

Our Bonn statesmen can see the consequences after the invasion of Afghanistan and in the face of the clandestine Soviet missile armament: Being used to regard the Soviet power as a partner is a peace that has grown constantly safer as a result of Bonn's Ostpolitik--and not to regard it as an adversary--a large segment of the West German population only had lukewarm disapproval for the occupation and for the missile armament, a disapproval which soon turned into indifference. This just suited many a coalition politician, it fitted into their semineutralist plans. Others were alarmed by this. They now realized how the margin for a policy of circumspect resistance to Moscow's imperialism has become narrower in the Federal Republic. Can they not remove the deceptive feathers from their Ostpolitik at least now--late but not too late?

NEGATIVE EFFECT OF ECONOMIC PLIGHT OF U.S. FORCES IN FRG SEEN

[Guenther Gillessen series, part 1: "The GI in the Federal Republic Has Become a Poor Man"]

[Text] "It gave me a pang," the wife of an American noncommissioned officer reports; the German taxi driver was "happy" that the dollar is worth less. Formerly, 10 or 20 years ago, the American passangers had thrown dollar bills at him as though they meant nothing; as though he himself was nothing, not worth any further attention. Now everything is upside down. Now he, the taxi driver, has money while they, the Americans, are poor, and that is much better.

Did the conversation proceed just as it was recounted to us? Possibly. The sensitivities are considerable. Maybe the situation was entirely different too. Perhaps what had been interpreted as carelessness and contempt on the part of the "rich" American was really generosity in little things. Who knows? And what this taxi driver reportedly said might have been a pensive reflection on the changes in the world. Possible the wife of the noncommissioned officer was not the best reporter: a former German, and now in a fix. German, at any rate, was what she had been in her readiness to distrust, to entertain suspicion. She was one of those people who always manage to see the bitter side first in any dubious matter. In any event the friendly frankness which to many Americans is a philosophy of life had not rubbed off on her after 15 years among Americans.

Not many Americans might react so sensitively, but all of them are now learning the truth of the thesis from the national economic seminar which says that a rational currency is the simplest expression of the overall conditions of a nation and is in direct relationship to its international prestige. The situation of the United States in the world and that of the American soldiers in the Federal Republic have changed fundamentally. The Germans have become prosperous, and now they think they are better than the others. In European eyes nearly nothing is left of the shine of the United States, in which every U.S. soldier in Europe participated at the time, or of the former superiority of the Americans.

Granted it is still the same army, but it is no longer made up of the same fellows as those who set foot on European soil at Omaha Beach in June 1944 and thus marked the opening of an American-marked West European postwar era which lasted for nearly 20 years. The soldiers now stationed in Baumholder, Mannheim, Hanau or Gelnhausen are the children of the generation of victors and of the occupation era. They do not know what it was like in Germany in 1945. They themselves grew up in an America in whose big cities serious social conflicts were waged in the sixties and which subsequently for the first time waged a war it no longer won. They are a young generation which experienced the convulsions of American ideas about itself. Americans are no longer 3 meters tall. The taxi driver should have realized this when he talked as vindictively as he reportedly did.

But the higher-ranking U.S. officers still remember how things were at the time. One of the colonels at the headquarters of the U.S. 7th Army in Heidelberg does not see it as painfully as does the wife of the noncommissioned officer. "When I was transferred to Germany for the first time in 1960 my wife and I were able to afford a cleaning woman daily on my first lieutenant's salary. Today my colonel's salary is not enough for that. My wife is working now. She is an editor with a small newspaper for the American community in Heidelberg. And now the two of us do the cleaning work together on Saturdays." On this tour of U.S. garrisons we hear time and again that many wives of American officers of staff officer rank contribute to the family's living, often as teachers at American schools, as nurses, or at the U.S. Rhein-Main air base.

The young first lieutenant was still able to exchange each dollar for more than DM4 20 years ago. In 1972 it was just DM3.50; 1975 a mere DM2.50. Between July 1978 and July 1980 the dollar dropped from DM2.05 to DM1.73. During these 2 years alone purchasing power dropped 15 percent while German prices increased at the same time. For the owner of an American billfold the dollar buys fewer and fewer German marks all the time, and the DM fewer and fewer goods or services than before. Many American families, above all in the lower military ranks, are living in what is close to misery.

With an expendable income of about $500 a month (with housing and heating being free of charge) a small family is forced to do some tight budgeting to cope with the costs of living and clothing--not to mention small diversions. It is not easy for the wives of soldiers in the lower ranks to find unskilled jobs in the garrison towns. To mitigate the dilemma wives and children of U.S. soldiers are now allowed to pay for meals in some garrisons. The dollar decline and inflation intensify the isolation and seclusion of the Americans in the Federal Republic.

A lieutenant colonel with a staff position at V Corps (Frankfurt) had a very common example of this to tell. He and his family attended the passion play in Oberammergau. A beer cost DM2.30, a "Coke" for the girl and a "spezi" [mixed beverage of Coca-Cola and lemonade] together cost DM3.30, and the two cups of coffee for his wife cost the same. All told the small refreshment stop cost a DM10 bill. In one of the restaurants of the U.S. garrison he would have had to pay about half. If on the German market everything is nearly twice as expensive as it is in the U.S. Army facilities, the compulsion to be thrifty is driving the Americans into their own cafeterias much more often than in the past.

In the "commissary," the grocery market of the American communities, the American housewife does her shopping at about 55 percent the cost of the same basket of groceries in a comparable German store. Considering the income conditions of the soldiers and their families which are worsening anyway, the price becomes a nearly compulsory argument not to buy "German" but to have one's shoes repaired, the laundry done, the clothing mended "American."

This intensifies the divisive elements which exist anyhow, such as the effect of their own schooling system, the preference for their own kinds of sports, the religious service in English and the entertainment in the club life of the American settlement.

Above all the noncommissioned officers and young officers lack everyday opportunities to meet Germans. It would be desirable for this very age group between 25 and 35, however, for their stay in the Federal Republic to be a satisfactory and indirectly also a politically effective experience. Since people of the same age group entertain themselves best, the Germans of the same age are missing the opportunity to gain personal experiences with Americans and to get to know their way of living and thinking.

Formerly a considerable segment of army members and their families spent their vacations at the same places as the Germans. This, too, has decreased. The Americans are no longer able to travel nearly as much as they could before. This applies not only to the Americans from the United States, but also the Americans in Europe, the members of the armed forces. Maintaining an automobile in Germany has become more expensive. This can be seen by the private vehicles of the American soldiers. The parking lots of the barracks are full of unregistered automobiles that are irrepairable at the moment. German hotels have become almost beyond the means of familites or individual young soldiers. Consequently vacations must be planned differently than before. They book the vacation homes and colonies which the U.S. Army maintains under its own management, for instance, in Garmisch, Berchtesgaden and at Chiemsee.

The vacation programs of the U.S. forces have been enhanced lately. There are courses for horseback riding, sailing, skiing, mountaineering. But the disadvantage of all these inexpensive vacation programs time and gain is the fact that American soldiers and their dependents, with the inclination to keep to themselves which prevails anyway, travel to just a few specific places along well-worn tracks: a sort of island hopping from one U.S. oasis to the next, from their own settlement to their own autobahn gas station, to their own vacation resorts. Added to the language barrier and economizing are other aggravations in German-American contacts. One of them is the change ofAmerica's post-Vietnam army into an army of volunteers. To a considerable extent it is recruited from among strata with little schooling and, consequently, with little interest in the foreign, the German, environment. It will be necessary to come back to this issue in the reports that are to follow.

NAVAL CONSTRUCTION PROGRAM EXPERIENCING DELAYS

[Rubdiger Moniac article: "Frigate Construction Delayed by 9 Months"]

[Text] Bonn--The frigate construction program for the Federal Navy is under time pressure. The shipyard industry cannot comply with the delivery schedules contractually agreed on for the six combat ships of the F-122 type. Federal Defense Ministry quarters mention a delay of 9 months. Other sources quoted by the JOURNAL INTERNATIONALE WEHRREVUE anticipate 12 months or more. At Bonn's Hardthoehe "nobody is getting excited over this, even though we are not happy about it, either."

Under the new schedule the first frigate, which is under construction in Bremen, can undergo sea trials in early 1981 at the earliest and cannot be commissioned by the Federal Navy before April 1982. The navy now expects to commission the last six ships in October 1984.

The Defense Ministry lists various reasons for the delay: Industry submitted its specifications under pressure and declared itself prepared to comply with "very short delivery schedules while meeting international standards." It is unfortunate that these six ships are being built in five shipyards. The parliamentarians who demanded this in order to safeguard jobs have now realized this as well.

The delay becomes problematic for the Federal Navy because roughly 50 percent of the crews are conscripts who will be available for service aboard ship for only a few months after their training ends. This is why their training cycle must be planned in great detail.

DIE WELT ASSESSES POSSIBLE EFFECTS OF LAW OF SEA ON FRG

DW311105 Bonn DIE WELT in German 30 Jul 80 p 7

[Heinz Heck article: "Germany Is Surely One of the Big Losers"]

[Text] At the Third Law of the Sea Conference a comprehensive system of international law is being sought which will regulate shipping, fishing, oceanographic research, environmental protection and mining on the ocean floor. The Federal Government believes that the convention, as represented in the Informal Composite Negotiation Text (ICNI), has already largely been established. With regard to the question of the ocean floor there is still some elbow room for negotiations, even though developing countries, above all, are pushing in a direction which appears to be unacceptable for the Federal Republic.

It is precisely here that new ground is a stake in both technological as well as juridical respects in a field whose great economic significance has only recently come to the fore during the course of the conference itself and which overshadows other issues today.

Apart from this, a kind of "war by proxy" is to be waged in this field with a view to ward implementing a large number of elements of the "new world economic order" which are demanded by the developing countries. The initial solution to this new order is marked by state control, whereas the one which is predominantly now is that of the market economy, except for segments such as the agricultural sector.

Another impediment is the fact that some industrial countries with pronounced interests in terrestrial mining, particularly Canada, are pursuing an obstructionist strategy. What matters to them above all is that the manganese nodules from the ocean depths, which also contain cobalt, nickel and copper, do not seriously compete with their own mining. At any rate, a petition from the Federation of Chambers of German Industry and Commerce (DIHT) to the Federal Ministries of Economics and Foreign Affairs says the present negotiating results on the planned ocean floor program appears to be "unacceptable for reasons affecting policies dealing with the world economy, order, raw materials and technology." What should be the objective is to provide all states and their companies with free, equal and legally secured access to these raw materials (including their exploitation, transportation and smelting.

On this the industrialized countries acknowledge that since they possess the prerequisites for the extraction of mineral resources from the ocean floor the developing countries must also be given the opportunity (in technical and financial respects) to participate in this "joint heritage of mankind."

It is for this reason that the "parallel system" has been devised, meaning the existence side by side of an "enterprise" which holds authority over the ocean floor along with the state as well as private enterprises of individual countries. DIHT however, fears that in the meantime the parallel system has been weakened to the advantage of the ocean floor authority through a large number of stipulations. This seems to be indicated, among other things, by the following stipulations that are to be included in the Law of the Sea Convention.

The authority is to participate in negotiations on international raw materials agreements, where it will represent the entire deep-sea production.

It is to be authorized to determine "appropriate" conditions and methods for the mining of other (than manganese nodules) raw materials as well. Thereby it would already be granted control over resources whose existence and significance cannot be foreseen as yet.

At a revisory conference (which presumably is to take place 15 years after the convention has become effective the enterprise of the authority might receive a monopoly position.

It is to be feared that the authority's raw materials policy could become the starting point and cornerstone of a comprehensive raw materials bureaucracy. This would eliminate competition between deep-sea mining and terrestrial production. Ore production from manganese nodules would then function merely as a "buffer" for regulating the raw material markets.

This is the direction also aimed at by the coupling of manganese nodule production with terrestrial nickel production (already accepted by a majority) which was proposed by Canada, an important nickel producer.

If such an arrangement were to be achieved, then raw material have-nots--be they industrialized or developing countries--will remain in their present state of dependence and the headway made heretofore by German enterprises, for example in the field of marine mining technology, would be of no use.

Thus the architects of the conference, as far as they aim at a monopoly-like position of the authority, logically call for compulsory technology transfer (from the companies to the "enterprise"). During the current state of negotiations, no distinction is being made as to whether legally protected equipment or methods are at stake or not or whether third technologies are involved (meaning that technology which the company engaged in undersea mining has acquired through purchase from another company. Whenever equal conditions are not conceded to the "enterprise" then the other companies will also not be allowed to utilize this technology.

These few examples already show that everything is done so as to impede the exploitation of this promising raw materials source; this ultimately can only result in a generally higher price level for raw materials. It is rather doubtful whether this is advantageous in the view of the Third World, which after all wants to conquer a 25 percent share in world industrial production by the year 2000, because many of these countries are as dependent upon imports as, for instance, Japan and the Federal Republic.

It seems to be likewise doubtful as to whether the planned financial contribution to commercially run ocean floor mining will prove to be advantageous. But after all, Minister of Economic Cooperation Rainer Offergeld (SPD) has already justified and welcomed the expediency of the international fees which were demanded by the North-South Commission (chairman: Willy Brandt) by referring to the settlement planned in this respect.

It is precisely the Federal Republic that has a legitimate interest that German firms not only utilize their technological knowledge, which they acquired after large investment, but also that they be in a position to advance as unhampered as possible in their research work. This is why the Bundestag early in July passed a law "on the preliminary regulation of deep sea mining." Apart from some negative votes by leftist SPD members, this law met with the approval of the whole house.

The starting signal for the German Parliament was the coming into force of a corresponding American law in June. On this explosive matter the German parliament did not want to step out of the political shelter of the Americans. Other countries interested in undersea mining, such as Britain, France, Italy and Japan are planning similar steps.

The German law envisages the possibility of commercially utilizing mineral resources from the deep sea as of January 1988. Thus prospecting and exploration can continue. Reciprocity is to be agreed upon with states which also pass national laws. This is to prevent as much as possible international lawsuits and to guarantee to the holder of a permit the exclusive utilization right, irrespective of his nationality.

The more that states pass national laws, the greater is the de facto legal effect of such regulations after a possible coming into force of the international convention. The more companies that participate in undersea mining, the smaller certainly will be the risk that the authority will prevail with its abstructionist strategy. Up to now, however, the danger does not seem to have been banished at all. The tug-of-war is still in full swing.

Jokingly but appropriately CDU expert Peter Kittelmann described the Second Law of the Sea Conference as the "biggest land robbery at sea in the history of mankind." Today it is already taken for granted that the convention, which will be effective some day, will sanction littoral control of 12 nautical miles of coastal waters, 200 nautical miles of exclusive economic zones and even more far-reaching shares in continental shelfs. This could entail roughly two dozen states with extended coastlines dividing roughly 40 percent of the sea surface among themselves. Apart from the aforementioned restrictions, the principle of the freedom of the seas would be valid only over a considerably smaller area, and this would apply in regional respects as well.

As a result of the extension of coastal waters, more than 100 straits which hitherto had been open shipping routes will be under the control of those countries adjacent to the sea lanes. The DIHT said this is not the only, albeit a particularly spectacular consequence of the new Law of the Sea. Granted, the states bordering on the sea would be confronted with the obligation to allow the "innocent passage" (the translation should be "harmless") of ships. Yet the DIHT is afraid that this innocence lends itself to a one-sided interpretation despite the convention.

It further sees the danger that the freedom of shipping might become the exception to the rule whose framework would be more specifically defined by the soverign right of the coastal states. But viewed from the angle of shipping and of foreign trade, the point at issue now must be to preserve the high seas character to the greatest extent possible, at least in the economic zones.

The curtailment of the freedom of shipping and thus the special privileges of the coastal states should be defined at the conference unequivocally and finally so as to prevent discrimination. It may well be that the new law of the sea relevent for shipping will not be determined by the convention but only through the practice of handing down verdicts by the international court which is competent for settling quarrels.

The new convention has not as yet been completely formulated. The points of dispute are still profound and numerous. Yet, by now the winners and losers of the conference have largely been determined. Winners above all are the states with long coasts in general and those with an extensive shelf in particular. The Federal Republic is among the definite losers. In this connection the Federal Government cannot be spared the accusation that it failed to attach to the conference the attention it deserves, especially in view of the German interests (poverty in raw materials and great technical potential, with a poor starting position as a result of short coastline).

In nine rounds of negotiations since 1973 no German foreign minister ever stepped onto the slippery floor of this conference, which can be called mammoth in every respect, so as to provide the German delegation, well staffed by experts, with more political weight as well.

In this connection the argument does not hold water that this is not customary. It could have been politically useful over an 8-year period. After all, Kissinger also showed the flag at the conference and the United States is in an incomparably stronger negotiating position than the Federal Republic. Beyond that the U.S. delegation has in Elliot Richardson a man at its top who had already been his country's secretary of commerce, attorney general and under secretary of state and who is considered to be among the prominent figures of the Republicans.

The political disadvantages of the German negotiating position have been accepted rather than taking a plunge forward. Meanwhile, this conference is leading up to a completely new distribution of political weight in the world.

GOVERNMENT ISSUES STATEMENT ON NUCLEAR COOPERATION WITH IRAQ

LD310949 Paris LE MONDE in French 31 Jul 80 p 22

[Text] The Foreign Ministry issued the following explanation Tuesday, 29 July:

The French Government is surprised at the unfounded statements and accusations which have recently been made about its nuclear cooperation with Iraq despite explanations already supplied by the competent French authorities and bodies.

1. It points out that Iraq, like any other country, has the right to the peaceful uses of nuclear energy and does not see any reason for this right to be refused.

2. It points out that Iraq, adhering to the Nonproliferation Treaty, has accepted International Atomic Energy Agency [IAEA] monitoring of all its nuclear activities. There can be no reason to doubt the efficacy of this monitoring which is carried out in all the countries which have signed a guarantee agreement with the IAEA.

3. It stresses that, under the terms of the 18 November 1975 French-Iraqi agreement, Iraq furthermore confirmed to France its commitment to submit to IAEA monitoring the substances, equipment and installations received within the framework of cooperation between the two countries.

4. It points out that most research reactors operating in the world are fed by highly enriched uranium. It therefore does not see in what way the supply of this type of fuel to Iraq could constitute a new factor.

5. It gives the assurance that the method of supplying this uranium corresponds only to the needs of the research reactor supplied, that it is scheduled in order to meet these needs and is surrounded with all the necessary precautions.

In conclusion the French Government confirms that its cooperation with Iraq pursues perfectly legitimate goals and is surrounded by all the necessary guarantees. It will continue to follow this line without giving way to pressures or maneuvers.

LE MONDE Editorial

[Editorial: "Nonproliferation Impossible?"]

[Text] With the French Government's help, Iraq is completing the construction of a major nuclear research center not far from Baghdad which should be operational some time next year. Iraq, which has signed the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, places all its nuclear installations under international control; France has not signed the treaty but has been acting as if it had for many years. Legally speaking, Paris' supply of highly enriched uranium, which is far from being unprecedented in the world, cannot be attacked.

This is rightly stressed in the explanation issued by the French Government Tuesday [29 July]. This document will, however, not suffice to allay the fears of those who accuse France of helping Iraq to obtain nuclear weapons. To do so it would have been necessary to reveal technical details which the government refuses to reveal for reasons of "commercial secrecy."

The real reason is probably political: The government cannot really take the risk of annoying this oil-producing country--France's second biggest supplier and to which Framatome is trying to sell a nuclear power station--by suggesting that it has taken exceptional precautions to limit the dangers.

In his last press conference the president of the republic stressed the danger which "the introduction of new weapons into the region which are must more powerful and have a much longer range" would represent for Israel's security. The few kilograms of highly enriched uranium supplied, under strict surveillance, by France will not give Iraq the nuclear weapon in the short term. In this sphere French-Israeli nuclear cooperation, ended by General de Gaulle, was much more effective since it is thanks to a French reactor and French technicians that Israel now possesses nuclear weapons without admitting it.

Nonetheless the Israeli authorities' concern is understandable: Even if France is not indulging in any reprehensible action, it is still giving Iraq and the Arab world a considerable advantage, namely the capacity to train engineers and technicians to a high level in the nuclear sphere.

This is not a new dilemma since it is spelled out in the text of the Nonproliferation Treaty: In ratifying the Nonproliferation Treaty nonnuclear powers promise not to obtain nuclear weapons but, in exchange, have right of access to nuclear technology. This right seems to be increasingly theoretical since the dividing line between civilian applications of the atom and its military applications is so fine. Moreover the main countries exporting nuclear technology, including France, have adopted a code of conduct which rules out the export of specific materials and installations deemed "sensitive," even if their initial use is peaceful.

The only effective means of pressure are clearly political, and that is what is being suggested in Paris when it is stressed that Iraq, to obtain nuclear weapons, would have to announce its repudiation of the Nonproliferation Treaty. However, these means of pressure are fragile: Because of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan the United States has been forced to halt its recriminations against Pakistan which, quite legally (it has not signed the Nonproliferation Treaty) and with at least financial aid from Libya, is pursuing efforts much more disturbing than those of Iraq.

RELATIONS WITH LIBYA REPORTED IMPROVING

NC301936 Paris AFP in English 1900 GMT 30 Jul 80

[By Aly Shoubashy]

[Excerpt] Paris, July 30 (AFP)--Franco-Libyan relations, shaken when demonstrators sacked the French Chancellery and consulate in Benghazi last February, seem to be returning to normal.

It appears that Libya has agreed to repair the embassy building, compensate France for the damage to the chancellery and consulate, and foot the bill for the repatriation of French diplomats after the incident.

French Ambassador Charles Malo returned to Tripoli this week. Authoritative French sources had said he would only go back to Tripoli after the question of indemnities was settled.

So even though certain points of disagreement continue, the crisis seems to have simmered down. In an interview for French television, Libyan chief Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi has described Franco-Libyan relations as "good," although criticising French policy in Africa as "Colonialist." "It is time," he said, "that we sat down with the French" to discuss French and Libyan policies in Africa.

LESSONS OF RELATIONSHIP WITH FORMER SHAH SPELLED OUT

[Editorial: "Embarrassment"]

[Text] Even dead, the former shah of Iran is still a major embarrassment to the majority of Western chancelleries. France is no exception and was represented at the Cairo ceremony merely by French Ambassador to Egypt Jacques Andreani. The explanations given by the Elysee confirm the embarrassment felt in Paris rather than clarify the situation: "The former sovereign," the presidential spokesman said Monday evening, "was influenced, as were his family, by French culture in which he showed a personal interest .... After the war the shah came to learn about defense problems from our forces. He strove to develop relations and trade between the two countries on many occasions."

These references to the past, however cryptic, relate to a relatively recent past when Paris regarded the shah as a perfectly valid and honorable interlocutor. At that time the French leaders refused to heed the warnings issued by a few newspapers--including ours--on the subject of unacceptable human rights violations in Iran. After visits to Tehran they preferred to announce the pending conclusion of wonderful contracts, many of which were never even signed.

Unlike the United States, however, Paris distanced itself when the Iranian regime's future looked extremely precarious. This was a policy of keeping "two irons in the fire," as symbolized by Imam Khomeyni's activities at Neauphle-le-Chateau. There was great satisfaction in France when the shah fell; France had changed course at the right time. However, this satisfaction has now faded somewhat: Our analysts had foreseen the end of the shah's megalomanical dream; however, they failed to see to what extent the Iranian people had been traumatized by this insane and bloody adventure. While they argued in terms of a change in government we are still facing an absence of government. Moreover this does not rule out all kinds of abuses.

It is high time our government started learning from this adventure. Especially since it is not the first of its kind. Would it be too unrealistic to suggest that we take account of the nature of regimes with which we maintain preferential relations, before they actually collapse? That we avoid backing intolerable practices or supporting indefensible regimes? Not only would this satisfy morality but it would be in the national interest too. It is not interfering in a regime's internal affairs to claim to know nothing of its crimes [sentence as published].

This consideration does not apply only to Iran under the former shah. It should not depend on proclaimed ideologies or acquired interests. This was clearly demonstrated in the Central African crisis last year when Paris lost a considerable amount of its authority and honor by continuing for months to deny proven crimes and protect a "client" whom Paris is now only too anxious to silence. This is perhaps the only lesson to be learned from this funeral in Cairo: It is no use keeping well away from the body of a dead man nothing to curb his unreasonable behavior while he was exercising power.

PFC GREETS FIDEL CASTRO ON MONCADA ANNIVERSARY

LD291459 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 25 Jul 80 p 6

[Text] The PCF Central Committee Secretariat has sent the following message to Cuban Communist Party First Secretary Fidel Castro:

Dear Comrade Fidel Castro,

On 26 July, as you celebrate another anniversary of the revolutionary assault on the Moncada barracks, we wish to convey to you the French Communists' solidarity and fraternal feelings.

Since your revolution's triumph socialism in Cuba has made incredible progress for its people and the country's development.

Despite U.S. aggressiveness, and especially the blockade decreed and implemented by U.S. imperialism, and despite all the difficulties, brilliant successes have been achieved in a relatively short period of history. Terrible scourges which are still afflicting millions of men, women and children in the world have been defeated once and for all in Cuba: famine, poverty, unemployment, illiteracy, endemic diseases, infant mortality and sexual discrimination. Cultural development is the corollary to economic and social progress. Cuba is also the example of a country which, having won its independence and showing solidarity with peoples struggling against imperialism, is respected and has prestige in the world. This is demonstrated by its active participation in international bodies, the echo given to its proposals for a new world economic system and the election of its most eminent leader as president of the nonaligned movement.

This gives the French communists and workers deep-rooted reasons for hope and confidence in their own struggles.

It is Cuba's prestige and the victories won, cogently demonstrating the superiority of socialism, which have recently sparked off a new campaign of hostility toward it. The Cuban people have replied to this campaign with dignity and have been able to give the world a massive demonstration of their attachment to their revolution.

As you know, in these circumstances the PCF countered the anti-Cuban attacks which came from all the other French political forces.

As Georges Marchais reaffirmed during his visit to Cuba, you can rest assured, dear Comrade Fidel Castro, that we are behind the Cuban people and their Communist Party in their effort to build socialism, and in their struggles against imperialism's maneuvers.

Please accept, dear Comrade Fidel Castro, our fraternal greetings.

BRAZILIAN COMMUNIST PARTY DELEGATION VISITS PCF

LD300745 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 25 Jul 80 p 6

[Text] A Brazilian Communist Party delegation comprising its Secretary General Giacondo Draz and Central Committee member J. Dos Santos was received at PCF central headquarters by Politburo member Andre Lajoine and foreign policy section member Jean-Claude Negre. Giacondo Draz gave detailed information about the situation in Brazil, especially about the development of Brazilian workers' struggles. Andre Lajoine reaffirmed the PCF's solidarity.

GOVERNMENT CALLS FOR CONFIDENCE VOTE ON JUSTICE ISSUE

AU310902 Rome ANSA in English 0815 GMT 31 Jul 80

[Text] Rome, 31 Jul (ANSA)--The Italian Government faces a confidence vote here later today at the request of head-of-government Francesco Cossiga himself during the Rome Parliament's ongoing debate on the problems facing the administration of justice in the country.

The question of confidence was raised in a motion tabled by the three government parties yesterday afternoon. They are Cossiga's Christian Democrats (DC), the Socialist (PSI), and the Republicans (PRI).

The justice debate was convened after a series of motions and questions tabled by all the political parties in the wake of urgent calls from the magistrates for better and safer working conditions, particularly as regards terrorist threats. The Communists (PCI), in particular, called for the resignation of Justice Minister Tommaso Morlino.

The motion advanced by the government majority rejects the PCI's accusations of Morlino's lack of commitment to his job and calls for an urgent execution of all the stopgap measures now in the works, but to be included in the government's proposed "justice plan". Illustrating the motion, Cossiga said approval of the PCI's motion would involve passing negative judgment, not only on the minister, but on "the whole government" since Morlino was merely applying government policy.

Cossiga also listed a number of government moves in favor of the administration of justice and the magistrates, some of them still facing debate in Parliament. According to Cossiga, the Justice Ministry's budget estimate for 1981 was 1,108 billion lire, 39.41 percent more than last year and 69 percent more than in 1979. "But the fundamental fact is in the qualitative aspects in that it will be possible to intervene rapidly with new methods and mentalities", Cossiga promised.

According to the prime minister, Morlino had started a real process of renovation at his ministry. Cossiga added that the government intends to speed up this process and called on all interested parties to do their bit.

The confidence vote is expected in the afternoon after all the parties have made their final statement.

BERLINGUER RECEIVES VACATIONING BULGARIAN LEADER BOZHINOV

LD301023 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 26 Jul 80 p 16

[Text] Rome--PCI Secretary General Comrade Enrico Berlinguer yesterday received Comrade Todor Bozhinov, BCP Politburo member and first deputy chairman of the Bulgarian Council of Ministers, who has been vacationing in Italy at our party's invitation. During the wide-ranging and cordial conversation, which was attended by Bulgarian Ambassador Venelin Kotsev and by Comrade Antonio Rubbi, PCI Central Committee member and foreign section chief, there was an exchange of information and opinions on the situation in the respective countries and on the principal problems of the present international situation.

CHINESE PARTY YOUTH DELEGATION RECEIVED BY BERLINGUER

[Text] Rome--PCI Secretary General Comrade Enrico Berlinguer received the Chinese communist youth delegation, which is visiting Italy at the Italian Communist Youth Federation's [FGCI] invitation, at PCI Directorate headquarters on Wednesday. The delegation is composed of the following comrades: First Secretary of the Central Committee Secretariat Han Ying, Deputy Secretary of the Shanghai Municipal Committee Fan Hongqi, Deputy Foreign Affairs Chief and Central Committee member Zhou Shanqing and Deputy Director of the Youth Work Bureau (Sheng Guang).

The long and cordial conversation, during which Comrade Berlinguer presented the PCI's stances on the principal international and domestic issues of the moment, was attended by Minister of the PRC Embassy in Rome Yang Qinghua and the following comrades: Central Committee member and Foreign Section Chief Antonio Rubbi, FGCI National Secretary Marco Fumagalli, and Massimo Micucci.

GREEK COMMUNIST LEADER AMBATIELOS TALKS WITH PCI OFFICIALS

LD301015 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 20 Jul 80 p 15

[Text] Rome--KKE [Interior] Politburo member Comrade Antonis Ambatielos met yesterday at PCI Directorate headquarters with Comrades Paolo Bufalini of the PCI foreign section and Rodolfo Mechini, member of the Central Control Commission and deputy chief of the foreign section.

During the cordial conversation there was an exchange of opinions on some aspects of the international situation, with special reference to Europe, the Mediterranean and the Middle East and to all the initiatives for peace, for a resumption of the detente process and for international cooperation. The development of friendly relations between the KKE and the PCI was also discussed.

CYPRIOT FOREIGN MINISTER ROLANDHIS MEETS COLOMBO

AU282047 Rome ANSA in English 1903 GMT 28 Jul 80

[Text] Rome, 28 Jul (ANSA)--Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo met here today with the head of Cypriot diplomacy, Nikolaos Rolandhis, for a survey of international issues and a [wide] ranging examination of the state of Italian-Cypriot relations.

A considerable portion of their talk was taken up with the trend of economic and trade ties between Italy and the island republic, the prospects for developing these relations and issues connected to Cyprus' relations with the European Economic Community.

Addressing himself to the internal situation on Cyprus, Colombo said that Italy has made use of and intends to continue making use of all occasions for bilateral and multilateral dialogue for conducting a positive role alongside the initiatives of the United Nations secretary general aimed at seeking out consensus among the sides involved for renewing inter-community negotiations.

LD301513 Lisbon AVANTE! in Portuguese 24 Jul 80 p 2

[Unattributed report: "MPLA and PLO Delegations Received at PCP Central Committee Headquarters"]

[Text] The Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola-Labor Party [MPLA-Labor Party] delegation attending the AVANTE! festival headed by Luis Filipe Pizargro (Nene), deputy chief of the MPLA-Labor Party Central Committee's Politico-Ideological, Information and Propaganda department, was received at Central Committee headquarters by Sergio Vilarigues, member of the political commission and of the Central Committee Secretariat, and Domingos Lopes of the international section. During the meeting there was an exchange of information on the situation in their respective countries, the activity of their respective parties and also some aspects of international activity.

The Portuguese Communists' solidarity with the struggle of the fraternal Angolan people, headed by the MPLA-Labor Party, to defend their territorial integrity, constantly violated by the criminal military actions of South Africa's racist leaders, was affirmed to the MPLA-Labor Party delegation.

The PCP's determination to continue to work to insure that relations between Portugal and the People's Republic of Angola, which are meeting with grave difficulties as a result of the present government's policy of submission to imperialism, develop in the interest of Portugal and the People's Republic of Angola, the two peoples, peace, friendship and world cooperation, was also reaffirmed.

The MPLA-Labor Party delegation expressed its solidarity with the Portuguese communists' struggle to defend the democratic system which emerged from the April revolution. The MPLA-Labor Party delegation had the opportunity to acquaint itself with various aspects of the Portuguese situation and of the PCP's activity.

This visit, which falls within the context of the fraternal relations existing between the PCP and the MPLA-Labor Party, contributed to better mutual understanding and to additional strengthening of the future ties of friendship, solidarity and cooperation existing between the PCP and the MPLA-Labor Party.

The PLO delegation comprising, (Hani Mendes), Publications, Press and Culture Department chief, chief editor of the PLO organ ATH-THWRAH Muhammad Sulayman and journalist Yasir Muslim, which arrived after the AVANTE! festival as a result of difficulties in finding flights to Lisbon, was also received at PCP Central Committee headquarters by Sergio Vilarigues, member of the political commission and of the Central Committee Secretariat, and Domingos Lopes of the international section.

The two delegations exchanged views on the struggle of their respective peoples and parties and broached aspects of the international situation. During the meeting the PCP's solidarity with the PLO's struggle for the creation of an independent state of Palestine and with the Arab peoples' struggle for the liberation of the territories occupied by Israel, as well as the PLO's solidarity with the Portuguese Communists' struggle to defend the democratic system which emerged from the April revolution were reaffirmed. The PLO delegation visited an agricultural cooperative in the Setubal region.

The PLO delegation's presence at AVANTE!'s invitation contributed to the strengthening of the relations existing between the PCP and the PLO and between their respective central organs.

PRIME MINISTER SUAREZ RETURNS FROM PERU

LD302214 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1000 GMT 30 Jul 80

[Summary] Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez returned to Spain this afternoon at the end of his 5-day official visit to Peru. He went to Lima to attend the assumption of office of President Belaunde Terry. Suarez also attended a meeting of the Andean Pact, during which a resolution was passed condemning the coup in Bolivia. On landing at Barajas Airport, the prime minister was welcomed by Lt Gen Gutierrez Mellado, first deputy prime minister, and the chiefs of staff of the three branches of the armed forces, as well as the ministers of the interior and of transport and communications. The military governor of Madrid was also in the welcoming party.

Communique on Bolivia Coup Signed

LD301112 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 0600 GMT 30 Jul 80

[Text] Prime Minister Suarez is now on his way back to Madrid from Lima after attending the ceremony for the inauguration of President Fernando Belaunde and participating yesterday in the meeting of the Andes Pact countries. Suarez took part in the meeting yesterday morning in Lima of Andean Pact presidents and put his name to the communique issued at the end.

This communique openly condemns the severing of the process of democracy which was about to be consolidate in Bolivia, though the signatories refrain from sanctions against the regime of Gen Luis Garcia Meza. With an impassioned appeal for the restoration of democratic institutions and human rights in Bolivia, the Andean Pact presidents go on to express their solemn belief that respect for human rights is the basic law underlying the domestic policies of the Andean Pact member countries, asserting that such a defense of human rights does not amount to violation of the principle of nonintervention in internal affairs.

This is the communique in broad outline published by the presidents of Colombia, Peru, Venezuela and Ecuador, and to which signatures were added by Prime Minister Suarez, the president of Costa Rica and one of the members of the junta of national reconstruction of Nicaragua.

PLO MEMBER CLAIMS OPENING OF OFFICE IN COPENHAGEN

LD290851 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 23 Jul 80 pt 1 p 1

[Anders Jerichow report: "PLO Bureau in Copenhagen"]

[Text] The PLO has established an office in Copenhagen. Palestinian guest worker Dawud Sati' Bakir has been given official status as "representative in Denmark" by the organization, and Bakir is now one of the members of the PLO observers group at the UN Women's Conference.

Bakir has lived in Copenhagen for several years and is the publisher responsible for the journal PALESTINA-NYT [Palestine News] and leader of the "Palestinian Workers Union" on Farvergade in Copenhagen. This is now also the PLO's address.

Sati' Bakir told BERLINGSKE TIDENDE that he was appointed without much publicity 2 months ago and that he is now working "full time" for the PLO, with a view in particular toward achieving Danish recognition of the PLO--"even though the Foreign Ministry is not very keen on the idea."

In the future Sati' Bakir will represent the PLO in dealings with the general public and in contacts with the authorities. He will also maintain the PLO's contacts with the 300-400 Palestinian guest workers in Denmark. Both the office in Farvergade and his own salary are funded by the PLO.

As well as Bakir three other PLO representatives in Europe are members of the PLO group at the women's conference: Dawud Kaluti from Stockholm, Shawq Armali from Geneva and Na'im Khadir from Brussels.

Representatives Disagree

LD291423 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 24 Jul 80 pt 1 p 2

[Anders Jerichow report: "Internal PLO Dissension Over Danish Representative"]

[Text] The PLO delegation at the UN Women's Conference yesterday denied Palestinian Sati' Bakir's announcement that the PLO has appointed him as its representative in Denmark.

Greatly differing explanations from Bakir and other members of the PLO group showed disagreement on who is the PLO representative in Denmark now, and when the PLO will "officially" set a bureau in Copenhagen.

The organization has set aside funds for establishing bureaus both in Oslo and Copenhagen, but up to now action has been postponed because neither country recognizes the PLO.

Both the Danish and the Norwegian foreign ministries indicated yesterday that there were no objections to the PLO's establishing bureaus, but this has, according to a statement by Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen, "nothing to do do with official recognition of the PLO."

Bakir himself said yesterday that he is not now, but will become, PLO representative within a couple of months. At the moment he is only the leader of the PLO's trade union organization--PWU--Copenhagen section.

Another member of the PLO group at the women's conference Shawqi Armali, who is permanent PLO representative in Geneva, said that no decision at all has been made whether Bakir will be the representative, but that "the PLO wants a bureau in Copenhagen, on condition that Denmark recognizes the PLO." Armali also added that the organization's representative in Sweden, Dawud Kaluti, does not cover Denmark.

This is denied by a third member of the PLO group at the women's conference, Mr Na'im Khadir, who told BERLINGSKE TIDENDE: "Our representative in Denmark is Dawud Kaluti."

At the same time it is reported that Kaluti is deeply dissatisfied with the announcement of the appointment of Bakir, who is a member of the PLO rejection front, the PFLP [Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine]. Like the majority of other PLO representatives in Europe, Kaluti is a member of Fatah, Yasir 'Arafat's own group.

CULTURE MINISTER TO HEAD DELEGATION TO PRC IN FALL

LD300903 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 26 Jul 80 pt 1 p2

[Sol report: "Lise Oestergaard Travels to China"]

[Excerpt] Culture Minister Lise Oestergaard will travel to China for an official visit in September. In doing so Lise Oestergaard will manage to do what her predecessor Niels Matthiasen did not: lead a handpicked Danish delegation to China.

The official Chinese invitation was sent to Culture Minister Niels Matthiasen, but because of the minister's illness the trip planned for January was postponed. Now China, through its ambassador in Denmark, has renewed the invitation to Culture Minister Lise Oestergaard.

The visit will take place during the first half of September, but not before the Social Democratic Party congress from 4-7 September is out of the way. It has not yet been decided who will make up the delegation accompanying the culture minister.

COMMUNIST WORKERS PARTY SUFFERING MONETARY PROBLEMS

LD281133 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 22 Jul 80 pt 1 p 2

["Sol" report: "Communist Workers Party Short of Money"]

[Text] The Danish Communist Workers Party (KAP) is in grave economic difficulties and the party has therefore extended its campaign aimed at raising 500,000 kroner for the party. The campaign was originally intended to end this summer but has been extended into the new year. At present 300,000 kroner have been collected.

The party is also busy collecting signatures so that the KAP can run in the next Folketing election. The party received nomination approval for the election last October but won no Folketing seats. Because of this, signatures have to be collected every year. Last year around 20,400 signatures were collected. The required number for election approval is just over 18,000.

The KAP's economic problems mean that a number of party activities will have to be cut back. The KAP newspaper ARBEJDERAVISEN [WORKERS PAPER] will appear only three times monthly after the summer vacation and will be smaller. The paper is currently published every week, but the KAP is even considering making the paper a monthly. Dismissals at the party's publishing house and bookstores have also been discussed.

The latest issue of ARBEJDERAVISEN published the KAP's 1979 accounts. The party had a deficit of 520,000 kroner on an income of 1.5 million kroner against expenditures over 2 million kroner.

NORWEGIAN, NETHERLANDS FOREIGN MINISTERS CONFER ON S. AFRICA

LD301415 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 24 Jul 80 p 23

[NORSK TELEGRAMBYRAA report: "Dutch Foreign Minister in Oslo"]

[Text] Dutch Foreign Minister Christoph van der Klaauw visited Oslo on Wednesday for talks with Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund on international questions, including South Africa.

The meeting had the character of a briefing and came about after a Dutch initiative, Foreign Ministry Press Spokesman Geir Grung told NORSK TELEGRAMBYRAA.

Van der Klaauw gave Frydenlund a letter concerning South Africa, and this letter has also been sent to the Danish and Swedish foreign ministers. The contents of the letter have been made known to the authorities in Finland and Iceland through diplomatic channels.

The Netherlands wanted this briefing on South Africa before the Scandinavian foreign ministers' meeting in Oslo at the beginning of September. Van der Klaauw will have the chance to meet his Scandinavian counterparts again at the end of September during the fall session of the UN General Assembly in New York.

SWEDEN

GRAIN EXPORTS TO SOVIET UNION RESUME

LD301149 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 25 Jul 80 p 11

[Nina Ersman report: "Grain to the Soviet Union Worth 500 Million Kroner"]

[Text] At least one-fifth of this year's Swedish grain exports will go to the Soviet Union. This means that Sweden has now resumed exports which had dried up completely. This is a direct consequence of the U.S. grain embargo against the Soviet Union.

Figures from the Swedish Grain Trade Association, which acts as an intermediary in all Swedish grain exports, show that this year's export volume to the Soviet Union is at least 10 times greater than in 1977, the last year in which grain was exported to the Soviet Union. The Soviet Union then bought around 20,000 tons of Swedish grain via foreign trading houses. Of the 1979 grain harvest up to 300,000 tons is expected to find its way to the Soviet Union via trading agents. The 1980 volume looks as if it will be just as large.

Jan Svanstroem, section head at the Swedish Grain Trade Association, did not want too much credence to be attached to the figures.

"Half of all Swedish grain exports go through trading houses. This means that we only learn the final destination when the grain is transported directly to the consumer country. In some cases exports go through ports in other countries, to be redirected at a later stage, which we know nothing about."

There has been no direct trade in grain between Sweden and the Soviet Union since 1973. In that year Sweden exported around 200,000 tons to the Soviet Union, mostly fodder grain.

Since then and up to the time of the U.S. grain embargo Sweden's modest grain surplus has been of no interest to the giant consumer to the East. The resumption of exports to the Soviet Union does not, however, mean any changes for Sweden, Jan Svanstroem said.

"We are selling to the same market as before, that is, largely to trading houses. It is only the destination that is new."

At the same time he admits that sellers on the European agricultural market now have more favorable conditions as a result of the U.S. embargo against the Soviet Union. The demand for grain has grown and prices are tending to rise. At the same time the United States has had to sell off the surplus that should have gone to the Soviet Union. On paper, 17 million tons of American grain are "surplus."

"In reality it is a much smaller figure, closer to something between 5 and 10 million tons," Jan Svanstroem thinks. The rest has reached the Soviet Union through third parties.

"An export embargo like this one is never effective. For one thing it is possible to find loopholes. And for another it creates "circulation" in the system. In this case, for example, Brazil bought some of the U.S. surplus instead of buying from Argentina, as it has done in the past. So Argentina had a surplus that was sold to the Soviet Union."

Compared with the enormous quantities involved in trade between the United States and the Soviet Union, the volume of Swedish exports is a drop in the ocean, even though they have increased many times over.

The value of the Swedish exports totals about 500,000 kronor.

TRIAL OF ALLEGED PFLP AGENTS BEGINS

LD231630 Stockholm Domestic Service in Swedish 1600 GMT 23 Jul 80

[Text] The trial of three people charged with illegal intelligence activity and the attempted smuggling of weapons, among other things, opened in Uppsala today. They all denied their involvement in illegal intelligence activities.

According to the provincial prosecutor, Axel Morath, the three, one man and two women, gathered information in Israel and passed it to the Palestinian organization, PFLP [Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine]. The women admitted that they had taken photographs in Israel, and the man admitted that he had shown some of the pictures to a respresentative of the PFLP.

The man and one of the women are also charged with smuggling weapons. They were detained by the customs in Helsingborg when they tried to bring in a submachine gun, ammunition and two hand grenades. Both admit partial involvement in the weapons smuggling.

WALDHEIM'S NEW FORMULA FOR TALKS ACCEPTED BY TURKISH SIDE

NC300635 Nicosia I SIMERINI in Greek 30 Jul 80 p 1

[Text] According to information from diplomatic sources, UN Secretary General Waldheim's new initiative to resume the intercommunal talks has already been manifested and the Cyprus Government's reply is now awaited.

We have been informed that Mr Waldheim has submitted through Gobbi, his representative on Cyprus, a new formula to resume the intercommunal talks.

In his new formula, Waldheim proposes that before the talks begin he will simply mention that the new republic's constitution would be federal and that the term bizonal would be used only in connection with the territorial issue.

According to our information, Waldheim's new proposal has been submitted to both sides and the Turkish side has already accepted it.

According to the same information, the Greek side was supposed to have decided by yesterday as to whether it would accept the new Waldheim proposal. However, its position has not yet become known.

If Waldheim's formula is finally accepted, then it is possible for the intercommunal talks to be resumed in September when Mr Waldheim's under secretary general is expected to visit Cyprus again.

Government Statement

NC310721 Nicosia I SIMERINI in Greek 31 Jul 80 p 1

[Text] In answer to questions by political editors yesterday on information that the UN secretary general has submitted a new formula on the Cyprus issue, which the Turks have accepted, and that our reply is being awaited, the government spokesman, without denying the information, made the following statement: "The exchange of views on the talks issue with the UN secretary general's special representative in Cyprus continues and there is nothing else to be said beyond what has already been announced."

Asked if UN Special Representative Gobbi intends to make any fresh contacts, the government spokesman replied that he is not aware of any.

On Libya's mediation for a Kiprianou-Denktas meeting, the government spokesman said that so far there has been no progress. In this connection, the spokesman pointed out the latest Denktas statements that the Greek Cypriot side must repudiate the return of the refugees and accept bizonality. He said: "These conditions are unacceptable and against the UN resolutions."

DENKTAS' LETTER TO WALDHEIM QUESTIONS KIPRIANOU'S INTENTIONS

TA291209 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 29 Jul 80

[Text] President Denktas has sent a letter to the UN secretary general, Mr Waldheim, repeating his appeal to Mr Waldheim to ascertain from the Greek Cypriot leader, Mr Kiprianou, whether he seriously wants a dialogue on the basis of the bizonal federation. It contents were made public after a copy of the letter was handed by the minister of foreign affairs and defense, Mr Atakol, to the UN special representative in Cyprus, Mr Gobbi, when he called on the minister this morning.

In his letter, Mr Denktas said that recent public statements by Mr Kiprianou were giving cause for concern and were casting considerable doubt on whether Mr Kiprianou was in fact seriously seeking a bicommunal and bizonal federal solution. The president said that despite the 4-guidelines agreement and the 10-point agreement and despite the exchange of population agreement reached at the third round of the Vienna talks, Mr Kiprianou still insisted on a biregional solution, which envisages not a federation but merely giving local regional powers to the Turkish Cypriots within a unitary state and still spoke about the return of all refugees to their homes.

Mr Denktas stressed that from time to time he felt obliged to draw attention to this erroneous policy followed by Mr Kiprianou and to its dangerous consequences. The president said he had recently proposed that Mr Waldheim should take up with Mr Kiprianou his recent statements and ask him whether he seriously wanted a dialogue, whether he consented to a partnership federation and whether he would revive questions that had already been resolved such as the exchange of population agreement. The president said he had also pointed out that if what Mr Kiprianou said in his latest speeches constituted his real policy, it would be futile to discuss the Cyprus problem with him.

Disclosures about Mr Kiprianou's real aims, which were made public in London recently by Mr Konstandinos, one of the AKEL leaders, have considerably added to our doubts and confirmed our misgivings, Mr Denktas said, and he added: If the policy followed by Mr Kiprianou is that which he has confessed to an AKEL party deputation and has confirmed by his recent speeches, then I would repeat here my public appeal to you to ascertain from Mr Kiprianou whether he seriously wants a dialogue on the basis of a bizonal federation in accordance with the guidelines agreement.

In conclusion, President Denktas said that Mr Kiprianou, by his insistance on a biregional as distinct from a bizonal federal solution, was clearly wishing to put the clock back to the pre-coup 1963-74 period. Details of the gross violations of the human rights and fundamental freedoms of Turkish Cypriots by the Greek Cypriot leaders during this period were only too well known by Mr Waldheim and were recorded in detail in reports to the Security Council by Mr Waldheim and his predecessors.

FINANCE MINISTER, BULGARIAN ENVOY SIGN TAXATION AGREEMENT

NC251830 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1630 GMT 25 Jul 80

[Text] A Cyprus-Bulgaria agreement to prevent double taxation was signed at the Foreign Ministry today. The agreement was signed on behalf of Cyprus by Finance Minister Avxendiou and on behalf of the People's Republic of Bulgaria by its ambassador in Cyprus, Mr Bangiev.

Speaking after the signing of the agreement, Mr Avxendiou described the agreement as one of the most important to be signed between Cyprus and Bulgaria. He expressed the conviction that this agreement will contribute in the further development of bilateral economic relations. He also expressed the gratitude of the Cypriot people to the People's Republic of Bulgaria for the support it has given and is giving to Cyprus in all sectors, particularly in the political sector.

In reply, Mr Bangiev stressed that he is convinced that today's agreement will contribute to the further development of bilateral economic relations to the benefit of both countries. He then stressed that Bulgaria's position on the Cyprus problem is consistent and firm. He said: We support and we will continue to support a just solution to the Cyprus problem within the UN framework that would secure the unity, independence, nonalignment and demilitarization of the Cyprus Republic, where all its citizens will be able to live in peace and cooperation.

ECEVIT CLAIMS MILITARY LEADERS MADE 'PROPOSALS IN WRITING'

TA301538 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1515 GMT 30 Jul

[Text] [Passage indistinct] Contrary to some second-hand reports in the press, he had not made any statement that might imply that the commanders of the armed forces had handed a letter of warning to the president or the government.

Ecevit confirmed he had said the commanders had made "(?certain) proposals in writing" to the most recent session of the National Security Council but that he, Ecevit, was not informed about the contents of the proposals. He was making the clarification so as to forestall misinterpretations on purpose, Ecevit said. Ecevit could not see why certain circles were so "disturbed" about his statement Tuesday that the RPP should try to overcome obstacles on the way to an election victory in order to preserve democracy "[word indistinct] risk of death."

OZAL CITES OECD LOAN AGREEMENT AS 'ONE OF THE BEST'

TA302042 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 30 Jul 80

[Text] Turgut Ozal, Prime Ministry under secretary and State Planning Organization deputy undersecretary who returned to Ankara this evening after having concluded his contacts on foreign financial resources in Paris, Rome and London, has said that the recent loan rescheduling agreement signed with OECD member countries was one of the best signed so far on the issue. In statements at Yesilkoy and Esenboga Airports, Ozal said that the foreign states and international establishments section of the economic program started by the government on 25 January has been concluded with the signing of the agreement in question. Ozal added that his contacts in London with the administrators of nine international banks had been positive and that these banks had promised to contribute to solving Turkey's loan problems.

BRIEFS

FOREIGN MINISTRY APPOINTMENT--Ambassador Ilter Turkmen has been appointed Foreign Ministry secretary general. The decree on the appointment was published in the official gazette today. IRAQ RETALIATES FOR DIPLOMATS' EXPULSION IN BOMB INCIDENT

AU011128 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1000 GMT 1 Aug 80

[Barbara Coudenhove-Kalergi report]

[Text] The Iraqis have reacted very promptly and in their turn have expelled an Autrian diplomat, Embassy Secretary Dr Josef Litschauer. Dr Litschauer has already left Iraq. It is being pointed out at the Foreign Ministry in this context that the measure had been expected. But it is difficult to understand here in Vienna because Dr Litschauer was an official who acted correctly, whereas the two Iraqi diplomats expelled from Austria were incontestably involved in terrorist activities.

Diplomat's Comments

AU011120 [Editorial report] Vienna Domestic Service in German at 0500 GMT on 1 August carries a recorded Ilse Voegl interview with Ambassador Dr Alois Reitbauer, secretary general of the Austrian Foreign Ministry, on the 30 July bombing attempt in Vienna's Third District. Reitbauer replied to a question about the reason for expelling two Iraqi diplomats: "We have received absolutely reliable reports, evidence from the police. It only was after very careful examination and consideration that we decided to take this very serious measure." Asked whether the incident would affect Austria's relations with Iraq, Reitbauer answered: "It certainly is not a very pleasant circumstance to note, considering the very good and friendly relations between Austria and Iraq, that activity--let us put it this way--terrorist activity is being pursued by Iraqi diplomats here." Referring to newspaper reports describing the person who carried the bomb as a double agent, Reitbauer pointed out: "I cannot tell you anything precise about that because the problem of agents or double agents does not come within the scope of activities of the Foreign Ministry." He continued: "It is correct, however, that the gentleman concerned, an Iraqi citizen, was photographed entering the embassy secretary's automobile". Reitbauer concludes the interview by expounding on the chances of Austrian citizens' damages caused by the bombing attempt.

JORDAN'S KING HUSAYN ARRIVES IN VIENNA, MEETS KREISKY

JN312018 Amman Domestic Service in Arabic 1900 GMT 31 Jul 80

[Text] His Majesty King Husayn and Her Majesty Queen Nur arrived in Vienna this evening as part of his majesty's tour of several European countries. His Majesty King Husayn will meet later tonight with Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky. The discussion between the two leaders will focus on the developments of the situation in the Middle East, Europe's role in finding a settlement to the Arab-Israeli conflict and bilateral relations.

Meeting With Chancellor

JN010635 Amman Domestic Service in Arabic 0600 GMT 1 Aug 80

[Text] His Majesty King Husayn will meet today with the Austrian president, within the framework of his majesty's meetings with top Austrian officials.

His Majesty King Husayn and Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky held a 90-minute meeting in Vienna last night. During the meeting, the two leaders exchanged viewpoints on the situation in the Middle East and the role to be played by Europe in finding a lasting peaceful settlement in the region. His Majesty King Husayn and Her Majesty Queen Nur arrived in Vienna last night on their visit to Austria, as the third leg of his majesty's European tour. The purpose of this tour is to gain European and world support and backing for the legitimate Arab rights.

GENSCHER CALLS FOR CSCE TO DISCUSS HUMAN RIGHTS, AFGHANISTAN

LD311506 Hamburg DPA in German 1334 GMT 31 Jul 80

[Excerpts] Bonn--It is the Federal Government's wish that the subjects of human rights and Afghanistan not be ignored at the second CSCE followup conference in Madrid this November. Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher said today on the fifth anniversary of the signing of the Final Acts of the Helsinki CSCE that "he who acknowledged international yardsticks by his signature under the Final Acts must face the international debate on their adherence." Genscher further announced in his statement on the Madrid meeting that the Federal Government will insist that all three "baskets" of the CSCE Final Acts--the principles and military confidence-building measures, economic cooperation and cooperation in the humanitarian sphere--"will be equally taken into account." The concern will be for a businesslike debate on all existing problems; "fruitless polemics do not interest us."

JORDAN'S KING HUSAYN LEAVES BONN FOR VIENNA

JN311643 Amman Domestic Service in Arabic 1600 GMT 31 Jul 80

[Text] Their Majesties King Husayn and Queen Nur left Bonn for Vienna this afternoon on the third leg of his majesty's European tour.

While in Vienna his majesty will hold talks with Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky on the developments in the Middle East situation and relations between the two countries.

Earlier today His Majesty King Husayn met with FRG President Karl Carstens at the presidential palace in Bonn. The two leaders reviewed Jordanian-FRG relations, the prospects of developing joint cooperation and Arab-European relations based on the Arab-European dialogue. The two leaders exchanged views on Arab and international issues, particularly the Palestinian cause and its effect on the Arab and international arenas.

Mr and Mrs Carstens held a reception in honor of Their Majesties King Husayn and Queen Nur.

The meeting and the reception were attended by Ahmad al-Lawzi, chief of the royal court; 'Amir Khammash, minister of court; the chief chamberlain; Hasan Ibrahim, minister of state and acting foreign minister; and the Jordanian ambassador in Bonn.

FRG, TURKEY SIGN FURTHER ECONOMIC AID AGREEMENT

LD311300 Hamburg DPA in German 1219 GMT 31 Jul 80

[Excerpts] Bonn, July 39 (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and Turkish Ambassador in Bonn Vahit Halefoglu today signed another financial agreement. This agreement grants German aid of DM130 million and credit for goods to the value of DM330 million. The Federal Republic is granting these credits to Turkey within the framework of the OECD special aid action, which has been prpared under the guidance of the Federal Republic. The Federal Republic has promised Turkey total credits of DM560 million within the aid action.

According to the Bonn Foreign Ministry this latest agreement is part of the Federal Government's efforts to help Turkey stabilize its economy. It is also an expression of the friendly solidarity between both countries, in which the Federal Republic and Turkey have for a long time been linked as members of the Atlantic alliance.

GOVERNMENT 'DEPLORES' ANNEXATION OF JERUSALEM

LD311212 Paris Domestic Service in French 1200 GMT 31 Jul 80

[Text] As you were told in the 1300 bulletin, Jerusalem has, in a way, been annexed by Israeli. In diplomatic language Jerusalem is being reffered to as the reunited capital of the State of Israel. Well the French Government has just taken a stand on this decision by the Knesset. Not only do French leaders deplore this decision, but they consider it contrary to international law and UN resolutions. This, of course, could compromise the efforts being made by the government for a just and global peace in the Middle East.

BOURGES ANSWERS DEBRE ON DETERRENT, CITES SX MOBILE PROJECT

LD011221 Paris LE MONDE in French 1 Aug 80 p 6

[Text] In a lengthy statement published in Paris on Wednesday, 20 July Defense Minister Yvon Bourges has replied to Mr Michel Debre who, in his letter to RPR deputies confirming his candidacy for the 1981 presidential election, called French nuclear deterrent policy into question. Maintaining that the "strategic nuclear response force has scarcely been developed," General de Gaulle's former prime minister concluded by asking: "Is the intention to quietly change deterrence by replacing it with the debatable forward battle tactic?" The defense minister replies in particular: "The formation of a strategic nuclear force--embodying nuclear deterrence on which national independence is founded--which was started in 1959 has been continued with remarkable continuity for the past 20 years--a fact of which I would have thought Mr Debre to be particularly aware."

Referring to information which he states has "long been known," Mr Bourges gives a series of financial estimates considered to represent France's effort in the nuclear sphere in the past 20 years. From 1959 through 1969 FR 36.1 billion was spent on research, experiments, industrial investments, military infrastructures and the manufacture of nuclear weapons. Between 1970 and 1974 the corresponding amount spent was Fr21.3 billion and from 1975 through 1980 Fr42.1 billion. "Although the purchasing power of the credits in these three periods, which are moreover unequal, is clearly not identical," Bourges points out, "it can be noted that the 100 percent increase in investment in the strategic nuclear forces in 1975-1980 compared with 1969-1974 represents a 18 percent increase in this purchasing power over an equivalent period. Above all it can be seen that 1975 efforts have been concentrated on research (the cost of experiments has been stabilized since underground tests were adopted in 1974), in other words on preparations for the future, which clearly does not indicate a policy of abandonment."

Mobile Missile

The defense minister concludes: "Why doubt this now when an overwhelming majority--including Mr Debre--appreciated it by adopting the June 1976 programming law? Could Mr Debre hope for any better than to see the attainment of the objective which, as defense minister in 1973, he deemed desirable and which has been attained within the period he proposed?" In saying this Mr Bourges is making a veiled reference in his declaration to the argument he frequently puts forward in private or even in the corridors of the National Assembly, when he accuses his RPR colleague Mr Debre, who was Georges Pompidou's defense minister from June 1969 through March 1973, of not having given--at the time he was responsible for the defense budget--the nuclear force the full financial priority which its development required.

In his 30 July declaration Bourges also confirmes that the Defense Council meeting in June decided on "the principle of a new mobile surface-to-surface component" for the nuclear force, studies on which are to be submitted for the government authorities' final apprial in 1982. During his press conference on 26 June the president of the republic had merely indicated that "preparatory work on a mobile strategic missile" has been started, without giving any further details. This is the first time that it has been officially stated that this mobile strategic missile will be a mobile surface-to-surface missile, probably mounted on a wheeled truck as planned in one of the projects submitted by the National Industrial Aeronautics Company--a project designated SX, studies on which began in 1977.

LE MONDE VIEWS YEARS SINCE HELSINKI CSCE, UPCOMING MADRID SESSION

LD011051 Paris LE MONDE in French 1 Aug 80 p 1

[Editorial: "Helsinki, 5 Years On"]

[Text] When the Helsinki Final Act was signed on 1 August 1975 by 35 heads of state or government representing all the European countries--aside from Albania--and the United States and Canada, nobody expected that the CSCE, being concluded after years of negotiations, was going to change the world. That skepticism was fully justitied: 5 years later the "de "detente" so highly acclaimed at the time is only a memory. Nonetheless the anniversary do does nog go unnoticed. In the East it is another opportunity to sing the usual hymns to the Soviet "peace policy," to the "realists'" struggle against the "warmongers" who disregard the "new correlation of forces." Mr Brezhnev asserts that the road to Helsinki does not include any "return ticket," while his propagandists highlight at least one of the positive results obtained in 5 years: The USSR's trade with the 34 other Final Act signatories has doubled compared with the previous 5-year period and, in particular, trade with France has trebled. Furthermore the USSR will not fail to denounce the economic sanctions taken against it by Mr Carter as an additional violation of the Helsinki agreements.

On the U.S. side the tone is equally, if not more, combative, and the Americans paint a particularly harsh picture of Soviet behavior in the human rights sphere--the famous "third basket" which so many diplomats had studied before Helsinki. According to a recent report by a panel formed by the U.S. Executive and Congress, 112 human rights militants were arrested in the USSR in 1979 as against 68 in 1975; as Mr Carter pointed out in a speech the mere fact of having wished to form groups to monitor these agreements has led 40 Soviet citizens to prison, camps or into exile. In addition to that there is the invasion of Afghanistan, which, although it occurred outside the European "theater," violated 5 of the 10 principles which according to the Final Act should govern relations among states. Does this mean that Washington intends to turn the Madrid conference--which will be attended by the same signatories and starts 11 November--into a "tribunal"? We are not far from this point. Mr Carter is of course saying that his delegation will not seek polemics. However, he has announced that the USSR will have to "report" on the way in which it has kept its pledges and that the explanation will be "frank and direct." The U.S. President is finally justifying, notably in response to Mr Reagan, his decision to go to Madrid after having boycotted the Moscow games. For the Americans the aim is not to take part in an "aggressor's propaganda festival" but to hold up to an assembled Europe "the manifesto of the oppressed" which, according to Mr Muskie, the Helsinki Final Act has become.

Although deeply concerned in this debate, the Europeans are the most discreet. The Socialist International has published a statement signed by Willy Brandt which disregards events in Afghanistan and sees the Helsinki mechanism as "a unique structure for maintaining peace at regional level," thus, paradoxically, justifying the Soviet theory on the "divisible" nature of detente. The French Government has said nothing but it is known to be preparing a proposal for Madrid aimed at convening a conference on disarmament in Europe. All participants seem agreed on discussing this proposal on the understanding, the U.S. secretary of state has just said, that this debate "will not distract attention from human rights."

GOVERNMENT WINS VOTE OF CONFIDENCE ON JUSTICE ISSUE, MORLINO

AU312010 Rome ANSA in English 1955 GMT 31 Jul 80

[Text] Rome, 31 Jul (ANSA)--The Italian Government today won a confidence vote in the Chamber of Deputies with 325 votes in favor, and 270 against. The number of deputies present was 595 and 298 constituted a quorum.

Those parties voting in favor of the government led by Francesco Cossiga were: Christian Democrats (DC), Socialists (PSI), Republicans (PRI) and the South Tyrol "SVP" party. [Those opposed were the Communists, Left Wing Independents, the Proletarian Unity Party, Social Democrats, Liberals, Radicals and the Italian Social Movement Party]

The question of confidence was raised in a motion tabled by the three government parties yesterday afternoon (the DC, PSI and PRI). Cossiga himself requested the vote during the Rome Parliament's ongoing debate on the problems facing the administration of justice in the country.

The Communists (PCI) had called for the resignation of Justice Minister Tommaso Morlino. Cossiga said that any negative judgement of Morlino would be a judgement against the whole government since the minister was merely applying government policy.

Thus the vote of confidence was seen by Cossiga as a chance for the government partners to show their solidarity with Morlino and thereby head off calls for his resignation.

CAPUCCI 'MAY TAKE UP QUESTION' OF HOSTAGES ON TEHRAN VISIT

AU311528 Rome ANSA in English 1522 GMT 31 Jul 80

[Text] Vatican City, 31 Jul (ANSA)--Melchite Archbishop Hilarion Capucci left for Tehran today with a message for Iranian authorities from Pope John Paul II in a fresh bid to keep the Catholic schools in the country open. "I am optimistic because I have confidence in the goodwill of the people I am going to meet in Tehran", the msrg. told ANSA. The archbishop explained that the sole purpose for his trip to Iran is to seek out a solution for the problem of the Catholic schools, now under the threat of closure by Iranian revolutionaries.

Msrg. Capucci added that if his mission is a success, summed up in words "give unto cesar that which is cesar's and to God that which is God's", then he might take up the question of the 52 remaining American hostages, held in Iran since last November 4.

Speaking about the upcoming phase of his mission, Msrg. Capucci said, "I have confidence in everyone's goodwill because I know that the defense of the revolution and the dignity of Islam is close to the hearts of the Iranian authorities.

"These two things could be compromised by initiatives and attitudes which disfigure both the revolution and Islam and foster a defamatory campaign contribution to the isolation of Iran from the rest of the world," the church authority added.

The Melchite Archbishop was in Iran earlier this month in an attempt to defuse charges against the society of St. Francis of Sales, the Salesians, that its members collaborated with the disbanded secret police of the late shah.

VITOR ALVES COMMENTS ON POLITICAL EXPRESSION, MILITARY ROLE

LD311554 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1230 GMT 31 Jul 80

[Excerpts] Recent statements by Gen Pedro Cardoso, the army chief of staff, criticizing the Council of the Revolution and the rejoinders issued by his fellow council members, Gen Franco Charais and Major Vasco Lourenco, were the subject of discussion at a council meeting yesterday which continued into the early hours of this morning. Because of their nature, these public statements, particularly Maj Vasco Lourenco's interview with PORTUGAL HOJE, published yesterday, have had wide repercussions in political and military circles.

Answering journalists on his way into yesterday's meeting, Council of the Revolution spokesman Lt Col Vitor Alves upheld the principle that it is in order for individual council members to take whatever political stand they choose as long as by so doing they do not compromise the council, which is considered to be a sovereign body.

On the remarks by Gen Pedro Cardoso, seen by observers as an unprecedented attack on the Council of the Revolution by an officer and its ex officio member, Lt Col Vitor Alves said that the officer had already raised the issues within the council, on a number of occasions, as he was entitled to do.

Meanwhile the Council of the Revolution takes the view that officers, regardless of their ranks or duties are obliged to abstain from influencing any electoral choice. In a statement issued at the end of an all-night session, the Council of the Revolution draws attention to the political constitution in accordance with which the armed forces are forbidden to take up arms (?in their possession by virtue of their duties) in order to impose, influence or prevent the choice of a given political democratic path.

The Council of the Revolution goes on to remind that members of the armed forces on the active and reserve list who are not members of an organ of sovereignty, or who are not covered by the electoral laws in force, cannot express their political choice other than through the secret ballot.

The council takes the view that no restriction is conceivable on the free choice and voting right of servicemen who are equal citizens of the country and that no one can encroach on their convictions. The servicemen's rights as citizens are not affected by their military status, the Council of the Revolution stresses.

DEFENSE MINISTER RETURNS FROM UK VISIT, MEETINGS WITH PYM

LD311632 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1130 GMT 31 Jul 80

[Text] Spanish Defense Minister Agustin Rodriguez Sahagun returned to Madrid today after a 5-day official visit to the United Kingdom. He flew aboard a Spanish Air Force aircraft. While in Britain Mr Sahagun had talks with his British counterpart, Mr Francis Pym, and Deputy Foreign Secretary Sir Ian Gilmour. Mr Sahagun visited air force installations and the Royal Military Academy as well as various plants of the British Aerospace organization and witnessed demonstrations of the latest types of aircraft. Mr Sahagun has extended an invitation to Mr Francis Pym to visit Spain, probably during the fall.

Comments on Cooperation

LD312132 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1830 GMT 31 Jul 80

[Excerpts] Defense Minister Agustin Rodriguez Sahagun has returned to Madrid from the United Kingdom. On his arrival at Madrid's Barajas Airport, Rodriguez Sahagun told journalists that his visit did not have any special significance apart from the fact that it was the first occasion on which a Spanish defense minister had officially visited Britain. But in an exclusive interview for Spanish National Radio, he made this statement:

[Begin recording] The trip was extremely interesting because we had long talks on the various points of cooperation that are possible between our two countries, specifically in the area of the armaments industry, and we were able to confirm that there is a wide range of possibilities for collaboration. I hope that in the next few months we will be able to put this into effect by means of contacts between Spanish and UK companies. We were able to visit some UK installations in this field, manufacturing [word indistinct] missiles which could be of great interest to us. We also had the opportunity to see the manufacture of various types of helicopters, some of which could be of interest, and the Sea Harrier, the British Navy's new plane, which is the new version of the Harrier that we have in Spain. I think that there are also many possibilities for training and collaboration between the armed forces. I am, frankly speaking, satisfied. [end recording]

Rodriguez Sahagun said that his department thinks that Spain should take part in military plans jointly developed with other European countries.

POLITICAL PARTIES DEADLOCKED ON DEFENSE BUDGET

LD311135 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 27 Jul 80 pp 1, 26

[Solveig Roedsgaard report: "Broad Defense Agreement Abandoned"]

[Excerpts] The political situation surrounding negotiations for a defense policy agreement is now so deadlocked that the traditional broad agreement on defense policy must now be considered to be out of the question. Therefore the Social Democrats alone will presumably put forward a proposal for the continuation of the Danish defence policy with an unchanged budget, which is in direct conflict with NATO's wishes and creates a tense parliamentary situation for the government. It will be the first time since the war that there has not been a broadly based defense agreement.

The defense negotiations between the Social Democrats, the Liberals, the Conservatives, the Center Democrats and the Christian People's Party on a new defense agreement to replace the old one, which expires on 1 April 1981, will be resumed during September. But Defense Minister Poul Soegaard told BERLINGKSE TIDENDE that the Social Democratic discussion document will mean a zero-growth solution to the defense budget problem. This is rejected by the other parties involved in the agreement, which demand a 3-percent growth in the defense budget.

But where there was hope in the spring that the Social Democrats were flexible on defense, this hope has now disappeared for the other partners in the agreement. According to information received by BERLINGSKE TIDENDE from prominent members of the Social Democratic Folketing group, the Social Democrats will not accept an increase in defense spending at the same time as budget cuts are having to be made in other areas. If there is any chance at all of a change in the Social Democrat zero-growth proposal, it would only be an extremely modest increase, and in any event nothing approaching a 3-percent rise.

The leftwing in the Social Democratic Folketing group is so insistent that no extra money should be granted to the defense forces that Social Democratic leaders do not want to risk a split in the Folketing group over the defense question.

So if the Liberals, Conservatives, Center Democrats and Christian People's party stick to their demand for a 3-percent minimum increase--and they do--the government prefers to make a proposal on defense spending alone. It is also worth pointing out here that the Social Democrats are not interested in entering a defense agreement only with the Radical Liberals and that the government is not willing to enter into negotiations for an agreement with the single-tax party, the Socialist People's Party, the Left Socialists of the Progress Party.

The four parties normally involved in defense budget agreements all stressed to BERLINGSKE TIDENDE that the situation is serious. Arne Melchior, Center Democrat, also said that if only the Social Democrats put forward a budget proposal with less than a 3-percent increase the Center Democrats would vote against it. The other three parties have still not reached a decision on the matter.

Defense Minister Poul Soegaard said that no date has yet been set for the coming negotiations, but that the first meeting will take place sometime in September. But this will be after the Social Democratic congress at the beginning of September.

"The congress does not have to be over before the negotiations start, but its date has been fixed for the beginning of September, and it will clearly give us a few pointers," Poul Soegaard said.

PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE URGES UK TO BUY U.S. TORPEDO

[Clare Hollingworth report: "Buy U.S. Torpedo and Save 720 Million Pounds Say MP's]

[Text] An important committee of MPs has severely criticised Defence Ministry plans to spend 920 million pounds sterling on Stingray, a new, highly sophisticated British anti-submarine torpedo.

"On the evidence available to us we are not convinced by the case for spending an additional 720 million pounds sterling rather than purchasing the U.S. torpedo," the "watchdog" Committee of Public Accounts says.

The MPs admit that they have "no detailed evidence" on the relative capability of the Stingray and the "improved Mark 46 torpedo," but they urge the Defence Committee of the House to investigate capabilities and cost effectiveness of the two weapons. Both can be launched from either aircraft or surface vessels.

The Public Accounts Committee stressed that the advanced, lightweight Stingray has already taken 10 years to develop and still had to be satisfactorily completed.

"If the Defence Ministry's expectations are not realised and further problems arise, we trust they will not hesitate to carry out a fundamental reappraisal of the project's cost effectivenss."

About 145 million pounds sterling has already been spent on Stingray, which is said to have the capability to destroy enemy submarines and to overcome counter-measures likely to be introduced within the next 20 years.

Four of the five nuclear powers--Russia, the United States, France and Britain--claim that the submarine is still practically invulnerable as a means of transport and as a launching platform for missiles with nuclear warheads.

MPs were told last September that the estimated cost of Stingray was 920 million pounds sterling which would make it almost 10,000 million pounds sterling today, compared with 200 million pounds sterling for the American torpedo.

The Ministry of Defence have in the past suggested that the choice was made predominantly on the basis that Stingray alone posses the capabilities considered essential to meet the potential threat from Russian submarines to supplies and reinforcements coming to Europe from North America.

Members of the committee suggested that the cost should be shared with NATO. They noted that the cost of cancellation would be the 146 million pounds sterling already spent and an extra 15 million pounds sterling for the employment consequences of cancellation.

Mr Joel Barnett, Labour MP for Heywood and Royton and chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, said yesterday that a "huge difference" existed between the cost of the two weapons systems, even after allowing for the cancellation of Stingray.

He hoped they would be able to sell the Stingray when it was completed but, he added, that there was no evidence that anybody was interested in buying it.

The government's reply to the committee is expected to be made known in October.

LIBYAN INFORMATION SECRETARY BEGINS 4-DAY STATE VISIT

NC311714 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1630 GMT 31 Jul 80

[Text] Libyan Information Secretary (Muhammad Mahmud Hijazi) has stated that his country supports the need for safeguarding the unity of people and state and the nonalignment of the Republic of Cyprus. (Hijazi) arrived in Cyprus this afternoon at the head of a large delegation on an official visit. He also said that the recent visit to Cyprus by the Libyan foreign minister had affirmed his country's position on the Cyprus issue. (Hijazi) went on: On our part, we will welcome President Kiprianou and Mr Denktas in Libya at their forthcoming visit in an attempt to assist in finding a solution to the Cyprus problem. (Hijazi) said that such a meeting would be under UN Secretary General Waldheim's auspices and would try to find a solution that would safeguard the unity, integrity and nonalignment of the republic so that it could play an active and serious role in the Eastern Mediterranean. (Hijazi) said that during his 4-day visit in Cyprus he would sign an information agreement with the Cypriot Government and would explore the possibility of signing civil aviation, cultural exchange and employment agreements. He also said that his visit to Cyprus fell within the framework of the traditional bonds of friendship and cooperation which already exist between the peoples of both countries.

KIPRIANOU REPORTEDLY CALLED TO ATHENS FOR INTRANSIGENCE

TA311447 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 31 Jul 80

[Text] The Greek Cypriot leader, Mr Kiprianou, is reported to be going to Greece next month to spend his vacation there, but diplomatic sources in Nicosia say that Mr Kiprianou was called to Athens by the Greek Government and will be kept there until he changes his intransigent attitude on the Cyprus problem. The sources add that in the meantime a number of decisions are expected to be taken by the Greek Cypriot administration under the president of the House of Representatives, Mr Mikhailidhis, who will be acting for Mr Kiprianou during his absence. An official Greek delegation, who visited Cyprus recently to mark the anniversary of the 1974 coup, is reported to have had friendly contacts with the Greek Cypriot opposition and the same sources point out that the end of Mr Kiprianou as the head of the Greek Cypriot administration is very near.

Meanwhile, Turkish Cypriot sources, referring to a visit to the federated state by the former Greek constitutional adviser at the intercommunal talks, Mr (Dhekleris), say the anxiety felt by the Greek Cypriots because of the visit was a result of a guilt complex. The sources add that the Greek Cypriots have been suspecting everyone, even people with good intentions. During his visit to the north Mr (Dhekleris) also visited the mass graves of Turkish Cypriots massacred by Greeks and Greek Cypriots and three villages in the Famagusta District.

Officials' Denial

[Excerpts] Officials dismissed as "ridiculous" the suggestion by the Turkish Cypriot Bayrak Radio yesterday that the visit of President Kiprianou to Athens for a holiday is undertaken on instructions of the Greek Government and that he will be "kept there until he changes his intransigent policy."

Greek Cypriot sources saw this as a manoeuvre to cause a rift between Nicosia and Athens the more so that the Turkish Cypriot broadcast also claimed that the Greek parliamentarians who were in Cyprus for the coup and invasion anniversary protest gatherings had "friendly meetings with Greek Cypriot opposition."

TURKISH ADMINISTRATIVE ATTACHE SHOT DEAD; ARMENIAN BLAMED

TA010514 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 0430 GMT 1 Aug 80

[Text] The administrative attache at the Turkish Embassy in Athens, Galip Ozmen, was martyred in an armed attack in front of his house in Athens last night. According to reports that have reached the TRT news center, a person approached the car of Ozmen as he was parking it in front of his house last night. The armed person broke the left rear window of the car with a silencer. The murderer then shot at the Ozmen family in the car.

The murderer, who is believed to be 23 to 25 years old, later escaped from the scene of the incident. Ozmen died at the scene of the incident. His wife, Sevil Ozmen, and his daughter, Neslihan Ozmen, who were also in the car, were seriously wounded. One of Ozmen's sons was slightly injured and the other was unharmed. Neslihan Ozmen, the 14-year-old-daughter of the attache, is being kept alive only by life-support equipment in the hospital. Sevil Ozmen is reported to be improving.

A person called the AP bureau in Athens and said that an Armenian organization has assumed responsibility for the incident. Greek police officials said that more than 100 persons thought to be connected with the incident have been taken into custody. Greek Prime Minister Rallis expressed his profound grief over the incident.

Statements by Rallis, Papandreou

AT011117 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 0400 GMT 1 Aug 80

[Excerpts] Throughout the night Athens security police continued questioning suspects in their investigation of the murder of the attache of the Turkish Embassy in Athens, Galip Ozmen, aged 42.

Prime Minister Rallis, on being informed of the tragic incident, expressed his deep regret and issued immediate instructions to the minister of public order for a full mobilization of security forces for the discovery and arrest of the perpetrators and their collaborators.

PASOK Chairman Papandreou made the following statement on the murder of the Turkish diplomat: We unreservedly condemn the armed attack against the Turkish diplomat and his family.

Continued Investigation

AT011219 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 1 Aug 80

[Excerpts] Athens security police continue intensive investigation into the murder of the attache to the Turkish Embassy Galip Ozmen which took place at 2130 last night in Pangrati [Athens suburb].

Dozens of persons, mainly young Armenians and eyewitnesses, have been questioned so far. At the same time the Athens security briefed Interpol and also requested all information on the activities of Armenians. An extensive investigation is also taking place of all aliens who arrived in Athens recently.

Medical examiners Efthimiou and Levkidhis today carried out an autopsy on the body of the Turkish diplomat. It was established that Galip Ozmen received five shots from a 7.65 mm pistol. The victim has two bullet wounds in the arm; one in the chest area and one in the left shoulder blade. Four bullets passed through and one lodged in the body.

The diplomat's wife was hit in the left arm by a bullet which then lodged in her back. The condition of the victim's daughter is reported to be critical. She was wounded in front of the left ear. She also received a wound in the left temple and a bullet passed through the forehead area. She is under intensive care. The victim's son was hit by a bullet which passed through the left shoulder blade.

A second on-the-spot investigation was conducted today at the scene of the crime. The gunman approached the diplomat's car and he must have fired nine shots at a range of less than one meter, kiling the diplomat and wounding members of his family. The diplomat's youngest son did not have time to enter the automobile.

It was reported today that after the murder the gunman proceeded through Pratinou Street toward Pangrati Park where he ran up the steps while being chased by the diplomat's eldest son, who was wounded. At the steps the gunman handed the murder weapon over to another person who was waiting for him. They both proceeded through Aristomenous Street toward Ippodhamou Street where they disappeared.

It was also reported that the Turkish attache had not requested protection from the Athens security police which had no information on any Armenian activity.

Deputy Foreign Minister Rendis visited Turkish Ambassador Tezel at noon today and expressed the government's deepest regret over the tragic incident. Rendis assured the Turkish ambassador that on instructions from Prime Minister Rallis the security forces are conducting intensive and broad investigations for the discovery and arrest of the murderers.

Rendis also presented a personal message from Defense Minister Averof, who is acting foreign minister, to the Turkish foreign minister in which he expresses the deepest sorrow and abhorrence of the Greek people over the murder of the Turkish diplomat and the wounding of members of his family.

MITSOTAKIS HOSTS LUNCHEON FOR CYPRIOT FOREIGN MINISTER

NC291929 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1900 GMT 29 Jul 80

[Excerpts] Foreign Minister Rolandhis had a meeting in Athens today with Greek Foreign Minister Mitsotakis and exchanged views on the Cyprus issue. The meeting was held during a luncheon given in Rolandhis' honor by the Greek foreign minister. After the meeting, Rolandhis stated that they had a useful exchange of views on the Cyprus issue. Mitsotakis also stated that it is a regular practice to exchange views on the course of the Cyprus issue and added: I believe that the exchange of views and mutual briefing assist in charting the best possible course. Rolandhis made a brief stopover in Athens on his way back from Rome. Mr Rolandhis returned to Cyprus this afternoon.

DEMIREL DENOUNCES MURDER OF ADMINISTRATIVE ATTACHE IN ATHENS

TA011056 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 1 Aug 80

[Excerpts] A statement issued by the Foreign Ministry Information General Directorate in Ankara noted that the hospital officials in Athens have lost hope for the life of Neslihan Ozmen, the daughter of the administrative attache at the Turkish Embassy in Athens. The statement also said that all the necessary moves are being made regarding the Greek authorities.

Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel said that the shots fired at the administrative attache of the Turkish Embassy in Athens were directed at the Turkish state and nation. In a statement to journalists upon emerging from the Cankaya Mansion at the end of his weekly meeting with Acting President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil, Demirel said that Ozmen's reputation will be protected and his death will not be forgotten. Pointing out that the enemies and traitors of Turkey are engaged in action, the prime minister also noted that the government will not be intimidated by these actions.

Demirel said that he will hold a news conference tomorrow and will talk about Turkey's situation at the beginning of August.

ENVOY RECALLED FROM JERUSALEM; PARTY LEADERS COMMENT

Demirel Statement on Recall

TA311414 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 31 Jul 80

[Excerpt] Turkey has made a new move concerning the Jerusalem issue. The Turkish charge d'affaires in Tel Aviv has been recalled to Ankara for an extensive briefing. The announcement on this subject was made by Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel at the end of the Council of Ministers meeting today:

[Begin recording] The Council of Ministers discussed the Jerusalem issue. It reviewed the latest developments regarding the Jerusalem issue. Turkey will definitely not accept a fait accompli. I am affirming this decision. It has been decided during the Council of Ministers meeting that our charge d'affairs in Tel Aviv be recalled to Ankara by the Foreign Ministry for consultations. Ecevit's Denunciation

[Text] The ambassadors and representatives of 10 Islamic and Arab countries and the PLO representative in Ankara have called on RPP leader Bulent Ecevit at the parliament and have expressed their views regarding the recent Israeli decision declaring Jerusalem as its capital.

In a statement at the meeting the PLO representative in Ankara, Abu Firas, said that the Israeli move declaring Jerusalem as its capital was another ring in the imperialist and Zionist chain of aggression. He expressed the belief that Turkey will take further steps to protect Jerusalem and to support the struggle of the Palestinian people. Abu Firas also conveyed to Ecevit the greetings of PLO leader Yasir 'Arafat.

Speaking at the meeting, Ecevit said that Israel had reacted to the recent UN General Assembly resolution with a new and serious injustice and that it had taken a step which disregarded the sentiments of the whole Islamic world.

Ecevit said: The Turkish people will not bow down to this aggression directed against our joint spiritual inheritance. Noting that the Israeli decision to declare Jerusalem its capital opened a new wound in the Middle East, Ecevit added that this new wound will render more difficult the elimination of tensions in the region. Pointing out that a way out of the current situation could be found through joint decisions and harmonious stands by the Islamic world, Ecevit said that these decisions and stands should not open new wounds in the world but should gain the support and understanding of the world public opinion.

NSP Leader's Criticism

TA311546 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 31 Jul 80

[Text] NSP deputy leader Sevket Kazan said that the recent UN General Assembly decision regarding the Israeli withdrawal from the occupied territories and the establishment of an independent Palestinian state clearly shows that the world is supporting the Muslims on the issues of Palestine and Jerusalem. In a written statement, Kazan said that no country, with the exception of Israel and the United States, opposed the United Nations resolution. Kazan said: Given the current situation, why is the Demirel government waiting to sever relations with Israel? By whom is it intimidated?

TA311406 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 31 Jul 80

[Text] A $4 billion loan protocol on the financing of the Ataturk Dam by a group of Swiss, FRG and British firms has been signed in Ankara. The protocol was signed by the under secretaries of the Finance Ministry and the Energy and Natural Resources Ministry, Turhan Kivanc and Necdet Seckinoz, on behalf of Turkey and by an official of the Swiss firm, (Frey), on behalf of the firms.

In a statement at the signing ceremony, Finance Minister Ismet Sezgin said that the loan agreement in question was the largest in the history of Turkey and that the loan will be used for the largest service project. Sezgin noted that with the construction of the Ataturk Dam economic and social development in Southeastern Turkey will be speeded up and that new opportunities will be available for the people in the region. Pointing out that the dam will save foreign currency, Sezgin added that energy production in the region will promote industry and will increase agricultural production.

Speaking at the ceremony, Minister of Energy and Natural Resources Esat Kiratlioglu said that with the construction of the dam some 10 billion kW hours of electricity will be produced annually and that some 8.5 million dunams of land will be irrigated. Noted that the first unit of the dam will be operational in 1985, Kiratlioglu said that it is planned that all units will be operational within 7 years. He added that Turkey's agricultural and energy output will be doubled with the completion of the dam.

Speaking on behalf of the foreign firms, (Frey) expressed the conviction that the Ataturk Dam will greatly contribute to Turkey's development. Also speaking at the ceremony, the State Hydraulic Affairs Director General Timucin Tumer gave information on the project. According to information given by Tumer, the dam will be one of the largest installations in the southeastern Anatolian project on the Tigris and Euphrates. The Ataturk Dam, which will be build as a rock-fill dam, will produce some 8.5 million kW hours of electricity annually [as heard]. The power station of the dam will have a capacity of 2400 mW.

FOREIGN MINISTER COMMENTS ON AUSTRIAN-IRAQI RELATIONS

AU011733 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1600 GMT 1 Aug 80

[Barbara Coudenhove-Kalergi report]

[Text] In response to the expulsion of two Iraqi diplomats from Austria due to the bombing attack on the Iranian Embassy, the Iraqi Government today expelled an Austrian diplomat from that country. First Embassy Secretary Dr Josef Litschauer is already on his way to Austria. The expulsion of diplomats is a very severe measure in international relations. What political final balance sheet is to be drawn from this affair? Are the relations between Austria and Iraq seriously encumbered? This is what we asked Foreign Minister Pahr this afternoon, by telephone, at his vacation site:

[Begin recording] [Pahr] We could not accept this conduct of members of the Iraqi Embassy in Austria; Austria cannot accept Austrian laws being disregarded in Austria. We are, however, by all means interested in maintaining good relations with Iraq, but we had to emphatically protest the events that took place here in Austria 2 days ago, which we did by taking the normal actions for such cases.

[Kalergi] Mr Minister, Iraq is our most important--one of our most important--oil suppliers. Do you have any reports as to whether and how this might possibly affect our trade relations?

[Pahr] I have no reports in this respect and I hope that Iraq will realize that a sovereign state like Austria cannot accept strife between other states being waged on its territory.

[Kalergi] Is the matter, in fact, closed herewith or will there be any clarifying talks between the Foreign Ministry and the embassy or between the Austrian and Iraqi Foreign Ministries?

[Pahr] For us the matter is closed, since the situation is completely clear and there is nothing to be clarified. We hope that in the future the Iraqi side will respect Austrian laws just as we respect the laws in Iraq.

[Kalergi] Is there a possibility of replacing Dr Litschauer, or can he return there after a while?

[Pahr] Dr Litschauer is on his way to Austria and, naturally, we have the possibility of sending another diplomat to Baghdad to replace him.

[Kalergi] Does the Foreign Ministry plan to do it?

[Pahr] We will certainly do it, as our representational office in Iraq is, after all, so important that we need at least two diplomats there.

[Kalergi] Can Austria, so to say, accept the expulsion of a properly acting official and replacing him with another one even though the first one has done nothing wrong?

[Pahr] We have to put up with it. This is a form of a retaliation that is provided for by international law, even though we consider it unjustified. Our ambassador in Baghdad, in accordance with instructions he was given, also brought it to the Iraqi authorities' notice. [end recording]

Dr Ludwig Steiner, the foreign policy spokesman of the People's Party, called on the Federal Government to demand, with all due emphasis, damages from Iraq for the bombing attack.

SCHMIDT-HONECKER TALKS TO BE HELD 28-29 AUGUST

LD031124 Hamburg DPA in German 1057 GMT 3 Aug 80

[Excerpt] Bonn, 3 Aug (DPA)--Bonn and East Berlin have finally agreed on a date for the inner-German summit between Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and SED leader Erich Honecker in the GDR. According to reliable information learned today, Schmidt will arrive in Rostock on 27 August and hold his talks with Honecker on the two following days in the Baltic spa of Dierhagen, about 50 kilometres northeast of Rostock.

According to the same information, official confirmation for this date and the programme for the chancellor's visit is unlikely until later in the month when Honecker has returned from his visit to the Crimea where he will coordinate the course for the inner-German summit with Soviet party leader Brezhnev on 11 August.

VENEZUELAN EMBASSY IN BONN OCCUPIED BY DEMONSTRATORS

LD040940 Hamburg DPA in German 0920 GMT 4 Aug 80

[Text] Bonn--According to the Bonn police, about 50 demonstrators occupied the Venezuelan Embassy in Bonn this morning. A police spokesman said that so far the demonstration has been peaceful, and that the action is aimed against "Venezuela's solidarity with San Salvador". No member of the embassy staff has yet been in contact with the police.

POLICE PREVENT ANTI-KURDISH BOMB ATTACK

LD011502 Hamburg DPA in German 1217 GMT 01 Aug 80

[Text] Berlin--The West Berlin police today prevented a bomb attack on a congress of the "Association of Kurdish Students Abroad" which was attended by over 100 persons. Two people were arrested. The police announced that a large amount of explosives were impounded which was intended to be left in the conference room by a Kurd. The explosives were hidden in a suitcase. The West Berlin police will hold a press conference at 1500, without giving any further details, and the Kurdish association has announced another press conference for 1700.

Iraqi Diplomats Arrested

LD011508 Hamburg DPA in German 1420 GMT 01 Aug 80

[Summary] Berlin--In connection with the thwarted attack on an assembly of Kurdish students in West Berlin today the police arrested two Iraqi diplomats from East Berlin on suspicion of having planned it. They are the first secretary of the Iraqi Embassy in East Berlin, Khalid Jabir, and a member of the embassy's technical staff, Hajj 'Ali Mahmud. Both refuse to make any statement.

The head of the State Security Department of the Berlin police, Manfred Kittlaus, announced at a press conference that both men were in possession of diplomatic passports of the Iraqi Embassy in East Berlin issued by the GDR Foreign Ministry. However, they had no diplomatic status in West Berlin or in the Federal Republic. The explosives were hidden in the lid and bottom of a suitcase and fitted with battery detonators. The two Iraqis handed the suitcase to a third person who was to take it into the conference room. In reply to the question whether this third person was working for the Iraqis or the police, Kittlaus replied: "Both are correct, but the other side did not know this."

The car used by the Iraqis was a Mercedes Benz with the official East Berlin diplomatic license plate CD21-09. The vehicle is registered with the Iraqi Embassy in East Berlin.

Kittlaus said at the press conference that the Iraqis were arrested in West Berlin's Wedding District at 0900 following a wild chase. One of the two men tried to jump from the car, while the other rammed a number of cars and police road blocks. He was finally dragged from the car by an officer of the special police unit. Both offered strong resistance and fought the police with their fists. During the struggle Mahmud lost a 7.65 mm Walther PPK pistol loaded with five bullets.

They will be brought before an investigating judge tommorrow. The Allies were informed of the police action and of the arrest of the Iraqis. Kittlaus added that the explosion would have had a devastating effect.

As both the arrested men refuse to make any statement the police have asked the public for assistance in clearing up the case. They have issued two photographs of the men with a request for any indications of their activities in West Berlin. The police are also interested whether and where the light blue Mercedes with the diplomatic license plates has been seen recently in Berlin.

The association of Kurdish Students Abroad [AKSA] was told of the planned attack by its informant, to whom the explosives were handed last night, and informed the West Berlin police accordingly. A spokesman for the association told a news conference that the man had met two (?men), who came in a diplomatic car from East Berlin, in a West Berlin restaurant 1 day before the planned attack.

He was given a briefcase, which he was to be seen to be carrying by the members of the congress. At a further meeting on the same evening, he had returned with a briefcase which was like the one filled with explosives (?on) Friday. The briefcase with the explosives was to have been placed in the meeting hall of the federal guesthouse ready for the opening of the congress at 1000. After having been informed about the intended attack, the organizers of the meeting postponed the opening until 1300.

According to the AKSA spokesman, an Iraqi "special secret service" squad had persuaded the Kurd, who was living in West Berlin, with promises of money as well as threats against his family to act [words indistinct] against Kurds living abroad. The man had pretended to agree to this but had then informed the (?organizers). The man, who is about 30 years old, is said to have received about DM500 a month (?from Iraq). For the bombing attack he had been promised DM 3,500.

The association claims to have about 300 members in Europe. It includes students from Turkey, Iran, Iraq and Syria. AKSA supports the demand for Kurdish autonomy and Kurdish cultural and democratic rights.

Envoys To Be Prosecuted

NC030648 Paris AFP in English 0618 GMT 3 Aug 80

[Text] West Berlin, Aug 3 (AFP)--Two staff members of the Iraqi Embassy in East Berlin will be prosecuted here for attempted murder and illegal possession of explosives, sources said yesterday.

An examining magistrate ordered First Secretary Khalid J. Jabir and Hajj 'Ali Mahmud, a member of the embassy's technical personnel, held prisoner.

The two were arrested Friday after a Kurd said they gave him a briefcase containing a powerful explosive to place in a building where European Kurds were to hold a conference.

Diplomatic immunity granted by East Germany to members of foreign missions accredited to its territory is not recognized by the American, French or British military governments in Berlin or by West Berlin or West German Government authorities.

Iraq's Embassy in East Berlin denounced the double arrest, declaring that the two officials were "victims of the anti-Iraqi campaign organized by Zionism." East German authorities did not comment on the arrest, which was not mentioned by ADN, the official East German news agency.

COMMENTATOR REGRETS DEBATE OVER MISSILE STATIONING ISSUE

DW040929 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 4 Aug 80 p 8

[Commentary signed Ein." "Russian Roulette"]

[Text] It is uncertain whether Belgium will station on its territory the missiles envisaged by NATO. A decision will not be forthcoming before the fall. But since the parliamentary committees in Brussels wound up their discussions on the project the other day the question concerning the aye or nay has retained its topical character. Most deputies and senators dealing with the stationing problem reportedly advocate letting NATO have a reply soon. Nor has any of the people's representatives raised any fundamental objection to the deployment of the new weapons systems. Yet the old reservations have remained: As before, the approval is made dependent on negotiations with the East. Granted, NATO might ignore Belgium's hesitant attitude, were it not for the influence this Atlantic alliance partner wields on the Dutch and on the Italians. The Netherlands is supposed to accommodate 48 missiles and the Italians have promised to set up 112 bases. If one of the small partners in the alliance--perhaps Belgium--demonstratively says nay, the others might change their minds again. The political missile game at the moment is like a round of Russian roulette.

PAPER SPECULATES ON SOVIET TROOP CUT IN GDR

DW040910 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 4 Aug 80 p 4

[Commentary signed Ty.: "Obscure Troop Withdrawal"]

[Text] Has Brezhnev fulfilled an excess quota in disarmament? The report actually sounds quite credible that the troop withdrawal from the GDR announced by the Soviet head of party and state last October has been wound up ahead of schedule. On the one hand the Federal Government had "substantiated findings" about the pullout of 16,000 soldiers and 700 to 800 tanks weeks ago. By this the Brezhnev promise had been fulfilled 80 percent with respect to personnel and at least 70 percent with respect to materiel. On the other hand there seem to be indications of a withdrawal of parts of the Red Army also in the GDR--above all some barracks obviously are no longer as fully occupied. But it is necessary to admit, too, that the limit between withdrawal and restructuring in this particular case is especially hard to draw.

Perhaps both are taking place and are interlinked. It may be that the Soviet Union deemed a modest thinning out sensible within the framework of a militarily reasonable restructuring of its armed forces in the foremost "frontline." It is legitimate to sell such an action also as part of peace policy. The invasion of Afghanistan had deprived the measure of its impact in the West anyway. Some people even claimed to have seen in this a reinforcement even of the Warsaw Pact troops. The Federal Government, however, lacks adequate information for assuming such a parallel action.

Rumors about the additional organization of two divisions of the National People's Army (NVA) seem to be even more vague. The GDR has a hard time maintaining the NVA which is relatively large anyway--small wonder in view of the manifold security services. (At best the setup of cadres for reserve divisions would be eligible there.) Thus, all told, what remains is a numerically modest but psychologically effective troop reduction.

SUSPECTED ILLEGAL ARMS DEALS BEING INVESTIGATED

LD011804 Hamburg DPA in German 1800 GMT 1 Aug 80

[Text] The Duesseldorf public prosecutor's office has started extensive investigations into suspected illegal arms deals by the Ruestungs AG Rheinmetall. The North Rhine-Westphalian Ministry of Justice confirmed that investigations are in progress but declined to give any details. A ministry spokesman said that secrecy would be maintained in order not to endanger further enquiries. A special commission consisting of members of the federal criminal investigation office and the public prosecutor's office has been set up for the investigations. Rheinmetall manufactures mainly tank turrets and barrelled weapons. A spokesman for the firm gave an assurance that no military hardward had been exported except with permission from the Federal Government.

SHIPYARD WORKER ARRESTED FOR ESPIONAGE

LD311958 Hamburg DPA in German 1904 GMT 31 Jul 80

[Text] Karlsruhe-Bonn, 31 July, (DPA)--Secrets of the new frigates of the Federal Navy may have been betrayed at the Vulkan shipyard in Bremen to an Eastern intelligence service. The federal public prosecutor's office in Karlsruhe confirmed today that a man has been arrested on suspicion of espionage but did not give any further details. According to the 1 August edition of DIE WELT a draftsman at the shipyard has betrayed details of the new frigate to the GDR and has been arrested. He is also believed to have been concerned with the design of the multipurpose type 122 frigate. The prototype of the first of six vessels is being built at the Vulkan yard where the propulsion unit and the weapons and guidance systems are being fitted.

WESER-KURIER reported in Bremen today that the man was arrested on Sunday during a major operation of the federal public prosecutor's office and the Federal Intelligence Service (BND). Afterwards officials searched the man's house from attic to basement for 2 days. A large number of objects, the report says, were removed from the house.

The prototype of the frigate is due to be commissioned by the Federal Navy in the spring of 1982. The new 130 meter-long frigates carry helicopters for antisubmarine and other operations. The Vulkan Shipyard is the general contractor for the construction of the six ships ordered by the Bundeswehr.

EGYPT'S GHALI REVIEWS UN SPECIAL SESSION ON PALESTINE

NC012206 Paris AFP in English 2144 GMT 1 Aug 80

[Text] Paris, August 1, (AFP)--The special United Nations session on Palestine Tuesday was the subject of talks today between Egyptian Minister of State for Foreign Affairs Butrus Ghali, who just returned from the session, and his French counterpart, Jean Francois-Poncet, Mr. Ghali said today.

Mr. Ghali, who is to return to Cairo one day early, will report on his trip to New York and Paris to President Anwar as-Sadat. Afterwards, the Egyptian position on the Israeli law, adopted Wednesday, making Jerusalem its undivided capital will be announced, he said.

Egypt and Israel "must maintain dialogue," Mr. Ghali said, after a working lunch with Mr. Francois-Poncet. Mr. Ghali added that the Palestinian questions, the Middle East question and bilateral relations with France, which he termed "extremely important," also were discussed during the lunch, given by Mr. Francois-Poncet.

LE MONDE INTERVIEWS MITTERRAND ON FOREIGN POLICY

LD011539 Paris LE MONDE in French 31 Jul 80 pp 1, 6

[Michel Tatu interview with PS First Secretary Francois Mitterrand--date and place of interview not given]

[Text] [Question] What is your main criticism of the government's foreign policy?

[Answer] We have a foreign policy which strives above all to please the current interlocutor, especially if he is powerful, or simply to please French opinion. It is a policy which has no general ideas aside from one: to adapt to circumstances. I am not arguing against realism. However, realism does not necessarily consist of choosing the short-term prospects instead of the future and following the situation from day to day. This is what is happening whether with regard to the Middle East, the Near East, the European Community, the Third World or relations with the USSR and the United States.

[Question] What is your opinion on the Warsaw meeting between Mr Giscard d'Estaing and Mr Brezhnev?

[Answer] My viewpoint is that in a grave period of tension, at a time when the future is uncertain, anything which in any way helps to condone the aggressor's position is a mistake. Therefore I regarded the trip to Warsaw as a mistake. I do not see how France's approach could help solve the Afghanistan problem, hasten the Soviets' departure or open negotiations. We do not have any means of changing the existing balance of forces for the benefit of peace.

[Question] What should have been done, then, to help the Afghans?

[Answer] The USSR is forced to take account of a number of facts on the basis of which other countries can act. For instance, after the Kabul coup it was faced with the hostile bloc of Islamic countries--even if that bloc was not completely united--with the overwhelming UN vote when, for the first time, the majority of the Third World countries condemned a Russian action, and with an acceleration in the rapprochment--which it fears--between the United States and China. In addition it ran a great risk to the Olympic games and endangered the two main negotiations of Brezhnev's reign: SALT II and the Helsinki conference's great followup in Madrid next November. Finally, let us not forget the Afghan people's tenacious and probably unforeseen resistance.

To return to the Warsaw meeting, what Mr Giscard d'Estaing had to day, when he perhaps said to Mr Brezhnev, was less important, indeed had not importance compared with the act of meeting with Mr Brezhnev at such a time and with the significance of this meeting. Finally, the president of the republic hesitated for a long time in asserting the right of peoples to determine their own future--a human right. The word "unacceptable," pronounced after 2 weeks' delay, was understood by the Russians to mean...accepted.

Stalin formerly asked "how many divisions?" when talking disdainfully of the pope. I think that what Stalin said that day was stupid. Of course, everybody knows the power of arms but there are also invisible forces which exert great influence. I believe in the existence of a universal conscience. Anybody who tries to rouse it is heeded one day. Civilization would end if human conscience were to be irrevocably submitted to the primitive promptings of power and blood. Right probably loses many a battle. However, it will triumph eventually if it remains intransigent. Hence the importance of the struggle for human rights.

A single fearless witness can suffice to express and hence arouse the world's hope. I know that France must take care not to be presumptuous or to adopt a didactic attitude. However, I am sure that if France were merely to recall the principles on which there can be no compromise, its words would echo round the world. Finally, I believe that if the Soviets were to see greater cohesion in what we call the West and greater cohesion in what we call Europe it would help move their thinking toward opening negotiations.

[Question] Are negotiations possible?

[Answer] The Russians cannot be said to have ruled them out, first, because they cannot easily turn a deaf ear owing to the problems they are encountering. If you analyze the various proposals made so far--the Cuban, Indian, "Afghan" and European proposals--they all center on the idea of a withdrawal from Afghanistan with international safeguards and the adoption of a neutral status. That is a basis for negotiations and I think we must move toward a solution of that type. However, this cannot be done by denying any rights. Any suggestion that this solution would imply the prior recognition of the Karmal regime's legitimacy or the legitimacy of the present foreign order should be eliminated. The Afghan people must determine their future in complete freedom. I would like to add that, when the president of the French Republic uses the words "Afghan rebels" in his press conference to describe that people's resistance movement, he is giving the Soviet Union an alibi and favoring negotiations based on recognition of the current regime.

"Recognizing the Afghan Resistance"

[Question] Mr Giscard d'Estaing has said that France will not give military aid to this resistance. What is your view on that?

[Answer] The Vietnamese resistance was recognized by many countries. Why should the Afghan resistance not be recognized? I said recently that, unless there is a Soviet withdrawal, this recognition would be vital.

[Question] The resistance should be recognized and hence aided?

[Answer] Recognition is already helping it a great deal.

[Question] Do you think that economic pressures could be used?

[Answer] I accept technological sanctions but I am loath to support food sanctions which are, moreover, usually ineffective. The grain which the Soviet Union buys is not directly destined for human consumption but for cattle which then feed men. There is a long gap between these operations, during which other countries can be approached. Morally speaking, I find such methods rather shocking. Technological sanctions, on the other hand, amount to saying: You are acting contrary to law, contrary to peace, you are bringing world war closer and I have no reason for giving you the means of doing it better and quicker. I think that is a legitimate response.

[Question] However, it is not always effective, especially if the Europeans supply what Americans are refusing.

"What a Shambles!"

[Answer] Certainly. This inconsistency proves that there is no Atlantic alliance, or rather that it no longer has any meaning. A reexamination of the relations uniting the countries belonging to the Atlantic alliance strikes me as urgent and vital. I have repeatedly said that if any summit was necessary, it was one to do that. Because I proposed this summit L'HUMANITE described me as an Atlanticist. That made me laugh...and must have surprised the Americans! What then do the PCF leaders mean when they assert that they do not want France to leave the Atlantic alliance? Do they say this because the Atlantic alliance is meaningless? The PCI and PCE have also asserted their desire to remain in the alliance.

The fact that Afghanistan and the whole Middle East are not covered by this alliance is politically and geographically self-evident. Nevertheless, what a shambles! Look at Britain renewing and even increasing its contracts with Iran at the same time as it is joining the plan for economic sanctions against that country! Look at the FRG concluding new economic and technological agreements with Soviet Russia at the very time Carter is claiming to freeze relations with Moscow: Let's not mention France!

Allow me to make myself quite clear. The Americans bear a great deal of responsibility. Carter is wrong to mix election considerations with problems of world peace, and he does, and to take decisions on everything without consulting those he is committing or thinks he is committing. However, as far as I am concerned, I feel I must alert public opinion to the chaotic state of Western strategy, if, indeed, it can be called a strategy. When the seven (six Western countries and Japan) met in Venice in June they published a harmonious and optimistic communique at the end of their meeting--or at least it was interpreted as such. It was thought that the seven were agreed at least on Afghanistan--the main subject of their talks. Well, the very next day Carter was talking about withdrawing the Soviet troops in stages and the day after that Valery Giscard d'Estaing, who had suggested a timetable for the withdrawal in Warsaw, said the opposite! On what had Carter and Giscard agreed? On nothing.

I believe it was Mr Hua Guofeng who said that there is only one superpower in the world, the Soviet Union. That is going too far. However, it is obvious that, since its involvement in the Vietnam war, U.S. policy has been disinherited. A kind of whirlwind has seized that country which, despite its vitality and creative capacities, is building up reasons for self-doubt. It must be admitted that its interventions in Vietnam, Kampuchea and Latin America have "demoralized" it in the true sense of the term. The Soviet Union does not experience such moods.

"Nobody Knows What the Alliance Is Doing"

[Question] Would a U.S. resurgence not worry you?

[Answer] It all depends on what you mean. So far our conversation has related to the tensions arising from the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan and its consequences, and to that point alone. If we move away from this problem, I observe that the United States has not stopped waging an economic war against us: the disappearance of the monetary system; the multinational companies' strategy; the manipulation of the dollar; the U.S. intention, executed by Britain, to sink the Common Market in a free-trade zone--in short, U.S. imperialism demands a great deal of vigilance on our party and justifies our suspicions.

However, we have not yet emerged--even if we wish we had--from the situation arising from the last world war: When the United States and the USSR agree, their allies count for little. When they do not agree it is even worse. Therefore I am asking the West at least not to indulge in the strategy of the curiatii [classical reference to tactic of splitting one's adversaries and disposing of them one by one].

The Atlantic alliance makes provision for consultations among partners in case of threat, that is all. The Brussels Treaty goes a little further, but the fact is that nobody in the West really knows what the alliance is doing, its scope, the reciprocal obligations it involves and to what extent it acts automatically. Everybody must at least be aware of what he accepts and what he rejects and say it plainly to the others. After that we will know where we stand. The alliance is based on a myth: U.S. intervention in Europe in the event of a Soviet aggression.

Neutron Bomb

[Question] Let us then talk about the bomb. The neutron bomb symbolizes the debate, but the real question is what France should do for its allies in the event of war in Europe. Is it necessary, for instance, to prepare for conventional warfare in Europe or does it seem to you that deterrence, sanctuarization, should carry the day?

[Answer] As you know, we Socialists have come out against the production and deployment of the neutron bomb. In the present state of the alliance it is impossible for France to do anything except ensure its own territory's defense via the nuclear deterrent. Any sorties outside its territory would fundamentally contradict this strategy, would involve us in conflicts which we could no longer control and would make us enter a system in which we would forsake the possibility of making our own decisions. However, such a withdrawal into themselves could in the long run encourage the French people to adopt a sort of neutral attitude toward world affairs in general and our closest friends in particular. If we were unwilling to show solidarity with them, how could we expect them to be in solidarity with us? There is now antinomy between a strategy based exclusively on the defense of the national sanctuary and a strategy based on alliance. Any political leader who is afraid to face this problem deceives public opinion. I demand that people at last know what is being discussed, and that a discussion take place.

[Question] Does conventional warfare nonetheless remain a possibility?

[Answer] In my view the American doctrine of graduated response makes no sense. Can you imagine that, knowing that the other side will be ready for it at the first, second or third warning salvo, a big country like Soviet Russia would engage in a conflict only to withdraw from it miserably 48 hours later?

In fact, the Soviets can wage war only directly and on a massive scale. And they have seen to it that they can act this way: Their SS-20 missiles could destroy all European military installations in 15 minutes without touching one village or one city, without killing one American soldier and without one Russian soldier being sent beyond the Soviet borders.

//

[Question] What conclusion do you draw from all this?

[Answer] I do not conclude from this that the Russians want war. I even believe that the contrary is true. But they have an arsenal which, if I may say so, makes it possible for them to win a war without waging one. We have the duty to consider now the grave question of the balance of forces in Europe.

The "Pershing"

[Question] What do you think of NATO's decision to deploy American Pershing [2] missiles and cruise missiles in Europe?

[Answer] When the Communist leaders asked us to demonstrate against the American Pershing [2] missiles I told them that we were willing to do this provided an action against the Soviet SS-20 missiles were started at the same time. I admit that the Pershing missiles are intolerable from the Russians' viewpoint. But I want the Russians--and Communist leaders--to realize that the SS-20 missiles are intolerable from the French people's viewpoint. And I notice that even though the announcement of the deployment of Pershings in Europe by 1983 has exasperated Moscow, the idea of discussing these missiles, the SS-20 and the rest is gaining ground. Let us continue, therefore:

This is the main problem as far as peace in Europe in concerned. I have been very surprised that the president has remained silent on the subject, which he seems either to be unaware of or to underestimate.

[Question] You advocate firmness and yet you came out against boycotting the Olympic games.

[Answer] Making athletes scapegoats in this entire affair had little significance. Furthermore, the way in which President Carter proposed such a boycott was so obviously a vote-catching maneuver and so removed from any joint consultation that I found it intolerable. And inasmuch as I want to see the Atlantic allies reconsider their position, I also want us to show no weakness whenever the Americans confuse alliance with imperialism. In any case, as you know, the West Germans gave way only because they had to. In fact, they were as much or even more shocked than we were by Carter's unilateral action.

[Question] J.-P. Chevenement recently wrote an article in which he states that the Soviet danger has been exaggerated, that it is not the main danger and that this bogus fear conceals a desire to consolidate the positions of the military-industrial apparatus.

[Answer] Let us not dismiss this hypothesis. But let us not base all our reasoning on it either. It would be foolhardy. The desire for peace can be demonstrated differently than by engaging in frantic overarming: The deployment of SS-20 missiles which could not reach America but could reach Europe (their range does not exceed 4,500 km) constitutes a real danger. However, it is also conceivable that certain industrial and military circles have been adding fuel to the fire.

[Question] What type of negotiations do you advocate with the East?

[Answer] Global negotiations without preconditions. The Socialist Party does not merely assess the risks of a conflict and alert both public opinion and the authorities to the fact that these risks are increasing. It also reminds all concerned that any accumulation of arms, especially nuclear ones, repeated challenges and violation of international law are bound to lead to confrontation. And that it is time to resume negotiations on sound and loyal bases. [paragraph continues]

Hence the importance of the Madrid conference during which all concerned will meet one another for the first time since the Kabul coup in order to discuss the economy, security, human rights and confidence-building measures which would help restore detente. At any rate, this is the agenda for this conference. And let us remember that all European countries--West and East--will be there. Many of them on both sides will speak a similar language with a view to creating the prerequisites for peace.

I hope that the Socialist proposal to convene a conference with a view to reducing forces and tensions in Europe, which I mentioned to LE MONDE readers in December, will be adopted.

"Friendship With USSR Must Not Be Based on Indulgence"

[Question] Since then you seem to have been placing more emphasis on the Soviets' responsibility.

[Answer] This is because Afghanistan and the SS-20 are pressingly topical issues. Do not think that there is any contradiction here: I have never stopped believing in the need for friendship and good relations between the USSR and France. I regard this as essential to the European balance and I am prepared to multiply initiatives in this direction. But friendship is not based on indulgence. The Russians will negotiate all the better with us the more they respect us. What I mean is that they will respect our ability to say "no" when we have to. It will lend weight to our "yesses."

[Question] What do you think of the present tendency to let France and Germany forge Europe?

[Answer] So much the better for the French-German reconciliation, which dates back much further than the 20 years which Valery Giscard d'Estaing generously accorded to it during his recent visit to Germany. As far as I am concerned, I attended the first European congress in The Hague...in 1947. But that is very different from creating a special Paris-Bonn axis. Europe is the Europe of the Nine and presupposes a thorough equality among its partners. If Britain absents or distances itself, it is a pity.

Fluctuations Over Europe

[Question] Is the Europe of the Nine fairly united on this?

[Answer] No, I fear not. I am worried, I admit, by the decline in the Community spirit among the Nine. We are living on the basis of obsolete rules, and when the rules are not obsolete they are violated. Unfortunately France is not the last in failing to meet its obligations, because paradoxically it disregards the safeguard clauses contained in the treaty. In it approach to Europe the Giscard-Barre government demonstrates the same fluctuations as in other areas of its foreign policy. We would not have waged the "lamb war" so fiercely had we prepared satisfactory transitional measures while there was still time, before the end of December 1977. We would have been less affected by the afront to Mr Giscard when Britain was granted Fr15 billion if we had not previously treated Britain offhandedly.

Again a few days ago in Germany the president of the republic appealed for European solidarity. Listening to him, I could not fail to remember his refusal to sign the "Seveso" directive on major accident risks in industry, as in the case of the dioxin in this small north Italian town, which is still a restricted zone 4 years after the disaster. The same applies to the pollution of the Rhine, with regard to which we accepted an agreement dangerous to the subsoil of Alsace which we later refused to implement. How illogical!

I was also reminded of Mr Giscard d'Estaing's about-face on expanding the Common Market. He could not be sarcastic enough last year when criticizing the Socialist stance on demanding the prior negotiation of strict economic agreements to guarantee our producers fair conditions of competition. But we did have serious arguments concerning the very nature of the Common Market and not Mrs Thatcher's moods. And we raised real issues: guaranteed agricultural prices for producers and amounts [quantum], wine, fruit and vegetables and horticultural boards, standard tax and welfare charges and so forth. Can the head of state's attitude be explained other than by electioneering considerations?

I remember announcing that "either Europe is socialist or it will not be built." This does not signify the negation of a pluralist Europe but my doubts regarding the liberal economy's ability in Europe to escape its own laws, which condemn it to becoming confused in a whole dominated by interests which are not our own. The Socialists have given their answer: the Pisani, Cresson and Sutra report; Jacques Delors' proposals; Yvette Roudy's report on the environment. Our critics do not want to be negative, but how can you change the economy without changing policy?

CGT ALLEGES POSSIBLE GOVERNMENT VETO ON CONTRACT WITH USSR

LD040949 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 30 Jul 80 p 5

[Unattributed report: "French Veto on a Contract With the USSR?"]

[Text] Andrey Sainjon, secretary of the CGT metalworkers Federation [FTM CGT] wrote a letter to Raymond Barre yesterday to express his surprise at the French Government's silence about the delay in concluding an agreement for a big French company to build the world's biggest iron and steel complex in the USSR.

On 7 July the FTM CGT had already asked the economy minister for an audience to discuss this matter but it has not yet received any reply. These are the facts revealed by the CGT:

For several years the USSR has been inviting tenders for the construction of a big iron and steel complex in the Moscow region which would be capable of producing 350,000 tons of silicon metal sheets. First, it was an American-Japanese company--ARMCO--whose chairman is an American senator, which secured the order as a result of sordid dealings imposed by the American Government in connection with the signing of the SALT accords.

Since President Carter decided at the beginning of the year to impose an embargo on supplies of equipment to the USSR, ARMCO called off the deal.

The USSR then turned to a French consortium composed of Creusot-Loire, Jeumont-Schneider and Creusot-Loire Enterprise which had competed with the American company for the contract.

The CGT emphasizes that, to start with, the French Government placed many obstacles in the path of the negotiations for the contract, demanding, among other things, that the equipment in question be supplied without expertise. However, the contract was ready to be signed at the beginning of the summer.

Then the Venice summit took place: "Is it true that at that time the U.S. administration's approval was asked for at the highest level and that it was withheld?: the CGT asks.

"If this were proved true," the CGT wrote to the prime minister, "we would have an idea of your concept of the independence of a great country like France subjected to the veto of the U.S. Government and multinational companies.

"This would confirm the fact that France's policy has been aligned with that of Carter of which the Venice summit marked a new stage. It would mean that, obviously at variance with its official positions, France would in turn find itself engaged in an embargo policy which dare not speak its name."

Be that as it may, the French Government has refused to reply for more than 1 month to a request for information made by the companies interested in the contract.

Such a policy not only contributes toward a worsening of international tension but also, the CGT emphasizes, is bound to have the following serious consequences:

In fact, the contract amounts to 1.5 billion new francs. This represents one-half of the turnover of a company like Jeumont-Schneider and an equivalent of 5,000 full-time jobs during 1 year. The building of such a complex would be a proof of the competitiveness of French products and would help to spread our country's influence.

Furthermore, the CGT emphasizes that if the French Government were to persist in its attitude, the USSR would probably implement its plan by awarding the contract to some other European enterprises--FRG enterprises, for instance.

"This contract must be concluded and honored," the CGT states. "The jobs of thousands of metalworkers in our country and the future of France's trade exchanges with a big country like the USSR are at stake."

BOMB EXPLOSION IN BOLOGNA BLAMED ON RIGHTWING TERRORISTS

AU040830 Rome ANSA in English 0805 GMT 4 Aug 80

[Text] Bologna, August 4 (ANSA)--76 dead and 180 wounded is the toll to date for the massive bomb blast that ripped through the central station here Saturday morning, leaving carnage and destruction in its wake in what is suspected of being an extreme rightist terrorist attack.

With some of the injured in a very grave condition, it is feared that the list of the dead may lengthen in the coming hours, though official sources have confirmed that all the casualties were out of the wreckage by dawn Sunday morning. Sunday morning, there was also official confirmation from Bologna's Public Prosecutor Ugo Sisti that the explosion was caused by a bomb, which many factors indicate as having been laid by extreme rightwingers.

The full details of the attack are still not clear but, according to reliable sources, the massacre seems to have been caused by ten kilos of plastic explosive mixed with a certain amount of TNT and packed in a suitcase. The investigators must now try to establish whether the suitcase bomb was exploded by the terrorists in the station's second-class waiting-room on purpose, or whether it went off by mistake.

According to the investigators, claims to paternity for the massacre received to date are not sufficiently reliable, but the general feeling in many circles is that the explosion was the work of extreme rightwingers.

Saturday afternoon, the Neofascist Revolutionary Armed Nuclei (NAR) telephoned both the Roman daily, LA REPUBBLICA, and the ITALIAN NEWS AGENCY to claim responsibility for the bomb, but a second phone-call to the agency from a person claiming to speak on behalf of the NAR denied any involvement. On Sunday afternoon, yet another phone-call claiming to come from the NAR arrived at the Roman office of the Milan-based daily, L'OCCHIO, denying the organisation's responsibility.

On Saturday, the bomb was also claimed by a telephone caller claiming to speak on behalf of the leftist Red Brigades urban guerrillas, but the Brigades issued an authoritative denial later with a telephone call transmitted live by a privately run radio station.

Another extreme leftist urban guerrilla group, the Organized Communist Movements, asserted its "complete extraneousness" to the attack in a phone-call to the Venetian office of the NASA News Agency Sunday.

Apart from these claims, investigators believe that the timing of the blast and the location chosen for the massacre may be crucial in deciding the political matrix of its authors. On Saturday morning, just a couple of hours before the explosion, the Bolognese magistrates indicted neofascist terrorist Mario Tuti, who is already serving a life sentence for slaying two policemen, for the Italicus train massacre. The Italicus express was blown up on the line between Florence and Bologna on August 4, 1974, leaving twelve dead and fifty injured.

According to the investigators, it was probably no coincidence that Saturday morning's massacre, the gravest in Italy since World War II, was perpetrated close in time and place both to Tuti's indictment and the anniversary and location of the Italicus bomb. Some sources even pointed out that the Italicus bomb was in fact timed to go off in Bologna station, but exploded at the exit to a nearby tunnel because the express was running late.

Meanwhile, addressing a crowd outside his summer residence in Castelgandolfo outside Rome, Pope John Paul II voiced his "pain and disturbance" over the massacre and prayed for the victims and their families.

In Bologna, there were visits during the day from Prime Minister Francesco Cossiga, Senate Speaker Amintore Fanfani, Defense Minister Lelio Lagorio, other politicians, and trade-union leaders. In a brief speech, Cossiga voiced the government's "very firm determination to ensure, not only that violence does not take any more victims, but that it also fails to reap the fruits of corruption (?of our) customs of civil life and the strength of our institutions which (?is) certainly its aim".

Today, the trade unions have proclaimed a nationwide general strike of two hours in protest against the massacre while the victims are expected to be buried on Wednesday.

GOVERNMENT 'DEEPLY CONCERNED' OVER STATUS OF JERUSALEM

AU021346 Rome ANSA in English 0815 GMT 02 Aug 80

[Text] Rome, 2 Aug (ANSA)--The Italian Government is "deeply concerned" over the Israeli parliament's decision to pass a law naming Jerusalem as Israel's "eternal and indivisible capital", according to sources at the Italian Foreign Ministry. The sources said yesterday that the move was seen at the ministry as in conflict with the resolutions of the United Nations on the Middle Eastern problem.

The sources also pointed out that Italy's position remains that voiced in the statement adopted by the European Council in Venice on June 13. The statement asserted, among other things, that it was unacceptable for Israel to make unilateral modifications in the status of Jerusalem. The sources reported that Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo had already brought up these points in a meeting with the Israeli ambassador in Rome, Moshe Alon, a couple of days ago.

DEFENSE MINISTER CITES RADAR DEFICIENCIES IN LIBYAN MIG CRASH

[Excerpts] Rome, July 31 (ANSA)--Italian Defense Minister Lelio Lagorio today advanced two possible explanations for the mysterious crash of a Soviet-built MiG-23 into a Calabrian mountain-side on July 18. In a statement delivered to the lower house defense commission on the crash of the fighter plane, which bore Libyan markings, and death of the pilot, the defense chief attributed the incident to either a sudden illness of the pilot during a training flight or "a desperate escape attempt with no adequate planning which concluded tragically". Lagorio told the commission that he might provide more information at the end of the work being conducted by the special investigating commission.

The Italian defense minister disclosed that the MiG was not picked up on Italian radar screens because of the low altitude of its flight path over national territory, because of the sharp variations of the terrain in the Calabrian region where the crash occurred, the significant differences between sea and land temperatures which set up electro-magnetic interference and also because of obsolete radar equipment, especially in the south. The defense chief quickly assured the commission that "the defense system must be continuously updated" and added, "a wide ranging modernization and extension plan is now being applied".

CARRILLO COMMENTS ON SPANISH POLITICAL SITUATION

LD012144 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1830 GMT 1 Aug 80

Shortly before his departure Carrillo told EUROPA PRESS that he is thinking of meeting the Yugoslav leaders to discuss problems of the international situation and of the communist movement itself. With regard to the present Spanish political situation, the Communist leader said that the attempt to reach an agreement between the government party, the Union of the Democratic Center, [UCD] and the Basque and Catalan minorities looks like having little success.

Regarding the opinion of a Socialist deputy concerning the political paralysis of the country during the summer months, Carrillo said that what is serious is not that Spain becomes paralyzed in August, but that Spain has been becoming paralyzed for a long time because the policy of the government is a static [inmovilista] policy.

In connection with the closure of MUNDO OBRERO, the PCE press organ, a newspaper has said that for Carrillo the next PCE congress will be his toughest because of internal criticism. The Communist leader said that he does not think that what a newspaper has said will happen--there will be debate and discussion, but the congress will not be the most difficult he has had to face.

PSOE's GONZALEZ HOLDS PRESS CONFERENCE IN PANAMA

LD312114 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1820 GMT 31 Jul 80

[Text] Felipe Gonzalez, secretary general of the Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE], has said in Panama that the most serious problems facing democracy in Spain are terrorism and unemployment. At a press conference given for the Spanish colony in Panama, the leader of the main Spanish opposition party said that in Spain at the moment there is more of a terrorist psychosis than actual terrorism, as the number of victims from this type of political violence is far less than in some countries with far smaller populations, such as El Salvador or Guatemala. For Gonzalez, unemployment is a bitter and dramatic reality, as in some regions of Spain it stands at more than 20 percent of the active population, while the European economic crisis no longer allows the exit of a million Spanish emigres who emigrated in the seventies. But the PSOE leader told the Spanish colony in Panama that Spain is a country with hopes, especially if it focuses its future possibilities with Latin America.

Gonzalez, who is spending a short vacation in Panama following his stay in Nicaragua, where he attended the first anniversary of the Sandinist revolution and the overthrow of the heriditary dictatorship of the Somozas, emphasized the difficulties entailed in the passage from an authoritarian, centralist regime to the system now prevailing in Spain which he described as a true democracy, and a state organization bordering on a federal state. The socialist leader noted that an important element in the present Spanish situation is the world economic crisis, which the country did not (?experience) under the old regime and which is a great source for democracy. The solution, for the leader of the most important opposition party, lies in opening up new economic horizons with Latin America and in increasing exchanges in all spheres between similar communities.

IOANNIDHIS, GOBBI MEET; KIPRIANOU COMMENTS ON RESUMING TALKS

NC020850 Nicosia CYPRUS MAIL in English 2 Aug 80 p 1

[Text] The Greek Cypriot negotiator, Mr Yeoryios Ioannidhis, yesterday had another meeting with the UN special representative, Mr Hugo Gobbi, and his deputy, Mr Remy Gorge.

An official statement said the meeting was "within the framework of the exchange of views on the question of the resumption of the intercommunal talks".

The meeting followed another long session on Thursday evening of the "working group" the inner committee under President Kiprianou which deals with the Cyprus problem, at which final consideration would be given to the Greek Cypriot response to a reported draft of an introductory statement by UN Secretary General Waldheim at the proposed resumption of the intercommunal talks.

However, there were conflicting reports yesterday as to whether the final views of the Cypriot side were actually communicated by Mr Ioannidhis yesterday or whether further clarifications were sought, in which case a reply would now be expected to be given next week.

Reference to Dr Waldheim's new efforts for resumption of the talks was made by President Kiprianou yesterday in the course of his reply to the address from the new Yugoslav Ambassador, Mr Cvijeto Job, when he presented his credentials.

During these days there is a new effort in progress for the resumption of the talks and on our part we are doing whatever we can so that this effort may bear fruit", the president said without elaborating.

The president outlined the Greek Cypriot approach to a settlement. He said: "There can be progress towards a peaceful solution; but if there is going to be progress there must be a radical change of attitude on the part of Turkey. We accept biregional federation as a solution, but it must be real federation and not confederation or division under any disguise".

"Cyprus must be a united country and the people of Cyprus--Greeks and Turks--must be a united people, living in conditions of peace and justice in a federal state without foreign armies. That is why we proposed the complete demilitarisation of Cyprus without foreign interferences and with strong international guarantees this time".

"This is more or less the solution which we envisage", Mr Kiprianou said and reiterated adherence to the Makarios-Denktas guidelines of 1977 and the ten-point agreement between himself and Mr Denktas and UN resolutions. On the basis of those agreements, the principles of nonintervention, nonannexation, of partition under any form, direct or indirect, demilitarisation and the safeguarding of the basic rights and political liberties of the citizens, a solution could be found provided goodwill exists, he said.

The president once again assured that the Greek Cypriot side is inspired by "full goodwill" and the government considers the Turkish Cypriots to be citizens of the Cyprus state and is equally interested in their well being as it is in the well being of the Greek Cypriots, the Armenians, Latines and Maronite citizens.

Ambassador Cvijeto Job expressed the hope that friendly talks between the two Cypriot communities conducted on a footing of equality will bring about a mutually acceptable just and lasting solution for the benefit of the people of Cyprus and their common life in peace and security".

[Text] Today President Kiprianou received Libyan Information Secretary Muhammad Mahmud al-Hijazi, who is on a 4-day official visit to Cyprus at the head of a large delegation. The Libyan information secretary's call on the president was of a courtesy nature. Al-Hijazi conveyed to President Kiprianou greetings from Libyan President al-Qadhdhafi and his interest in a Cyprus solution.

Foreign, Labor Ministers' Meetings

NC021121 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 2 Aug 80

[Text] The Libyan Information Secretary today called on Foreign Minister Rolandhis. Later, talks began at the Foreign Ministry for the signing of a cooperation agreement between the two countries in the political, educational, scientific and technical fields. The Libyan delegation to the talks was led by the Libyan information secretary, while the Cypriot delegation was led by Director General of the Foreign Ministry Pelayias. The pertinent agreement will be signed next Monday.

Earlier Al-Hijazi met Labor Minister Theodhoulou and exchanged views with him on issues of common interest. During their meeting, the two ministers noted that the bilateral agreement between Cyprus and Libya for the exchange of labor power has been successful from all respects and that the Cypriots working in Libya--they number about 1,000--are generally satisfied with their working and living conditions. Their problems are insignificant and can be resolved by further improving the system of contacts between the competent ministeries of the two countries.

informed Theodhoulou that his country is ready to receive any number of Cypriots with university qualifications or of workers and employees who would like to be employed in Libya. The two ministers agreed that in order to further improve the relations between the two countries and to expand their cooperation in the field of labor, the signing of a bilateral cooperation be promoted in the field of social insurance issues and for the employment of unemployed Cypriots with university qualifications in order to meet concrete needs of the Republic of Libya. Mr Al-Hijazi renewed an invitation to Mr Theodhoulou to visit Libya in order to see on the spot the working and living conditions of Cypriots employed in this country.

Airport Improvement Aid

[Excerpt] The Libyan Government has granted Cyprus 500,000 pounds sterling for improving Larnaca airport. The check was handed to communications minister Iliadhis by Libyan Information Minister Al-Hijazi, now on a visit to Cyprus, who said that the aid was granted in appreciation for the services rendered by the republic's Communications Ministry to Libyan pilgrims who go to Mecca via Larnaca airport as well as for the successful handling by the Cypriot authorities, particularly the Communications Ministry, of last year's hijacking of a Libyan airliner.

DENKTAS BLAMES GREEK CYPRIOT ATTITUDE FOR SEPARATION

TA021740 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1630 GMT 2 Aug 80

[Excerpt] Speaking to reporters this morning, President Denktas said that the minister of information of the Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriyah and the delegation accompanying him, now on a visit to south Cyprus, were also expected to visit north Cyprus, but added that the Turkish side had not yet been informed of their program. Referring to the point that the Libyan Minister viewed Cyprus as a single country, Mr Denktas said: The 1960 constitution established a functionally federal partnership republic based on two ethnic communities. The Turkish Cypriots and Greek Cypriot people had cofounder partnership rights in the independence and sovereignty of the republic, thus it was impossible for one of the partners to command the destiny of Cyprus by disregarding the other partner and as a further confirmation of this fact, Mr Denktas added, both sides had given mutual assurance to each other through national guarantees against enosis and partition, making the independence of Cyprus a lasting one.

Denktas said that in 1963 the Greek Cypriot leadership colluded with Greece to destroy the partnership republic and launched a preplanned bloody aggression for the total extermination of the Turkish Cypriot people in a very brief period, but when they had failed to totally exterminate because of the resistance of his community and the interest and support of guarantor Turkey they sustained their aggression for 11 years. Commenting on why the Turkish Cypriot side did not proclaim a completely independent state and declared a federal state instead, Denktas said that the Turkish side wanted to believe that the Greek Cypriot leadership had learned its lesson and convinced that it could not destroy the independence and sovereignty based on the partnership of the two peoples. Denktas said that the Turkish side wanted to give the Greek Cypriot side the opportunity to establish its own federated state so that a federal central government could have been jointly established. The president warned that if the Greek Cypriot side insisted on its policy it would lead the island to a complete and categorical separation and not to union because the Turkish Cypriot side, which is the cofounder partner in the independence and sovereignty of Cyprus, would not, under any circumstances, abandon its partnership status it defended at the expense of the Turkish community's lives for 11 years and would not accept minority status in a Greek Cypriot, Hellenized, Christianized Cyprus under the people who regard themselves as a legitimate government and falsely present themselves as such to the world.

Replying to a question on guarantees, Mr Denktas said that the continuation of the national guarantees was essential for the maintenance of the independence of Cyprus and that it could not be made a subject for bargaining.

KIPRIANOU APPEALS FOR PARTY UNITY ALONG MAKARIOS LINE

NC031206 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 3 Aug 80

[Text] President Kiprianou declared that today, 3 years since Ethnarch Makarios' death, our duty remains the continuation of his course until we successfully conclude the historical mission to hand down to the coming generations a really free and happy Cyprus where all its inhabitants--irrespective of race or religion--will enjoy the benefits of freedom and equality.

Speaking on behalf of the state during the official memorial service for the ethnarch at the Kykko Monastery today, President Kiprianou stressed that the people's unity, unity of aims and goals, is the most indispensable prerequisite for the successful outcome of our struggle. He added: It is not permissible today, under any circumstances, to put party or personal interests above the national cause. The parties, organizations and individuals, President Kiprianou said, are free to express any disagreement; however, he stressed, they have no right to disturb the people's peace and unity over the national issue for which there must be only one line: The line for the salvation of Cyprus, the Makarios line which it is everyone's duty to follow faithfully without deviation.

President Kiprianou declared that we are neither going to betray our people's just rights, nor directly or indirectly accept the faits accomplis or the results of--in comparison--the most terrible crime that has ever been recorded in world history, and which was committed against Cyprus in 1974.

President Kiprianou stressed that we are ready for a logical solution that would secure for all our people the prerequisites for a happy life. The president said: We are not intransigent, just as Makarios never was intransigent. But as Makarios himself had stressed on many occasions, conciliatoriness should not be mistaken as a tendency to submission, or goodwill as desire for capitulation. Mr Kiprianou said: We are prepared to discuss a solution that will secure true freedom and independence, a solution based on already existing agreements, a solution that will provide our people with all possibilities for a free and peaceful future.

The president stessed that there is room for all in the arena of the struggle provided that we struggle for the same thing. He stressed: The torch, Makarios, whose spiritual presence is guiding us, is so visible that it allows no hesitations, doubts or differing interpretations.

Mr Kiprianou also said that Makarios never considered the Turkish Cypriots as rivals and that he struggled for their benefit as well. He added: And I believe that today, while we are struggling for the freedom of Cyprus, we are in fact also struggling for the freedom of Turkish Cypriots because under the present conditions they are also living under occupation and I am sure that also they have regrets because of the arrival at that time of the so-called Turkish liberation army.

Finally, Mr Kiprianou said that the continuation of Makarios' work and the realization of his visions would constitute the best memorial by his people for him.

Speaking at the memorial service on behalf of the church of Cyprus, Archbiship Khrisostomos described the late ethnarch as the protagonist and personification of popular unity for the sake of which he had expended much energy. Archbishop Khrisostomos said: Makarios knew that the people's struggles cannot succeed without unity, particularly when these people are numerically small and weak, as is the case with us. He stressed: Today, more than ever, let us be more prudent and let us observe Makarios' advice.

In his speech Archbishop Khrisostomos said that the people draw hope and courage from the inexhaustible source of Makarios' courage and that they are strengthened in the steep road to their calvary that does not appear to be a short one. He said: Three years after his death, Makarios continues to be the polestar that helps us find the correct line, while the reefs and ridges of international machinations are trying to block our road. He added: Particularly today it is necessary that we turn to this polestar to both check the soundness of our orientation and chart our future course, because for our country the tragic consequences from the 1974 treachery and the Turkish invasion have not yet changed.

DENKTAS: GREEK CYPRIOTS INVOLVED IN MURDER OF TURKISH ENVOY

TA012000 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1930 GMT 1 Aug 80

[Text] Denouncing the murder of a Turkish diplomat in Athens, President Denktas said: The Greek Cypriot leadership has a finger and its money in these murders. Commenting on the cruel attack in Athens where a Turkish diplomat, Galip Ozmen, was killed and his wife and daugher were seriously wounded, Denktas said: We are faced with a new and very sad murder. It is significant that the murder was committed in Athens. It is being said that it was committed by Armenian organizations. Nobody is surprised. The Greek Cypriot leadership has its finger and its money in these murders, which is known. The murder was committed in Athens because certain circles want to widen the gap between Turkey and Greece. Nobody can believe that an Armenian organization can commit this murder and then disappear in Athens.

The Turkish Cypriot people share the grief of the families of the victims and of the Turkish nation. Turkish diplomats should not be killed just like that, for no reason. Anybody who claims to be a man must do his duty in the face of such meaningless murders and bring the culprits to justice. Above all, this would be in the interests of all Armenians.

Government Denial

NC041103 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 4 Aug 80

[Text] The government spokesman has categorically denied an allegation by the Turkisn Cypriot leadership that Greek Cypriots had a finger in the recent assassination of a Turkish diplomat in Athens. The spokesman emphasized that the allegation, to which publicity had been given in newspapers abroad, was totally unfounded and was within the framework of a systematic Turkish slander campaign against the Greek Cypriots that was aimed, among other things, at securing pretexts for possible new adventurist moves.

INVESTIGATION INTO TURKISH ENVOY'S KILLING CONTINUES

ATO21150 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 2 Aug 80

[Text] As established by the police investigation, there were two gunmen involved in the murder of Turkish diplomat Galip Ozmen. The existence of the two gunmen was proved by an on-the-spot reenactment conducted at the scene of the crime in Pangrati [Athens suburb]. One of the two gunmen emptied his pistol in firing at the attache of the Turkish Embassy and members of his family while the second gunman covered the first one's withdrawal. Security forces, which have been fully mobilized in their effort to trace and arrest the murderers, yesterday questioned approximately 150 persons including many young Armenians. General security officers believed the murderers cannot be members of the Armenian community in Athens. For this reason they alerted Interpol which has also been set into motion.

Reprisal Threats From Armenians

NCO21745 Paris AFP in English 1736 GMT 2 Aug 80

[Text] Beirut, Aug. 2 (AFP)--An organization calling itself the Armenian Secret Army for the Liberation of Armenia today threatened the Greek Government with reprisals against its diplomats if any Armenians ran into trouble in Athens. A communique to that effect written in English and received today by AFP's bureau here came in apparent reaction to the questioning of Armenians in the Greek capital following last Thursday's assassination there of a Turkish diplomat, responsibility for which was claimed by the Armentian Secret Army. The text said: "To the Greek government-we remind you that all your diplomats are within our reach of fire. Therefore if anything happens to any Armenian in Athens, your diplomats will be our next targets."

Daughter's Death

ATO31911 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1830 GMT 3 Aug 80

[Text] A short while ago the daughter of Turkish diplomat Galip Ozmen, who was murdered last Thursday in Pangrati, died in the people's hospital where she was being treated. As is well known, Neslihan Ozmen, 19, had been seriously wounded during the murderous attack against her father. Since that day she had been in a coma. Her remains have been transferred to the Athens morgue.

PASOK CALLS ON GOVERNMENT TO DIRECTLY CONDEMN ISRAEL

ATO21130 Athens EXORMISI in Greek 2 Aug 80 p 1

[Text] PASOK called on the government to directly state its opposition to Israel's decision to proclaim Jerusalem the capital of the Israeli State.

This was stressed in a statement issued yesterday by the movement's committee on international relations. The text of the statement is as follows:

"Israel's decision to establish Jerusalem as the capital of the Israeli State is not only a provocation directed at the United Nations, which only recently in a resolution asked for recognition of the rights of the Palestinians, but at the same time it is an unacceptable act which undermines the situation in the Middle East.

"PASOK unreservedly condemns this decision and calls upon the Greek Government to directly state its opposition to an act which is directly contrary to the resolution which it recently supported at the United Nations."

In the meantime many countries have already openly condemned the decision of the Knesset which, as it is well known, was adopted by a majority. Among the countries which have already condemned this Israeli action are France, Britain, Turkey and nearly all the Arab countries. Egypt will recall its ambassador.

BREAK IN SOVIET SHIP REPAIR AGREEMENT LINKED TO NATO RETURN

AT021345 Athens EXORMISI in Greek 2 Aug 80 pp 1, 11

[Excerpts] The U.S. and West German disengagement from their policy to date in support of preserving Aegean balance of power is considered by authoritative political observers to be a concerted attempt to bring about pressure for Greece's return to NATO.

In the immediate future this concerted effort will be followed by similar statements from other NATO member states. This must be considered a direct blackmail attempt aimed at forcing acceptance of the new plan for Greece's return which is being prepared by NATO as well as for a "solution" to the national issues in Cyprus and the Aegean in conformity to "allied" interests.

This blackmail attempt is also directly related to the drive which is being actively promoted in an effort to prevent renewal of the agreement between the Greek Government and the Soviet organization "Sudoimport" on the Neorion [ship repair facilities at Siros] agreement which ends in December 1980.

It is characteristic that during a recent Brussels meeting, alliance personalities described Neorion as "new Alexandria-type installations" while the New York HERALD TRIBUNE talked of "conversion of Siros into a Soviet naval communications base in the heart of the Aegean." Such references which are not only excessive but also fail to reflect the essence of the arguments against the Neorion agreement are aimed at exerting pressure upon Greece to force it not to renew the agreement, an eventuality which would create difficulties for the USSR over the repair of non-naval ships but which would also create many problems for Greek economy which is faced with a large-scale crisis.

In reference particularly to the U.S. decision not to take into consideration the 7:10 ratio, it is characteristic that the State Department issued a statement which under expressions on "elasticity" and "lack of obligation" only confirms reports about the U.S. reneging on the obligation which was undertaken for the preservation of the Aegean balance of power.

It is obvious that the United States in its effort to deprive the Greek Government of every "negotiation ace in the hole" in respect of its return to NATO, now proceeds to "open threats" about a unilateral strengthening of Turkey and a long term disturbance of the balance which has existed in the area.

It is not at all strange that immediately after the United States, West Germany also stated that on its own part there is also no obligation to maintain the 3:5 ratio which it has observed to date in its aid grants to Greece and Turkey.

Naturally this ought not to create surprise since West Germany is one of the basic supporters of Turkey. This West German role has often been stressed by PASOK Chairman A. Papandreou, who in his recent visit there stressed the dangers created by this unbridled support and aid to Turkey and condemned the decision to strengthen Turkey militarily.

The cancellation of the Greek-Soviet Neorion agreement, which terminates in December 1980, is in essence another hard condition set by the U.S. Pentagon and the allied headquarters in Brussels for our country's return to NATO's military wing.

According to our information the Greek Government is subjected to "insistent" recommendations by the ambassadors of certain friendly EEC countries, which are also members of NATO, not to renew the Neorion agreement beyond 1980 because, as it is being argued, NATO strategy in the Mediterranean is changing due to the presence of the Soviet fleet in the area.

It is recalled that in the past and during foreign policy debates in the chamber of deputies, PASOK Chairman A. Papandreou stressed the danger of an overthrow of the balance of power in the Aegean as a result of allied "policy" and that he had asked the government to take steps to prevent such an overthrow.

U.S. REPORTEDLY ASSUMING TOUGHER STANCE TOWARD GREECE

AT031355 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 3 Aug 80 pp 1, 3

[By correspondent Rikhardhos Someritis]

[Text] Paris--At least for the next few months the Americans are determined to maintain a tough position toward Greece on the following issues: return to NATO, the future of their bases and the more general "circuit" of Greek-Turkish relations. This is believed by well-informed observers according to whom:

1. Washington's basic aim is not to attain a formula for the temporary coexistence of Greeks and Turks within the framework of the alliance but a general agreement between the two countries which will cover all controversial issues (including the Cyprus issue) and will guarantee "the tranquillity of the West" in the Aegean and Eastern Mediterranean for a long period of time.

2. The Americans believe that this general agreement cannot emerge except from bilateral Greek-Turkish negotiations. All of Washington's substantive activities try to promote these negotiations even by blackmailing the Greek side. This is the interpretation being given not only for the huge amount of aid to Turkey, but also for the questioning (by Americans and Germans) of the promises of maintaining a balance with Greece.

3. Rightly or wrongly, the impression has been created in Washington and NATO that, specifically in the economic field (huge additional expenditures that must be confronted if Western help to Turkey is not offset by corresponding help to Greece), Greece is not able to choose an alternative policy. This impression has been enhanced by the viewpoints of important Greeks who appear as devotees of a "return" regardless of the conditions under which it may be implemented.

4. The affirmation that the 2-year period of negotiation on the "return" and bases issues has (tacitly) led to a significant change in Greek positions and claims has played a g eat role in the formulation of this policy by U.S. circles; the fact is that what Athens currently seeks is not the negotiation of a truly "special relationship" with the alliance's military wing and the essential autonomy of Greek forces and their equipment but a return to the status that was in force in July 1974. The only controversial point is the Aegean status within NATO which, according to NATO (and contrary to what the Greek Government seeks), depends on bilateral consultations between Greece and Turkey.

Finally, at least some circles believe that the Greek "NATO lobby" is strong enough to take advantage of the current situation in order to promote anticipated developments and even weaken the impression that could be created by occasional reports about a possible new orientation of our country toward NATO or the U.S. bases.

PRIME MINISTER DISCUSSES RELATIONS WITH IRAQ, ISRAEL

Comments on Iraq

TA011454 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 1 Aug 80

[News conference held by Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel after his weekly meeting with Acting President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil at the Cankaya Mansion--recorded]

[Excerpts] [Question] There are certain reports that our relations in Iraq are becoming tense. The fact that [words indistinct] our ambassador to Iraq is in Turkey on vacation is being interpreted in various ways. Recent developments [words indistinct].

[Answer] This is the issue. As you know, 10 Turkish citizens were shot and killed because they crossed the border in Hakkari. This is not in any way compatible with humanity, neighborliness, fraternity or Islam. It is not possible for the Turkish Government and the Turkish nation to remain silent in the face of this. The necessary reaction has been made. Although the other side accepted a joint investigation of the incident and search for the culprits, nothing tangible has been done since then.

We have kinsmen in Iraq. Naturally, these are Iraqi citizens. However, 17 persons were previously sentenced to death because they are of Turkish origin and not because they are Iraqi citizens. A significant number of those sentenced were executed. Recently it was also reported that another nine persons were sentenced to death and executed. These reports were not definitely or officially confirmed. However, if they are not correct, such reports should officially be denied. These denials were not made.

We have always regarded Iraq as a brother country and a brother state. Our relations have been very smooth and good. It is out of the question for us to cause tension or disrupt these relations. However, no state can treat the issue as if nothing happened in the face of these incidents. We cannot treat the issue in this manner. This is why we recalled our ambassador [to Iraq]. The Foreign Ministry will conduct consultations with him and receive information.

I hope that, in view of these events, Iraq will not commit an error in assessing the value of its relations with Turkey. We do not shed blood and we did not shed blood. However, we do not consent to the blood of our citizens being shed. The fact that Hakkari is 1,700 km away from Ankara does not mean that I turn a blind eye to the bloodshed of my brother in Hakkari. It is the duty of the Turkish state and the Turkish Government to defend the rights of Turkish citizens, regardless of where they are. The existence of Iraqi citizens of Turkish origin in Iraq should not constitute an issue but should be a bridge between the two countries. It is meaningless to kill people who have lived together for 400 years. This is a very bad thing. All the same, we--Turkey is a great state--are viewing the issue in a cool-headed manner. It is impossible to view it as if nothing happened. However, it is our right to say: Let us investigate the matter. Let such things not occur. It is also our duty to defend the rights of our citizens who died unjustly. This is what is being done.

[Question indistinct]

[Answer] I do not want to say anything further now. I think that if you resort to the language of diplomacy, you can deduce many things from what I said. I want the relations between Turkey and Iraq to improve and not to worsen. This is why I spoke in a constructive manner. However, I am grieved. I have citizens who died, their families and my nation want to defend their rights.

Response to NSP on Israel

TA011529 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 1 Aug 80

[Excerpt] Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel replied to journalists' questions upon emerging from his weekly meeting with Acting President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil. A journalist recalled that the NSP will retrieve the interpellation motion it submitted about the foreign minister if the relations with Israel are severed and asked what the attitude of the government will be on this subject. Demirel said that the government will not act contrary to Turkey's interests in order to insure the cancellation of the interpellation. Pointing out that the important issue for the government consists of fulfilling a duty and not of whether or not to remain in power, Demirel said: If what should be done is in Turkey's interests, then we will do it. The issue of whether to remain in office is secondary.

CHARGE D'AFFAIRES TO TEL AVIV RETURNS HOME, BRIEFS ERKMEN

TA041041 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 4 Aug 80

[Text] Turkish Charge d'Affaires in Tel Aviv Gundogdu Ustun has briefed Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen on Israel's move declaring Jerusalem its capital and the recent developments in the area. Ustun was recalled to Ankara to brief the government following the finalization of Israel's decision to make Jerusalem its capital. It was reported that Ustun will remain in Ankara for some time and continue his contacts.

ERKMEN, FOREIGN MINISTRY DENOUNCE MURDER OF ATTACHE IN ATHENS

Foreign Minister's Statement

TA012026 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 1 Aug 80

[Excerpt] Foreign Minister Erkmen harshly denounced the attacks against Turkish diplomats and said: Such attacks do not cause countries to compromise with other countries or organizations. Foreign Minister Erkmen issued a statement in connection with the attack in Athens where the administrative attache at the Turkish Embassy, Galip Ozmen, was martyred, and his wife and daughter were seriously wounded. Erkmen said: Such cruel attacks against innocent people do not cause people to lose their determination, nor do they cause countries to compromise with other countries or organizations. As the Turkish Republican Government we have the duty and are determined to protect the integrity of our country. We do not allow any foreigner to claim rights in this land. Foreign Minister Erkmen also said that the necessary steps were being taken and contacts being made with the concerned governments to prevent such attacks against Turkish diplomats abroad and to take the necessary protective measures.

Foreign Ministry Statement

TA011228 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1200 GMT 1 Aug 80

[Excerpt] The Foreign Ministry has announced that the atrocious attack which resulted in the death of the administrative attache at the Turkish Embassy in Athens, Galip Ozmen, and the wounding of his wife and daughter is strongly denounced before world public opinion.

The statement issued by the Foreign Ministry Information Directorate General in Ankara today noted that this attack, which was intended to murder an entire family--including wife and children--is a horrifying act which completely disregards and ruthlessly violates human principles. The statement said: All members of the foreign service strongly condemn this act before world public opinion. Such inhuman attacks can in no way prevent Turkish foreign service members from continuing to fulfill their tasks with courage, dignity and a sense of duty.

DEMIREL CITES NEED FOR MARTIAL LAW TO FIGHT TERRORISM

TA021137 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 2 Aug 80

[Text] Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel has said that martial law must definitely be successful and that the success of martial law has become equivalent with the fate of the country. In a news conference in Ankara today, Demirel commented on the situation of Turkey at the beginning of August. During the first part of his news conference, Demirel expressed his views on anarchic and terrorist incidents.

Pointing out that martial law can be declared in the face of a state of war, a situation necessitating war, an attempted action against the country and the republic or a threat posed to the integrity of the country and the nation, Demirel said: When we came to power, martial law was being enforced in 24 provinces. The government before us declared martial law because there obviously was a situation which required its declaration.

Noting that anarchy and terrorism is a national issue and that a national attitude is necessary in the face of a national issue, Demirel said that his government has engaged in an extremely determined struggle against those who are committing acts against the republic and the country. He said that the struggle is being waged in accordance with a strategy and tactics and not in an isolated or haphazard manner. Stating that the issue of anarchy and terrorism has been discussed by the National Security Council nine times since his government assumed power, Demirel noted that there are deficiencies of law and authority where combating anarchy and terrorism are concerned. Demirel said that the subjects of establishing state security courts, enacting the state of emergency law and increasing the authority of martial law commanders have repeatedly appeared in National Security Council statements. Demirel said: This [word indistinct] should not be opposed. The opponents will bear the responsibility for the bloodshed.

Pointing out that, now that his government is in power, the origins of anarchic and terrorist organizations are being uncovered and that some 10,000 suspected participants in incidents of anarchy have been arrested and numerous organizations uncovered, the prime minister said: The bloodshed is continuing. The incidents have not stopped. So far we have not been able to extinguish the fire. However, this is not due to the weakness of the state or our inability but to the enormity of the fire.

Demirel asked all political parties, constitutional organizations and citizens to assist in combatting anarchy and terrorism.

In the latter half of his news conference--which is still continuing--Demirel is expressing his views on economic issues.

RPP Criticism

TA031653 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 3 Aug 80

[Text] The RPP General Administrative Council met in extraordinary session under RPP leader Bulent Ecevit today. A statement issued after the meeting criticizes the statement made by Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel at a news conference yesterday.

The statement says that Demirel's news conference yesterday more clearly exposed--through new and distinct proofs--the plots hatched by the government. Noting that the Turkish Armed Forces are trying to remain outside political differences and arguments, the statement adds: However, Prime Minister Demirel is insistently and obstinately trying to drag the Turkish Armed Forces into political discussions and arguments.

The statement notes that the prime minister was repeating and interpreting statements issued by the National Security Council for the last 8 months in the style of an ultimatum to the parliament and was using threats which meant if you do not comply with my wishes you will be confronting the Turkish Armed Forces. The statement adds:

The National Security Council and its commander members is a constitutional instituation. The council makes recommendations to the Council of Ministers on issues pertaining to National Security. The Turkish Grand National Assembly is not the respondent [muhatap] of the National Security Council. The council's respondent is the government. The prime minister should submit his requests from the Turkish Grand National Assembly not through the statements and mediation of the National Security Council but through the government.

Noting that in democratic regimes the parliament is not an organ that confirms without discussion requests submitted from outside the parliament, the statement says that the parliament is an organ that freely discusses all issues and confirms only those that it sees suitable. The statement continues: Since it is out of the question in our country for the Grand National Assembly to enter into an argument with the National Security Council, Prime Minister Demirel should renounce the irresponsible attitude of confronting the Grnad National Assembly with National Security Council statements that he interprets and tries to use as he pleases and of trying to put pressure on the assembly. It seems as though Prime Minister Demirel wishes to repeat the 12 March experience and to take it even further, this time remaining in power and creating the false impression that he is backed by the Turkish Armed Forces. He is, thus, trying to revenge recent history.

The statement goes on to say that the statement made by Demirel at the news conference yesterday aimed at creating the impression that the government did all in its power but that the martial law enforcement failed to be successful. The statement adds: However, the accomplishments of the martial law command are limited in an atmosphere where terror is instigated by the government, the intelligence is either misleading or grossly insufficient, and the police are either rendered impotent or used partially by the government. In spite of this, the martial law has been very successful in dealing with acts of terror that might be transformed into mass clashes. Effectiveness in acts of terror other than those cited above is expected from other state forces.

The statement points out that most of the bills regarding the prevention of terror were prepared and enacted by the RPP government but that the prime minister, not being content with them, wished to enact new laws. The statement, in short, adds: It is clear that his real aim is to possess new authorities that will give him the possibility of more easily and extensively destroying democracy from within. Because both his long-standing mentality and the economic model that he has begun to implement since January are fully incompatible with democracy, Prime Minister Demirel wishes to transform democracy into an empty model. The prime minister's desire is to increase his authority in order to realize the regime of his dreams. If this were not the case he would not have insisted on establishing the state security courts. He would then have lifted his embargo on the bill prepared by the RPP and aimed at rendering more effective civil courts when dealing with cases of terror.

The statement further criticizes the way in which the prime minister's news conference was reported by the TRT yesterday and says: The government occupied the TRT yesterday.

DEMIREL ISSUES DIRECTIVE TO GOVERNORS ON FIGHTING ANARCHY

TA031255 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 3 Aug 80

[Text] Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel has issued a directive in connection with fighting anarchy saying that upon request, governors will have under their command all the public vehicles and state means within the borders of their provinces. Demirel said that this request could not be rejected or postponed for any reason.

According to an announcement by the Prime Ministry Press Adviser's Office, in his directive Demirel pointed out that his government had covered great distances in its merciless struggle against anarchy, terrorism, destructionism and divisionism. He added: The entire state mechanism and public servants must help the security forces in the struggle they are waging with great sacrifices.

An all-out effort will prevent anarchy, terror, destructionism and divisionism on time and will prevent them from spreading as well as their bad consequences. It is obvious that taking the most appropriate measures against the threats and dangers aimed at our state and our political system and aiming the existing means and talents at the target quickly and effectively will increase success in trying to insure our nation's peace and tranquillity. Consequently, it is very important to extend the necessary help to the governors--who are responsible for the public order in their region and who must be the first ones to intervene and take measures during incidents--so that they can act quickly, take countermeasures rapidly and intervene in the incidents with sufficient force.

EXPANDED MARTIAL LAW COORDINATION MEETING ASSESSES INCIDENTS

TA031618 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 3 Aug 80

[Text] The expanded martial law coordination meeting chaired by Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel has ended. The meeting which began at the chief of the general staff's office at 0930 lasted for 8 hours. Those attending the meeting were briefed on incidents that occurred in martial law and other areas during the past 1 and 1/2 months. In addition, a general assessment of the incidents was made.

Measures that must be undertaken and the proposals and requirements of the martial law commanders were also discussed at the meeting. Chief of the General Staff Gen Kenan Evren, various ministers of state, the ministers of justice, national defense, foreign affairs, customs and monopoly, labor, energy and natural resources, national education, youth and sports, the acting interior and finance ministers, commanders of the ground, air and naval forces and the gendarmerie commander attended the meeting chaired by Demirel. The secretary general of the National Security Council, the deputy chief of staff, the under secretary of the National Defense Ministry, the martial law commanders and other officials were also present.

ECEVIT ACCUSES TRT OF PARTIALITY TOWARD DEMIREL

TA021612 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 2 Aug 80

[Excerpts] RPP leader Bulent Ecevit held a news conference today and complained about the TRT. Ecevit said: During the JP minority government this important constitutional institution has become a serious problem in the regime. Ecevit said that the RPP, during its term in the government, had attached great importance to the TRT's impartiality but that the JP was continuously keeping the TRT under psychological pressure.

Ecevit recalled that during the RPP government the JP was constantly and unjustifiably attacking the TRT. He added that the TRT was allocating much time to Prime Minister Demirel but that Demirel was not speaking as a prime minister should but rather as a political party leader by engaging in polemics.

Ecevit later criticized the statement made by Demirel at a news conference today. He said: The government should not use the National Security Council, which also includes the commanders, as a shield in confronting us in a political struggle. This is tantamount to irresponsibility. According to the constitution, the National Security Council is a consultative organ. It can only make recommendations to the government. The deciding and executive organ is the government. Our respondent is the government, not a national security government.

Demirel's Reponse

TA031755 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 3 Aug 80

[Excerpt] Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel has said that RPP leader Bulent Ecevit, in addition to choosing as his target those who struggle against anarchy, destructiveness and secessionism, has now included the TRT among his targets. At a news conference yesterday, Ecevit criticized the TRT broadcasts and said that during the JP minority government this important constitutional institution has become a serious problem in the regime.

Demirel today replied to the statement made by Ecevit regarding the TRT. Demirel said: The RPP leader Ecevit, who turned the TRT--which is supposed to function impartially in accordance with the constitution of the Turkish Republic--into his mouthpiece during his 22-month term of office, is now attacking the TRT. He is complaining that the TRT has become a problem within the system. The reason for his complaint is that his daily statements at news conferences are recorded with the exception of one which was summarized. Now it is clear why Ecevit holds daily news conferences. He is holding them with the aim of using the state radio and television for his propaganda purposes. During his term in office 90 percent of the radio and television time was allocated to himself and his party. The remaining 10 percent was allocated to the JP and other opposition parties. During our government, 40 percent of TRT time is used by himself and his party. The time allocated to Ecevit in the last 8 months is more than the time allocated to me as the prime minister.

Demirel said that, given the situation, Ecevit must have other reasons for accusing the TRT. He said: During 22 months in power, Mr Ecevit used the state radio and television to disrupt the tranquillity in the country and to instigate anarchy. Ecevit, who views as a free democratic system one in which his words and deeds are not subject to debate, cannot tolerate the broadcasting of other views by the state radio and television which he daily occupies.

BELGIAN DEFENSE MINISTER WARNS OF 'INADEQUATE' DEFENSE BUDGET

LD050807 Brussels LE SOIR in French 25 Jul 80 p 2

[Text] The following is the text of the statement made by National Defense Minister Poswick to the house on Wednesday afternoon in reply to the spoken question put by Mrs Banneux (French-Speaking Front):

The Defense Department has in fact suffered a 2.2 percent cut in its 1980 budget plus an additional cut of 90 million Belgian Francs. These cuts come in addition to the refusal to grant the credits requested in installments to cope mainly with the disastrous increases in fuel costs since last year. I will recall these increases: 65 percent for vehicle fuel, 68 percent for aircraft fuel and 138 percent for naval fuel.

The armed forces have been forced to take a series of steps to cope with these reductions. For instance, Belgian participation in almost all allied exercises has been stopped; fighter pilots will have less than 140 hours flying time per year instead of the 180 hours necessary for normal training; most ships are staying in port. There has been a general reduction in the equipment acquisition program.

I actually requested at least a 10-percent increase in the 1981 budget compared with the 1980 budget. This budget scarcely contains the means for meeting unavoidable staff spending. The credits necessary to pay for current programs and required for the armed forces operational activities. [as published]

These activities correspond to the missions given them in the framework of our NATO commitments. This means: Enabling the ground forces to carry out its annual exercise and instruction program, enabling air force fighter pilots to carry out 180 hours flying per year, enabling navy ships to sail an average of 100 days per year.

The 15 percent increase which I should normally request is mainly the result of inflation in military purchases and activities which is running at a higher rate than the cost of living. Military activities are in particular paying dearly for the current rise in fuel costs.

If the budget which I am now requesting for 1981 cannot be honored, the armed forces will not be able to fulfill their missions. I would even say that they are becoming useless since they are not efficient. I refuse to support such a policy.

Indeed in the present period of international tension it is unacceptable to be so negligent of the country's defense effort since this effort alone, within the framework of the alliance, guarantees our security. All our allies, including the small countries, have agreed to increase their defense effort despite the economic problems they are experiencing.

It would be unacceptable for Belgium to refuse to face up to its obligations within an alliance where solidarity is the rule.

As far as I am concerned, I will not support an inadequate defense budget which would not only render our armed forces nonoperational but would undermine our credibility among our allies.

However, I hope that commonsense will triumph and that the vital means will be granted.

SCHMIDT TO MEET GIEREK 19-20 AUGUST IN HAMBURG

LD041444 Hamburg DPA in German 1404 GMT 04 Aug 80

[Excerpts] Bonn--It was unofficially made known in Bonn today that Polish party chief Edward Gierek will meet Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Hamburg on 19 and 20 August for the planned political talks. The talks will center on the further development of European cooperation and questions of disarmament and troop reductions in Europe.

Government Spokesman Armin Gruenewald confirmed only indirectly today to the press that the dates set for the chancellor's meeting with SED chief Erich Honecker are 27-29 August, at the Baltic spa of Dierhagen near Rostock. He pointed out that the official announcement of the date of Schmidt's visit is the business of the host, that is the GDR leadership.

OCCUPIERS OF VENEZUELAN EMBASSY IN BONN LEAVE QUIETLY

LD041156 Hamburg DPA in German 1132 GMT 4 Aug 80

[Summary] (Bonn)--The Bonn police have announced that this morning's occupation of the Venezualan Embassy in Bonn has ended peacefully. The occupiers left the building after a while without the police having to intervene. They had wanted to draw national and international attention to the desperate struggle of the people of El Salvador and had identified themselves as members of the German solidarity movement for El Salvador.

LABOR OFFICIAL REPORTS RISE IN UNEMPLOYMENT

LD050940 Hamburg DPA in German 0847 GMT 5 Aug 80

[Text] Nuremberg, 5 Aug (DPA)--The number of unemployed in the Federal Republic rose by 71,800 in July to 853,200. The president of the Federal Labor Office, Josef Stingl, pointed out when presenting his monthly report in Nuremberg today that it was usual for a rise in unemployment to be registered at this time of year, but added that the increase of around 9 percent was "noticeably" more than usual. The percentage of unemployed has thus risen from 3.4 at the end of June to a present 3.7 percent. Last year's figure was 3.5 percent.

The number of part-time workers increased from mid-June to mid-July by 1,300 to 85,000. The number of job vacancies fell in July by 18,000 to 334,900.

LE MONDE FORESEES 'LIVELY' DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION

LD041509 Paris LE MONDE in French 3-4 Aug 80 p 1

[Editorial: "U.S. Democratic Party's Divisions"]

[Text] It is time that the Senate panel given the job of closely examining Billy Carter's activities reported on all the relevant evidence of which it has demanded communication in full.

Meanwhile guesswork, incomplete revelations, explanations contradicted the next day and indirect retractions reign, and all this relates to someone who is merely a jovial, broke failure, and at present it seems inconceivable that he has been above exerting any influence on U.S. Government policy.

Should the President, the White House and government organs have broken off contacts right from the start with an individual notorious for his foolish behavior which he exaggerates whenever necessary in order to attract attention, thereby exerting a kind of moral blackmail on the U.S. Executive? It would probably have been preferable.

At another time and in other places the matter would have been settled by a lettre de cachet [reference to letter bearing king's seal ordering someone's imprisonment without trial]--a term which cannot be translated into English. However, in the age of aircraft and the television it is impossible to "get rid of" an obstinate troublemaker. Therefore we can assume that the President, being unable to ignore his younger brother, tried to "calm" him down rather than place him in an impossible quarantine. Hence the message he sent him after his first trip to Libya: a telegram expressing satisfaction if not relief from the man in charge at the U.S. Embassy in Tripoli to which Jimmy Carter apparently added a few kind words.

Perhaps that was inappropriate. However, it is difficult to see it as a failure of presidential duty.

Nonetheless in the trough of the summer--and of Mr Carter's wave of popularity--the affair is assuming considerable proportions and placing a suspicion not of corruption but of confusion over the White House. Some 40 Democrats fear for their reelection and are desperately seeking a way of persuading the Democratic convention which opens in New York in a few days' time to choose an alternative candidate to replace Mr Carter.

This maneuver does not seem likely to succeed; not only would it amount to revoking the verdict of the primaries but also to admitting that the candidate for the supreme office, who is at present in the best position, is unworthy of that office. That would be bound to effect the Democratic Party at the electoral level.

Another maneuver has just emerged and deserves attention. After an interview with Senator Kennedy, who took the initiative for the meeting, independent presidential candidate John Anderson stated that if the Democratic convention were to choose a candidate other than Mr Carter, he might possibly stand down. This gives the Massachusetts senator the advantage of being able to say that if he received the convention's nomination, the threat posed by Mr Anderson who could, even in third position, receive some 20 percent of the votes on 4 November--mainly Democratic votes--would be removed. Otherwise some people are hinting that Mr Kennedy could, somehow, side with Mr Anderson.

This agitation and these speculations suggest that the Democratic convention will be a lively one. Will it, however, produce spectacular developments?

Mr.Carter's nomination, which theoretically has been secured with a big majority, will be difficult to dispute. Senator Kennedy would assume a weighty responsibility and would jeopardize his career within the party if he were to fail to go along with the majority vote.

MARCHAIS REMARKS ON MOSCOW OLYMPICS EXAMINED

LD301251 Paris LE MONDE in French 30 Jul 80 p 24

[Text] In an interview shown live from Moscow by French Television 1 on 28 July, Georges Marchais, who watches the Olympic games for 8-9 hours daily, stated: "These are fantastic, extraordinary games. I see here the world's youth--white, black, and yellow--competing in the stadium or swimming pool. The French bourgeoisie likes young people but it likes bleeding young people, that is young people in confrontations and wars to defend its class privileges."

The PCF secretary general believes that the "standard" of the games is "very high" and that the medals won by athletes are no "chocolate medals." In his view, Mr Jimmy Carter launched the boycott campaign because he was afraid of sports competition "with new countries" such as Cuba. "Carter fears such a confrontation. Mr Schmidt has aligned himself with Mr Carter. Giscard would have done the same if it had not been for the French people."

Mr Marchais asserted that he had met with no Soviet political leader in Moscow and that it is sufficient to read the local press to see that "the Soviets support the proposals put forward by Babrak Karmal's Afghan Government which proposes negotiations with a view to resolving the problem. And if negotiations take place, Soviet troops will withdraw from Afghanistan."

According to the PCF secretary general there are "two sorts of journalists. There are those who walk the streets in search of petty events. These people do not interest us. And there are the sports journalists, specialists in the field. And I have been able to note that, in general, commentaries have been very good."

In conclusion, Mr Marchais told a story which he heard from a "reliable friend." It concerns an "American woman who walks about wearing a T-shirt with the inscription 'I am a member of the KGB atnletic club' which is something completely ridiculous. Well, she walks about in her hotel and in the streets and not only the Soviet people but also the French, British and other people who have met her laugh. You can see, therefore, that there is much freedom here."

(LE MONDE note: On 29 July L'HUMANITE published an edited version of Georges Marchais' interview. The PCF daily newspaper was not satisfied with merely tidying up the secretary general's statements. Marchais stated: "The French bourgeoisie likes young people but it likes bleeding young people." The word "bleeding" has been left out. The statement that "there is much freedom here" has been left out.

Marchais made a distinction between "two sorts of journalists... Those who walk the streets in search of petty events" and "sports journalists, specialists in the field." In the L'HUMANITE version, there are no longer any journalists "who walk the streets.")

L'HUMANITE RESPONSE

LD041315 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 31 Jul 80 p 3

[Text] According to usual practice the interview granted by the PCF secretary general to French Television Channel 1 from Moscow on 28 July was subjected to editing by one of Georges Marchais' associates with a view to publication in L'HUMANITE. [paragraph continues]

Overstepping its technical objective--obviously unintentionally and without any political intention--this editing led to some alterations which have given rise to interpretations. To remedy this mistake and put an end to the accusations the Central Committee Secretariat and L'HUMANITE's editorial board, which had not been consulted in this case, are anxious to publish the full text of the passages concerned as they were heard and rightly understood by millions of television viewers.

Georges Marchais stated in particular:

"I think, Patrice Duhamel [television interviewer], that there are two kinds of journalists in Moscow. There are those who walk the streets looking for minor incidents, and they do not interest us. And there are the sports journalists, the experts in the field. Moreover I have the opportunity to read the press and see that the commentaries are on the whole very good from the sports viewpoint. For instance when you see a man like Salnikov breaking the 15-minute barrier for 1,500 meters, it is a historic event, as a French sports newspaper wrote. The aim was to swim 1,500 meters in less than 15 minutes. There was a barrier to be broken and it was broken by a Soviet athlete.

"Patrice Duhamel: If some French athletes were to demonstrate their concern at human rights violations in the Soviet Union in the next few days, as some of them have said they will--this is only a hypothesis--what would you say?

"Georges Marchais: If that happened then I would express my view afterward. At present I...you know, I have been told that people here can do what they like, I have not seen this for myself but I have been told by a responsible friend. It seems that there is an American woman walking around with a T-shirt on which she has printed 'I am a member of the KGB athletic club,' which is absolutely ridiculous; she walks around in her hotel and in the streets and not only the Soviets but the French, British and all the others who have seen her find it very funny. Therefore, you see, there is a great deal of freedom here.

"These games are fantastic, extraordinary, because here I see the young people of the world, white, black, and yellow competing in the stadium or in the swimming pool. The French bourgeoisie likes young people, but it likes young people bleeding, in other words in confrontations and wars to defend its class privileges. I, however, like young people in stadiums, young people who want to live, who want to learn, to have a profession, a job and to play sports. I am with those young people and you cannot imagine how happy I am."

COSSIGA COMMENTS IN SENATE ON BOLOGNA MASSACRE, TERRORISM

AU042010 Rome ANSA in English 1940 GMT 4 Aug 80

[Excerpts] Rome, 4 Aug (ANSA)--Italian Prime Minister Francesco Cossiga implicitly indicated here today that he sees the bomb massacre at Bologna's central station Staturday morning as the work of extreme rightwing terrorists. "The matrix of the horrible massacre of Bologna is now clear", he said in his opening address in the Senate debate on the blast that killed 76 and left about 200 injured. The aberrant logic of extermination that determined (the massacre) calls to mind in Italians the episodes and tragedies caused by the barbarity of the Nazis and the Fascists," he said. But the prime minister also refused to rule out the possibility of international connections among the terrorists responsible for the attack. No possibility can be ruled out, he said, adding the government's commitment to find the authors and to "give the Italian people the security it demands for its right to live and work in peace".

Meanwhile, workers up and down the country struck for two hours--four in the Emilia-Romagna region of which Bologna is capital--and held thousands of factory assemblies, marches and rallies to protest against the massacre. In Bologna itself, which was also marking the sixth anniversary of another extreme rightist bomb attack, the Italicus express massacre on August 4, 1974, there was rally of more than sixty thousand in a downtown square.

On Saturday morning, just a couple of hours before the bomb went off in Bologna station's second-class waiting room, the Bologna magistrates indicted neofascist Mario Tutti as the brain behind the Italicius bombing in which twelve died and fifty were injured. There have also been telephone messages from the neofascist Revolutionary Armed Nuclei (NAR) claiming responsibility for the attack, but self-styled spokesmen for this terrorist group have subsequently denied the claim. But, as the magistrate in charge of the enquiries Luigi Persico stressed this morning, no avenue is being neglected in an attempt to track down the terrorists. In an opaque and prudent reference apparently directed at the extreme right, Persico added that "one cannot forego a careful consideration of analogies and links which it would be deplorable to neglect". According to Persico, the characteristics of the attack--the link with Tutti's indictment and the typical neofascist policy of hitting blindly in the bunch--make it increasingly likely that the authors were extreme rightwingers.

Meanwhile, a message from the NAR telephoned to the Turin daily, LA STAMPA, warned that the group was planning new terrorist attacks in Milan or Florence and, once again, claimed responsibility for the Bologna massacre. A similar call was made to a Milanese publishing house. In both cases, the message, apparently recorded, voiced support for Tutti and announced a communique. But, later in the day, the Rome daily, IL MESSAGGERO, received yet another anonymous phone-call from another self-styled spokesman for the NAR denying the claims in the previous communications.

In other points, Cossiga told the Senate--the lower house has already started its summer recess--that the battle against terrorism was one of his government's priorities. This was a "choice dictated by the political and constitutional orientation of democratic solidarity which involves the political and social forces over and beyond their parliamentary position," he said. He also summed up the results of the battle against rightwing terrorism since 1976--2,336 extreme rightwingers arrested, 154 waiting for trial in jail, 463 on provisional liberty, 78 serving sentences and fifty sought by the police. Senate Speaker Amintore Fanfani said that the "first and most important problem remains the defense of public order as a contribution to the defense of democracy and a testimony of respect for the life of the country's citizens". In other points, Fanfani urged that there should be moves in a "more productive way in order to repair past inadequacies and face up to persistent or even bigger dangers."

IRANIAN DEMONSTRATORS BATTLE OUTSIDE U.S. EMBASSY

LD041843 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1811 GMT 4 Aug 80

[Text] Iranian demonstrators fought a pitched battle with police outside the American Embassy in London's Grosvenor Square tonight.

A total of 20 youths were arrested in the heated scuffles and several demonstrators and police suffered minor injuries.

About 150 police were guarding the embassy as the placard-carrying demonstrators protested about the arrest of Iranians in the United States.

Suddenly, shortly after 6 pm, a group of demonstrators organised a concerted charge on the police line, according to a senior officer at the scene.

The police prevented them reaching the building, but in the heated exchanges which lasted about five minutes, the arrests were made.

"It was quite a struggle and for a few minutes the police line was under considerable strain," said the senior officer.

"The demonstrators were very agitated and were putting everything into their attack. There were a good few bruises on both sides."

One demonstrator, carrying a placard reading "Free our sisters and brothers in U.S." said: "The police are preventing us making protest.

"We want to deliver our protest to the embassy itself. Our argument is not with the British police."

Twenty of the estimated 150 demonstrators were girls, their heads covered.

Police tonight were keeping the demonstrators in a line opposite the embassy and other officers were positioned on the steps of the building as an added precaution.

SOVIET WARSHIP EXPECTED IN ENGLISH CHANNEL

LD041433 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 4 Aug 80 p 1

[Text] Leningrad, the Russian helicopters cruiser is expected to sail through the English Channel from the North Sea to the Atlantic today. It is extremely unusual for a Soviet warship of any size to use the channel.

The Leningrad, which is 200 yards long, carries 12 anti-submarine helicopters which can be deployed over a wide area. Together with her sister ship, the Moskva, the Leningrad was built to counter the Polaris submarines.

Frigate Escort

LD051135 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 5 Aug 80 p 5

[Text] A Royal Navy frigate Tartar, 2,300 tons, has been sent to shadow the biggest Russian warship to venture down the English Channel. The helicopter-carrier Leningrad, 14,500 tons, normally based in the Black Sea, is believed to be returning there with an escort destroyer and a tanker after exercises in the Baltic. Tartar will escort the Soviet ships as far as the Atlantic where a French warship is expected to take over.

KKE'S FLORAKIS ON PROSPECTS FOR CHANGE, ELECTORAL GOALS

ATO31709 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 3 Aug 80 p 3

[Interview with KKE (Exterior) Secretary General Kharilaos Florakis by unidentified reporter--date, place not given]

[Text] Question: Comrade Florakis, a resolution by the Central Committee plenum has caused a sensation not only among communists and leftists but among broader democratic circles. We would like to discuss with you some of the points which have generated most of the discussion and questions.

The Central Committee plenum has made the assessment that it is time for a democratic turn in the life of the country. In what sense was this said?

Answer: We must not forget that at our 10th party congress we made it clear that there are objective prerequisites in our country, not merely for a democratic turn but for radical change, for an anti-imperialist, antimonopolist democracy of the people and for socialism. The reason this goal of revolutionary change has not been put on the agenda is because subjective prerequisites have not been created to a corresponding extent.

We have currently ascertained, however, that certain objective and subjective prerequisites have been achieved so that the removal of government power from the right and a change in policy and the implementation of a differnt policy can be put forth as an immediate, achievable goal. It is not accidental that everyone is currently speaking about change. What they mean by it and what kind of change they want is something else again. First there is the bankruptcy of the New Democracy policy and the exacerbation of all problems of the country and the people. The right cannot provide prospects for their solution. Not only can't it offer anything positive to the people, not only it is trying to take away what the people have won through struggle, but its retention of power in the next few years would entail inestimable "cost" at the expense of the national independence, life and freedom of the working people.

The overwhelming majority of people understand this, even a large number of those people who voted for New Democracy. The New Democracy government has been a minority government but now it has become even more so.... Nobody can dispute the fact that the democratic forces of the opposition can presently remove the parliamentary majority from the right, something which does not mean, of course, automatically removing it from power. Characteristically, U.S. senators' reports and very often Western press reports stress that the bases and NATO issues must be solved before the Greek elections, precisely because they do not rule out the possibility that the right may lose; therefore, they are hastening to create--as they think--faits accomplis.

However, we are not only experiencing an electoral change against New Democracy but also a significant rise in the organized mass movement. Great prerequisites also exist for a more decisive development of the movement.

But what should we pay attention to when we say that the removal of government power from the right is immediately possible? By no means should we think that this will happen automatically, like the rotten apple which falls from the tree. It will neither be inevitable nor easy, and no one can claim that everything is ready and that nothing should be added. We have made it categorically clear that one deludes himself by believing that it is enough to vote democratically and that everything will be all right.

[paragraph continues]

We neither underestimate difficulties nor do we forget the level of the popular movement and the political alliances on the basis of which the issue of democratic change is currently being put forth. However, it would be political naivete, even defection, for one to postpone that which is or is becoming ripe, passively waiting for the creation of ideal conditions that will make change a sure and simple round of triumph.

We do underestimate the possibilities of the people's movement. At present--when the majority of people want democratic change--will struggle to turn this will into reality so that the means of democratic change, that is, the common action of the democratic forces, the organized mass popular movement and the decisive strengthening of the force and role of the KKE can be guaranteed.

Electoral Goals

Question: Our party has demanded the immediate holding of elections with the simple proportional system. At the same time it has set forth participation in the second distribution of votes as its goal--something that, under current electoral law, means winning 17 percent of the votes. What criteria did the Central Committee use to set this percentage and not a higher or lower one?

Answer: It must be made clear from the outset that 17 percent is not used as an expression of the party's current electoral power or as a percentage which we draw from statistical studies. The true force and influence of the KKE never coincides with the electoral force under capitalist conditions (due to the oppression of the masses, electoral education and law, and the conditions and methods of holding elections). Electoral numbers never express the true power of the KKE. How close these numbers reflect reality depends first on the way and method in which elections are held. And we have a great deal of experience from elections of the "Greek type." It is enough to recall the 9.4 percent of 1946 and the elections of 1961. We are not referring only to instances of falsification and open terrorism, but to other methods used to influence or obstruct the expression of true popular will. It also depends on the party's work and struggle to limit as much as possible the consequences of these methods of the ruling class and to reduce the gap between the party's electoral and true power.

The fact that we mention 17 percent and not 20 or, if you like, 15 percent, is because 17 percent is the borderline point which will allow the Communist Party to benefit from the second distribution. Currently the KKE is the only party that can contest this since it is third in strength. If the KKE benefits from the second distribution New Democracy will be denied the lion's share from the premium it will receive in the second distribution because of the larcenous electoral law. In the case, New Democracy will have fewer deputies and the forces of the democratic opposition as a whole will more surely guarantee a parliamentary majority.

Therefore, the inclusion of the KKE in the second distribution is the sure way to remove the parliamentary majority and government power from the right and guarantee the implementation of a different policy. Thus, the inclusion of the KKE in the second distribution is an issue which concerns not only its specific electoral influence but, in general terms, all those people who are interested in ousting the right. Consequently, it is a realistic goal.

The 17 percent, however, is realistic from the viewpoint of our party's true influence. In our country, the communist, generally the leftist movement has a great tradition. It has taken root among the people and in critical times for our country and people a significant part of the populace has rallied around it, even the majority of people. It has a much greater brilliance than that expressed in elections, a brilliance which constantly increases as our party is acknowledged in the conscience of the working people as an irreplaceable force for the defense of their interests.

Thus the slogan for the inclusion of the party in the second distribution expresses to the people the need for decisive strengthening of the KKE which constitutes a guarantee for change and helps them confront every kind of false dilemma or the well-known theories on lost votes.

The issue, therefore, is not to limit communists to general discussions about whether or not we shall be able to achieve the 17 percent or surpass it, but to approach the people and prove to them that by including the KKE in the second distribution the electoral defeat of the right will become more certain. The communists must also explain the irreplaceable role of the KKE in the struggle for change.

Question: Comrade Florakis, from where shall we draw this increase in our electoral strength?

Answer: I told you before. We shall draw it from all those people who currently want the right to be ousted and who understand that their vote for the KKE is the most decisive and sure blow against it, from all those people who have no delusions, who have learned from the past and who do not want a new 1963.

Naturally we look specifically to the fighters of the left and of progress, old and new. We look to those people who fought in the ranks of EAM [National Liberation Front], EDA [United Democratic Left], the Democratic Youth of Lambrakis, the antidictatorial resistance and the generation of the polytechnic school. We look to all those people who want a strong and unified left and, more generally, want the unity of the forces for change which the KKE consistently promotes.

"Self-Contained" Government

Question: What do we mean when we say that the removal of the parliamentary majority from the right, even the formation of a democratic government, do not automatically mean the removal of power from the right?

Answer: Let us try to imagine the Monday after the elections. Will anything substantive have changed in the forces and mechanisms of power except for the fact that the people's majority has opposed the right?

Even if the formation of a democratic government becomes possible, the right--more generally, the ruling class--will control key positions and "compartments" in the state machine.

The monopolies will still occupy dominant positions in the economy while the imperialists will still have significant possibilities for influencing economic and political life. The ruling class will still control the real power, its removal will require tough, complex struggles and confrontations between the forces of oligarchy--the right--and the anti-imperialist-democratic forces.

Naturally the right will not surrender its power to the democratic forces. It will do everything it can to restrict the true powers of the democratic government and render it impotent in order to force it into unacceptable compromises or in order to topple it when it considers that action expedient and possible.

Therefore, where will a democratic government find the strength; upon what will it rely in order to expand its control over the state machine, gather real power and implement its program?

It will either rely on the popular movement, on cooperation among anti-imperialist forces--specifically on the KKE--in order to guarantee an increasingly beneficial correlation of forces, or finally it will succumb to the pressures and undermining of the ruling class. There can be no middle-of-the-road between these two choices, one cannot be equidistant between the popular movement and the ruling class.

Cooperation or Elections

Question: Nevertheless, certain forces have reservations about cooperation. In fact they speak about the "independent" implementation of their program. How can such a "self-contained" government be produced--a government which some people proposed as an "intermediate step?"

Answer: First, in view of the correlations that are being formed it is impossible for a party to win by itself an "independent" majority. However, we believe that even if this were possible, one party would not be able to bring about change without cooperating with all the other forces which are striving for the same purpose. It is a dangerous delusion for a party to believe that it can lead the country to change with an alleged 37-38 percent which, on the basis of the larcenous electoral law, can become a parliamentary majority. Even if it had good intentions, an independent government would be powerless to confront the ruling class and one way or another it would be compelled to play the game of interchanging governments. As a last resort it might enhance somewhat the current regime while, in fact, it would become the administrator of the power of the right, especially in the current difficult conditions of the capitalist economic crisis. Perhaps it would only be a temporary pause so that the right will be able to return to the government after the independent government has created better prerequisites for it. Therefore, instead of being an intermediate step toward true change, such a government could close the road to it, regardless of its intentions.

So we ask: Why do some democratic forces want to go it alone and not cooperate with the other forces, something that would provide the implementation of their program with more certainty and fewer sacrifices? Should we believe that they are doing so merely out of selfishness? And that with such a motiviation they are prepared to sacrifice even the cause of democratic change? We, however, do not believe that we can interpret political phenomena through psychological suppositions. The undaunted persistence of certain forces in rejecting common action can only be explained logically if one assumes that they intend to renege on their declarations. Naturally there is another possible explanation: To put forth a utopian slogan of "independence"--which harms the movement--for election campaign reasons, that is, in order to filch away the votes of other parties of the Democratic opposition.

Stance of the Right

Question: Comrade Florakis, we believe that, given the current facts, no party can win an independent majority. Consequently, the formation of a truly democratic government requires the cooperation of democratic forces inside the new parliament. Nevertheless, certain circles are talking about the possibility of the main opposition party, instead of cooperating, asking for new elections in order to guarantee an independent majority.

Answer: Why should it want new elections since, on the basis of the correlation of forces inside the new parliament, the necessary parliamentary majority for the formation of a democratic government would be guaranteed? What would be the meaning of such an act? Would it want to rid itself of necessary alliances with other democratic forces so as to finally turn them into opponents instead of allies?

We believe that the problems of the people and the country are not solved by proceeding from one election to another. Furthermore, who could guarantee that that party would win an independent majority in the second election? Such tactics could yield entirely opposite results, not only because the other democratic forces would not remain with their hands tied against all efforts to forcefully extract their votes, but also because a significant part of that party's followers who are more radical would have serious doubts, perhaps suspicions, about such tactics. They would not be able to understand why, although a democratic parliamentary majority exists and a democratic government could be formed, their party prefers the adventure of new elections. Many would think that either that party does not want to cooperate with the communists so that it can pass the ruling class' good behavior examination or that it wants "to have its hands free," perhaps so that it can renege on its program. Naturally we sometimes say that only if a government is independent can it be strong enough to implement its program. I have already explained why such a government cannot bring about change; nor can a government which relies on the electoral percentage of a party be strong. A government can be strong against the right, against the ruling class, only if it relies on all the anti-imperialist democratic forces and the organized mass movement. Let us not forget the experiences of 1963-67. Then, too, G. Papandreou refused to cooperate with the left and resorted to new elections in order to elect an independent, strong government. We saw, however, how strong it was and where the government which was not merely "independent" but had 53 percent ended up....

Need for Cooperation

Question: At this point, however, the argument is made that the right would not allow the existence of a government which would rely on communists or in which communists would participate....

Answer: You are right. This argument is being put forth by many people. It is being put forth by reaction which wants to isolate the KKE, by some who want to cover up their hegemonism; but many democrats also believe it in good faith. However, would it not be at the least naive for those people who want true change to ask permission from the right to promote this change? Have those people who put forth or believe in such positions ever asked why the right does not accept communists? The thing that annoys the right is not the name "communist," but the communist program which impinges on the interests of the ruling class, communist militancy and their consistency in implementing the things they declare. The right knows it: The KKE has never accepted any of the plans of the ruling class. If the other democratic forces which have declared goals of change want to implement them, then let them have no delusions. The right will deal with them just like the communists. This is confirmed by international and Greek experience. Did they not label as communists sympathizers all those who merely supported reforms of a democratic nature? Therefore, why not struggle all together in order to effectively repulse the attacks of the right and implement our common program?

Question: Comrade Florakis, we believe that, from the analysis we are making, we can conclude that--at least for now--there can be no change without the cooperation of democratic forces....

Answer: Certainly at this moment, with the current grouping of forces, it would be impossible to have change without cooperation. However, the removal of the right from power and democratic change are the people's objective needs and desires. No leadership, no party can, except temporarily, arrest this necessary democratic development. Our people will judge every party by its deeds, take the cause of unification for change into account and find the means to guarantee true change. Inevitably, therefore, there will be serious regroupings among political forces and such changes in the correlation of forces among democratic forces that will make possible the advancement of common action by anti-imperialist forces in ways and in a program that will correspond to the need for change. In other words, nobody can stop life....

What Will the Ruling Class Do?

Question: A problem that occupies all democrats and patriots concerns the kinds of undermining activities of the right--more generally, of the ruling class--and whether the popular movement can deal with them.

Answer: The only sure thing is that, in any case, the ruling class, the imperialists, the right, will try to foil changes which impinge upon their basic interests. We must also clearly see that they will not hesitate to resort even to the most extreme activities provided, naturally, that the correlation of forces allows this. We do not mean that the ruling class' interventions against a democratic government will automatically acquire the character of the well-known military coup. Nobody can define from the outset the specific forms, the means and the extent of such activities. Certainly they will try to use the intervention of the president of the republic, their dynamic support of power (the army, the security corps), extreme rightist mechanisms, the economic strength of the monopolies, the economic and political pressures of the imperialists, and so forth.

These interventions may be in the form of coordinated pressure on the democratic government and on vaccillating forces which will be ready to compromise within the democratic area so as to force them into a more general compromise. They could also acquire a more aggressive character, aiming at the collapse of the democratic government within the constitutional framework or even outside the constitution through an open antidemocratic diversion of one form or another. What will happen--the details, ways and results--does not depend only on the will but also on the strength of the anti-imperialist movement, the steadfastness of the democratic government in its policy, the readiness and common action of the democratic forces, popular vigilance, democratic enlightenment for patriotic officers and the enlisted children of our people, international conditions, and so forth.

We believe, therefore, that if all these prerequisites are advanced it will be possible to disorganize all kinds of undermining activities by reaction and find suitable ways out of all possible difficulties. We must explain this to the people so that they will not be influenced by the disorienting, terrorizing dangermongering of the ruling class.

I would like to stress one more serious point regarding this issue. A democratic government will have to deal with serious economic difficulties due to the current deep economic crisis and the consequences of the policies of the governments of the right. It is also certain that a democratic government will not be able from one day to the next to deal with all the aggravated problems of the people and country. Reaction will certainly try to utilize these difficulties in order to disorganize economic life or to disappoint or turn against the democratic government a part of the popular masses, especially the middle class. This is one more reason why cooperation among democratic forces is necessary: So that we may lay a strong foundation for popular unity, enlighten the people on the problems of change and isolate reactionary forces.

In any case, we must stress that our people can struggle decisively against the right and can understand the difficulties only if they see that changes which serve their own and the country's interests are being promoted in practical terms.

Duties of the Communists

Question: On the basis of the prospects which the Central Committee plenum has defined, what are the duties of communists?

Answer: Currently we must orient ourselves even more toward popular struggles and approach the masses of working people, of all democrats, to a greater extent. We must explain how New Democracy can be defeated electorally and how it will be possible to remove the right from power, and prove why decisive strengthening of the KKE and, specifically, why the inclusion of the KKE in the second distribution is one of the prerequisites for democratic change. The members and followers of our party must clearly understand that they will be tested by the people in the battle for change. To respond to the people's expectations we must improve our actions with even greater enthusiasm, militacy and thought; we must overcome weaknesses and deficiencies. Undoubtedly we have taken several steps since the 10th congress. However, we still have not reached what we want, what we can, and what life demands. Without underestimating difficulties, taking it easy or having a routine mentality we must all together, and separately, undertake our share of the responsibility in order to have the KKE, and more generally the popular movement, meet the growing demand for democratic change. There are prerequisites for this, there is a will. How can we not be optimistic?

FINANCE MINISTER SEZGIN LEAVES FOR YUGOSLAVIA

TA031059 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 3 Aug 80

[Text] Finance Minister Ismet Sezgin went to Yugoslavia today for an official visit. In a statement to the TRT at Istanbul's Yesilkoy Airport before his departure, Sezgin said that during his visit he would discuss cooperation between the two countries in the fields of economy, finance, industry, energy, transportation, trade and technology. He said that at the end of his contacts easier conditions would probably be granted mutually in connection with highway transit transportation and other transit procedures. Sezgin pointed out that during the talks they will also discuss the development of joint projects in the fields of communications, maritime lines and ship construction. He expressed the belief that the trade volume between Turkey and Yugoslavia would be diversified. Sezgin and his delegation will return to Turkey on 7 August.

ERKMEN ISSUES HELSINKI DOCUMENT ANNIVERSARY MESSAGE

TA011151 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 1 Aug 80

[Text] Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen has said that the main goal of Turkish foreign policy consists of developing relations based on mutual respect, trust and cooperation with all countries in the world, and primarily with neighboring countries.

Today Erkmen issued a message on the fifth anniversary of the signing in Helsinki of the final document of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. In his message, Erkmen said that European detente cannot be separated from the tensions and crises in other regions of the world. Pointing out that, in an atmosphere where international crises are prevelant, action which would endanger world peace and security and which would adversely affect mutual trust should be avoided, Erkmen asked that the work on disarmament and on arms limitation be accelerated and rendered more effective in a bid to achieve a lasting and comprehensive detente.

In conclusion, Erkmen noted that the European Security and Cooperation Conference--which constitutes an important element of the policy of detente--has made valuable contributions to efforts to strengthen security and increase the cooperation in Europe and thus create a more lasting atmosphere of peace in the entire world. The final document of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe was signed in Helsinki on 1 August 1975 in a bid to take the measures which will contribute to the creation of a more lasting atmosphere of peace and security in Europe and in the whole world. The Helsinki final document was signed by the presidents or prime ministers of 35 European countries, except Albania, as well as the United States and Canada.

JORDAN'S KING HUSAYN ENDS UNOFFICIAL VISIT

AU051111 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 5 Aug 80 p 2

[Summary] Jordanian King Husayn and Queen Nur ended their unofficial visit to Austria on Sunday afternoon, 3 August. The guests were seen off by Wilhelm Korab, deputy director of the office of the Austrian president. The king and the queen had arrived in Austria on Thursday, 31 July, and on the same day King Husayn had a long talk with Chancellor Bruno Kreisky. On Friday the king and queen visited President Kirchschlaeger at his official summer residence in Muerzsteg. Saturday and Sunday Husayn and Queen Nur stayed privately in Vienna. Among other things, they inspected the villa which the king recently bought in the Austrian capital.

PRESS NOTES MORE PROTESTS AGAINST CHILE ARMS DEAL

AU051238 [Editorial Report] Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German on 5 August carries a 700-word report headlined "Austrian Socialist Party [SPOe] Parliamentary Floor Leader Heinz Fischer Also Demands: No Arms Exports to Chile." The paper quotes Fischer as comparing arms deliveries to Chile with arms deliveries to Franco's Spain in the past, objectionable both on principle and from a moral viewpoint. According to the paper, Fischer rejected the argument that the Austrian arms industry needs exports, including those to Chile, as "not convincing" and stressed that there must be a difference between [SPOe-governed Austria and other countries, such as Tory-governed Great Britain, regarding the attitude to such arms exports.

In the same story, ARBEITER-ZEITUNG notes that "Christians and Socialists Against Armament" action committee has been spontaneously formed by members and functionaries of the Austrian Catholic education seminar, the Upper Austrian "Karl Renner Institute," the Catholic Workers Youth, the Socialist Youth and the Trade Union Youth. According to the paper, several organizations including the Chile Solidarity Front, the Critical Christianity League, the Salzburg Latin America Committee, the Austrian Peace Council and the Catholic Workers Youth plan to organize a protest march to the Chancellery on 12 August 1980 at 1700.

The Vienna VOLKSSTIMME in German on 5 August carries on pages 1 and 2 a 700-word report on this planned protest demonstration and other protests against the pending arms deal with Chile. According to the paper the appeal issued by the organizers of the demonstration, which demands that the Austrian Government bans the export transaction planned by the Steyr Corporation at the cabinet meeting on 12 August, is also supported by the Austrian Communist Youth and the Communist Students Association and many other organizations. The paper also notes a press statement by the "Christians and Socialists Against Armament" committee urging the government not to permit any arms deliveries to the Chilean military regime and to secure the establishment and promotion of nonmilitary production jobs at the companies concerned, among other things "in the interest of a credible Austrian peace policy."

GENSCHER SETS OUT FRG POSITION ON MADRID CSCE

LD051308 Hamburg DPA in German 1117 GMT 5 Aug 80

[Excerpts] Bonn, 5 Aug (DPA)--The CDU/CSU today urged the Federal Government to insist at the CSCE followup conference in Madrid on 11 November that the implementation of human rights, which is the yardstick of real detente, remains at the center of the consultations.

Also today the official government bulletin published a statement made by Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher last week to mark the 5th anniversary of the signing of the Helsinki Final Act. In it Genscher stressed that in Madrid the FRG will insist on all three baskets of the Final Act being "taken equally into account" when they are reviewed. The subjects of human rights and Afghanistan will not be passed over. "Particular importance" will be attached to a detailed discussion of the military aspects of security, "although this discussion must not affect the balance between the various parts of the Final Act."

Genscher stressed in his statement that a further development of militarily important and verifiable confidence-building measures is needed in view of the experience of the critical past months. But they will only make sense if they also encompass "the entire European part of the Soviet Union." Here Bonn supports the French proposal to decide in Madrid in favor of a specifically defined mandate being laid down at a conference on disarmament in Europe devoted to confidence-building measures.

CDU Deputy Alois Mertes said that the opposition approves in principle the plan for a European disarmament conference, on the condition that the Vienna force reduction talks are not undermined by such a conference.

LAMBSDORFF FORESEES NUCLEAR ENERGY COOPERATION WITH USSR

LD051628 Hamburg DPA in German 1528 GMT 5 Aug 80

[Text] Bonn--Federal Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff considers cooperation between the Federal Republic and the Soviet Union in the nuclear energy field to be a real possibility. In an interview with the magazine SOVIET UNION TODAY, published in Cologne by the Soviet Embassy, Lambsdorff said that cooperation between the two countries in the energy field is especially promising. "This does not have to be confined to the delivery of fuels, but can also include the utilization of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes or the production of electricity," Lambsdorff said. He considers it to be advantageous if economic cooperation is based on long-term projections. Lambsdorff also said that trade between the two countries could double by 1985.

PAPERS COMMENT ON CARTER PRESS CONFERENCE

DW060914 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 6 Aug 80

[Press review]

[Text] STUTTGARTER NACHRICHTEN makes the following comment: What Carter managed to perform with his statement on the Libyan affair of his brother Billy surely is not a masterpiece, yet it is a journeyman's feat in television advertising. Carter thereby has largely extricated himself from the snares of Billygate and probably has cleared the road for himself toward his nomination as presidential candidate at the forthcoming Democratic convention in New York.

Granted, his political opponents--including those in his party's own ranks--continue to claim that the verbose statement excels by dodging the ticklish problems. Yet Carter succeeded in presenting himself to his countrymen on the television screen as an honest man who has nothing to hide.

WESTDEUTSCHE ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG, which is published in Essen, writes: Anyone reading the voluminous documentation of the White House on the Billy Carter case and listening to the President giving answers for an hour to questions concerning the latest U.S. scandal, will realize that there is no such thing as another Watergate. Now and then Jimmy Carter had been ill advised in his dealings with his younger brother. But he did not initiate any systematic campaign to undermine justice.

The editorial of PASSAUER NEUE PRESSE says in part: Remembering the Watergate crime under wretched former President Nixon the Americans already talk about a Billygate affair. Carter's advisers did not plan any crimes as the Nixon gang planned the burglary of the Watergate headquarters of the Democratic Party, to be sure, yet the initial hushup of the fact that Carter's brother had engaged in the dubious deal with Libya did shake the credibility of the President.

BERLINER MORGENPOST wonders: Is Jimmy Carter past the Billy affair now that he explained himself publicly for the first time? Definitely not. The affairs of his brother, into which he had been dragged through his own fault, will haunt him until election day in November and possibly even beyond that day. The Senate investigating committee alone will see to it, since it surely still holds in store many a bit of entertainment, last but not least the appearance of Billy Carter, which is anticipated with suspense. The press conference had one result in any event: It allowed the President to put the proportions into proper perspective. Billy's affairs, his Libyan adventures, did not stand any comparison with the Watergate scandal which spelled doom for President Nixon in 1974. There is to this day not a trace anywhere of any legally tangible violation of law by the White House.

EXPERT DOUBTS VERACITY OF SOVIET TROOP PULLOUT FROM GDR

DW051154 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 5 Aug 80 p 8

[Commentary signed Ein.: "Play With Figures"]

[Text] Numbers are above all an element of strategy in the Red Army. Stalin's question as to how many divisions the pope had was foolish indeed. Yet it is a hint at the significance which the Soviets have always attached to numerical superiority. This is why maximum skepticism is indicated vis-a-vis the contention that they have now reduced their troops in the GDR. It is more appropriate to say that they have reorganized their divisions. The armored battalions have been given 10 tanks more. The mechanized divisions have been reinforced by triple the number of armored personnel carriers. The artillery has been converted to armored self-propelled guns. Such changes cause motion in the rank and file as a result of the shift of the crews back and forth and the exchange of tanks. Then components can be officially sent away which had been taken home earlier--in strict secrecy. Since the internal restructuring applies not only to the units of the Soviet Armed Forces in Germany the conclusion is permissible that what has allegedly been withdrawn has been assigned to the Soviet divisions stationed in Czechoslovakia and Hungary. This, at any rate, is how the Americans interpret the Soviet initiative.

FRG COMPANY TO BUILD CONTAINER PLANT IN PRC

LD051220 Hamburg DPA in German 1007 GMT 5 Aug 80

[Text] Hamburg, 5 Aug (DPA)--The Hamburg engineering company Habateo-Sellhorn is to build a container works in the People's Republic of China.

Explaining the project in Hamburg today the managing director of the Contrans container company, Axel Koening, said that it was worth a total of DM170 million. Under the terms of the contract with the Chinese company Shanghai Shipyard the works, which will produce containers using the manufacturing techniques of the Graaff company in Elze, will start production in 1981. At first the materials will be supplied from the Federal Republic. All the 30,000 containers produced in the 5-year term of the contract will be taken by Contrans. Koenig said that part of the reason for the involvement in China was the expected growth in container traffic with China and the Far East. It makes sense to manufacture the containers where the demand will be, Koenig said.

POLL SHOWS SCHMIDT POPULARITY CONTINUING

DW060640 [Editorial Report] Mainz ZDF Television Network in German at 2030 GMT on 4 August 1980 presents its periodical survey of public opinion to illustrate what the showing of the individual parties and their top candidates would be if Bundestag elections were held now. Program moderator Horst Schaettle points out on the basis of diagrams that by now, 78 percent of the people eligible to vote "are sure" what their vote will be whereas the remaining 22 percent are "not yet sure." Among the citizens supporting the SPD, Schaettle demonstrates, as many as 90 percent intend to cast their votes for the SPD. The remaining 10 percent are not yet sure whether they will. The corresponding picture for the CDU/CSU, Schaettle says, is 87:13 percent. Of the potential FDP voters 76 percent have already made up their minds to vote for the FDP, with as much as 33 percent not yet being sure how they will decide. Schaettle in this connection comments that "these figures make it clear that all parties still must do quite a bit to really persuade the voters supporting them to cast their votes in their favor. This is particularly true for the FDP," he maintains.

Presenting a picture of the current popularity ratings of the individual parties and their top candidates among their respective constituencies, Schaettle shows a diagram based on a "thermometer" scale ranging from plus 5 to -5, the ratings being as follows:

"CDU/CSU voters: CDU: 3.6 (6 months ago: 3.6); CSU: 2.8 (6 months ago: 3.0). Chancellor candidate Strauss: 2.8 (February rating: 3.0).

"FDP voters: Today: 3.6 (February: 3.6); Genscher: 3.3 (February: 3.4).

"SPD voters: Today: 3.8 (February: 4.0); Chancellor Schmidt: 4.4 (February: 4.3)."

DUESSELDORF PROSECUTOR EXAMINING IRREGULAR ARMS EXPORTS

LD051522 Hamburg DPA in German 1458 GMT 5 Aug 80

[Summary] Duesseldorf, 5 Aug (DPA)--The Federal Economics Ministry has not issued export licences for arms exports to South Africa, Saudi Arabia and Argentina. This was stated by the ministry today in connection with the affair which came to light after arms manufactured in the Federal Republic appeared in these countries. According to the ministry it is possible that these exports took place with licences for exports to Paraguay, Italy and Spain. The arms all come from Rheinmetall, Duesseldorf; all arms exports are accompanied by a written declaration that the arms will remain in the country of destination. Rheinmetall confirmed today that the Duesseldorf prosecutor's office had started an investigation concerning the exports of arms, and that "Rheinmetall was involved in this." A statement by Rheinmetall notes that the exports took place within the framework of regulations. The open question is how much Rheinmetall was aware of the final destination of the consignments, or whether carelessness made it possible for the arms to be sent to areas of tension.

ATHLETES ISSUE 'COMMUNIQUE' ON TALKS WITH USSR OFFICIALS

LD051207 Paris LE MONDE in French 5 Aug 80 p 9

[Text] The four French athletes--Jose Marajo, Robert Froissard, Joseph Arame and Veronique Grandieux--who together with Georges Boudry, vice president of the French National Olympic and Sports Committee and head of the delegation to Moscow, were received on Saturday, 2 August, by Mr Popov, first vice president of the games organizing committee, and Zamyatin, CPSU Central Committee international information section chief, issued another communique on their arrival at Orly on Saturday.

This second communique specifies: "At the beginning of the interview...Mr Zamyatin singled out the passage (of the communique--LE MONDE note) concerning the release of any human being imprisoned in the USSR for crimes of opinion and thought. He told us that nobody is detained in the USSR for a crime of opinion and that such assertions are based on Western propaganda.

"Our interlocutors were the first to mention dissidence, asking us to cite names while maintaining their readiness for dialogue with these people to prove their mistakes. They suggested that we correspond with Sakharov, offering to pass on to him any letters from us. They even offered to sign our letter, aside, of course, from the passage on freedom of opinion in the USSR. Finally, they reaffirmed that their country has never violated the Helsinki agreements or the Olympic Charter since 1951 when the USSR joined the International Olympic Committee.

"In reply to one of our questions on participation by Soviet athletes in the Los Angeles Olympic games, our interlocutors stressed their agreement in principle--only in principle--on the freedom of international sport and respect for human rights and confirmed the participation of their athletes unless there is any use of brute force endangering the Olympic movement.

"Finally, we would like to express our indignation at the improper behavior of some Western journalists who insulted us as we left our meeting."

In reply to a journalist who asked him whether he had discussed Afghanistan, Joseph Arame said: "We were not there to discuss Afghanistan but to discuss sport. The Afghan problem does not concern us sportsmen...."

LE MONDE VIEWS IMPLICATIONS OF FRANCOIS-PONCET HUNGARY TRIP

LD051451 Paris LE MONDE in French 2 Aug 80 p 1

[Editorial: "Return From Budapest"]

[Text] The French foreign minister's visit to Hungary on 30-31 July turned into a show of strength on the Afghan crisis. Mr Francois-Poncet told his Hungarian counterpart and MSZMP First Secretary Kadar that the French Government is by no means prepared to accept the fait accompli.

France, he said, regards the present conflict as a liberation struggle against a foreign occupation; it regards detente as indivisible and considers that detente in Europe is seriously threatened if its rules are violated elsewhere; consequently France demands that Soviet forces be withdrawn and that Moscow allows Afghanistan to resume its role as a nonaligned buffer state.

Although the French stance is well known, the emphasis with which it was recalled surprised the Hungarians, but it has to be noted that they were not particularly daunted by it. Once their momentary annoyance had passed they answered, in addition to a ritual repetition of Soviet arguments, that the most disturbing period of international tension had passed. According to the Hungarians and the USSR's other European allies, there is no longer any doubt that Moscow will soon control the Afghan internal situation and the East-West relations will slowly but surely resume their cosy little course.

This "optimism" is particularly striking since Hungary, like Poland, had been the least enthusiastic of the USSR's allies in applauding the Soviet intervention. These two countries had shown the most anxiety owing to their special economic dependence on West Europe. In the crisis they are experiencing the USSR's allies feared, to various extents, a reduction in their trade with the West, an increase in military efforts and and a tightening of the Soviet grip which detente had relaxed.

Today the East European governments observe that the U.S. embargo has embargo has misfired, the Olympic games boycott has demonstrated Western disunity and that the Muslim countries' condemnation of Moscow has been tinged with caution. Nobody now envisages postponing the Madrid CSCE conference. The Afghan resistance still does not seem to be receiving any really substantial aid. With the backing of historical experience the East is not particularly inclined to believe in right's invincibility.

Finally, rightly or wrongly Mr Giscard d'Estaing's meeting with Mr Brezhnev, the meeting he will have with Mr Gierek in September, Mr Schmidt's visit to Moscow and the meetings he plans with East German and Polish leaders are interpreted as signs of West Europe's readiness to pursue dialogue with the East, far from Kabul.

At the beginning of the year the press of the peoples' democracies portrayed the international tension as a Soviet-U.S. crisis without repercussions for Europe. Today it feels that this hope was not a vain one and that if detente is not divisible in theory then it is in practice.

Deeming U.S. impulsiveness to be dangerous and ineffective, West Europe opted for maintaining top-level contacts and constant diplomatic pressure in the Afghan crisis. These tactics raise one question: Can you keep saying that the intervention in Afghanistan completely alters international relations if it does not produce any other, even symbolic, consequences?

GOVERNMENT ISSUES COMMUNIQUE ON MEETING ON BOLOGNA BOMBING

LD051618 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1530 GMT 5 Aug 80

[Excerpt] The government has held a long session devoted to the outrage in Bologna. The final communique confirms that the attack originated in extreme fascist rightwing circles. The communique appeals to political parties, social forces and all citizens to mobilize around the democratic institutions in order to decisively contribute to the struggle against terrorism in all its forms and colors. It also recalls that the government has already taken measures to ensure that all state organs, security organs and forces of order pursue and intensify to the maximum the actions of prevention and repression in close cooperation with the magistrature.

BORIS STUKALIN LEADS CPSU DELEGATION ON VISIT WITH PCI

LD051055 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 2 Aug 80 p 14

[Unattributed report: "CPSU Delegation Meets With Berlinguer"]

[Text] Rome--A CPSU delegation headed by Boris Stukalin, chairman of the Soviet State Committee for Publishing Houses, Printing Plants and the Book Trade and a member of the CPSU Central Committee, has arrived in Rome at our party's invitation for a visit to study our party's work and organization. The delegation also comprises the following comrades: Yuriy Zhukov, member of the PRAVDA editorial staff; Vadim Medvedev, rector of the Academy of Social Sciences and member of the CPSU Central Auditing Commission; Mikhail Nenashev, chief editor of SOVETSKAYA ROSSIYA, and Vadim Sobakin and Genrikh Smirnov of the CPSU Central Committee International Section.

During their stay in Rome, Comrades Sobakin and Smirnov were received by Comrades Enrico Berlinguer and Paolo Bufalini.

The delegation was greeted at PCI Central Committee headquarters by Comrade Alessandro Natta and had working conversations with Comrade Gianni Giadresco on party organization topics and Comrade Adalberto Minucci on propaganda topics.

Also on Thursday a meeting took place at the RINASCITA editorial office with [RINASCITA Editor] Comrade Luciano Barca and at the L'UNITA editorial office with Comrades Renzo Foa, Eugenio Manca, Sergio Pardera and Franco Petrone.

Yesterday morning the delegation left Rome for Florence, Ravenna, Venice and Milan, where it will have meetings with provincial and grassroots party organizations.

The delegation will leave Milan for Moscow next Thursday.

MILITARY DELEGATION CONCLUDES VISIT TO PRC

LD052056 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1900 GMT 5 Aug 80

[Text] According to reports from Macao, General Conceicao e Silva has said in statements made to a radio station in the territory that it has been practically agreed that a delegation of military authorities from the People's Republic of China will visit Portugal next year.

General Conceicao e Silva, who headed the first Portuguese military delegation to visit the PRC, said on arrival in Macao that the Chinese authorities reaffirmed their interest in the political stability of the territory and in upholding the local interests which, they said, would never be damaged. After holding talks with authorities of the three branches of the armed forces, the Portuguese delegation paid visits to aircraft and other armaments' producing factories.

MOROCCO DISPLEASED WITH PORTUGUESE ATTITUDE TOWARD POLISARIO

LD030034 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2300 GMT 2 Aug 80

[Excerpt] Despite its desired outcome, with the fishermen safely back among their families, the case of the trawler Rio Vouga is threatening to degenerate into a diplomatic quarrel in the particularly sensitive area of Portuguese-Moroccan relations.

Despite the detailed explanations provided through normal diplomatic channels both in Lisbon and Rabat, the Moroccan Government is not happy with Portugal's attitude. Thus, speaking in Rabat yesterday, the Moroccan secretary of state of cooperation stated that his government was not satisfied with the explanations given by Lisbon. He went so far as to describe Luis Fontoura's signing of an agreement with the Polisario Front on the question of the self-determination of the Saharan people as intolerable interference in Morocco's internal affairs.

Morocco's opinion--as reflected in the secretary of state's utterances which in turn we are quoting from a Portuguese news agency report--is that it would have been more logical for Lisbon to have directly condemned the perpetrators of acts of piracy, instead of giving in to their blackmail and interfering in Morocco's internal affairs.

The Rabat government member contrasted Portugal's attitude with Spain's, pointing out that the Madrid government has taken a firm attitude toward the Saharans and refuses to engage in dialogue with the Polisario Front. He added that this attitude will bear fruit and will enable Spain to secure the release of its fishermen by making itself respected.

GABON TO CLOSE LISBON EMBASSY; 'LACK OF COOPERATION' CITED

LD021118 Lisbon in English to North America 0300 GMT 2 Aug 80

[Text] Gabon is to close its embassy in Lisbon, since the Portuguese Government has not yet opened an embassy in Libreville. A spokesman for Gabon alleges lack of cooperation on the part of Portugal since Gabon's Embassy in Lisbon was opened 4 years ago. A spokesman for the Portuguese Foreign Ministry has explained that the delay is wholly due to financial austerity problems.

KIPRIANOU CALLS CABINET MEETING TO DISCUSS INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS

NC050706 Nicosia CYPRUS MAIL in English 5 Aug 80 p 1

[Excerpts] President Kiprianou has called a joint cabinet and National Council meeting this evening for crucial decisions about the intercommunal talks, which have been in "recess" for more than a year now.

According to well-informed sources, the prospects for resumption appear now to be better than for some time after intensive efforts by the UN special representative Mr Hugo Gobbi and his deputy Mr Gorge. But it was agreed that much will depend on their consultations with the two sides today.

The president, who will be leaving during the weekend for Athens for a brief holiday and talks with the Greek Government, yesterday received Mr Gobbi and his deputy in the presence of the Greek Cypriot negotiator Mr Ioannidhis and his two advisers Mr M. Triandafillidhis and Mrs Stella Souliotis.

In another move, the president chaired a meeting of the working group, which comprises the House President Mr Alekos Mikhailidhis, Foreign Minister Mr Nikos Rolandhis, the Greek Cypriot negotiator Mr Ioannidhis and his two advisers.

This time, the meeting was also attended by the British constitutional expert Mrs Palley, which was indicative of the delicate phase of the consultations.

The stumbling block so far appears to have been the Turkish demand for advance acceptance of "bizonality", which the UN secretary general is trying to bypass through an introductory statement in which he will define that "bizonality" refers only to the territorial aspect whilst "federalism" refers to constitution.

Reliable Greek Cypriot sources indicated that the [Greek Cypriot] reaction to the Waldheim [proposal] was a positive one allowing the UN secretary general to deploy his good offices for bringing the two sides to the conference table again.

Meeting on 'Developments'

NC052012 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 2000 GMT 5 Aug 80

[Text] A joint meeting of the National Council and the Council of Ministers was held at the Presidential Palace tonight. A communique released after the 2-hour meeting says that President Kiprianou briefed the members of the National Council and the Council of Ministers on Cyprus developments and that views were exchanged. In addition to the members of the Council of Ministers, the joint meeting was also attended by AKEL Secretary General Papaioannou; EDEK Chairman Lissaridhis; the Greek Cypriot side's represenative at the intercommunal talks, Ioannidhis, and his advisers Mr Triandafillidhis and Mrs Souliotis.

DENKTAS STATES RESUMPTION OF TALKS NEARER AFTER UN MEETING

TA051035 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 0900 GMT 5 Aug 80

[Text] President Rauf Denktas said: We are closer today to the resumption of the talks than we were yesterday. This morning Denktas received the UN secretary general's special envoy in Cyprus, Hugo Gobbi, and his assistant Remy Gorge and conferred with them for some time. Umit Suleyman Onan, Turkish Cypriot representative at the intercommunal talks, and his advisor Necati Munir Ertekun also attended the meeting, which lasted about 1 hour.

In a statement after the meeting, Denktas noted that the UN officials are continuing their contacts and efforts to insure the resumption of the talks and said: I believe that we are closer today to the resumption of the talks than we were yesterday.

In reply to a question concerning the reports that the intercommunal talks will begin before the weekend, Denktas said: Let us not yet say anything on this subject. This is not a matter of time, but a matter of agreeing on a text. More correctly, it is a matter of accepting a text which has been agreed upon.

LIBYAN INFORMATION SECRETARY MEETS WITH CYPRIOT OFFICIALS

NC041502 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1400 GMT 4 Aug 80

[Text] Today, President Kipriancu received Libyan Information Secretary Al-Hijazi who is on an official visit to Cyprus. Al-Hijazi also met President of the House of Representatives Mikhailidhis and Agricultural Minister Tombazos. Cooperation in the agricultural sector between the two countries and the possibility of exporting Cyprus agricultural products to Libya were discussed at the meeting with the agricultural minister. At his meetings with the house president and agricultural minister, Al-Hijazi was accompanied by the Libyan charge d'affaires in Cyprus, Az-Zabi.

Delay in Signing of Agreement

NC060645 Nicosia ELEVTHERI KIPROS in Greek 6 Aug 80 p 1

[Text] Because of various issues that arose during the negotiations here between the visiting Libyan delegation and the Cyprus Government, the signing of agreements between Cyprus and Libya scheduled for yesterday had to be postponed.

This was stated by a competent government source, who added that the agreements concerning the exchange of information as well as technical, economic and cultural cooperation between Cyprus and Libya are ready and, moreover, have already been typed. All that remains is for them to be signed.

Asked to clarify further the reasons for this delay, the same source let it be understood that the issues which arose during the negotiations and are now the object of discussion are the question of the employment of Cypriots in Libya and that country's request for the establishment of a radio station to relay programs to the region.

As ELEVTHERI KIPROS reported yesterday, this Libyan request will be dealt with by the government whenever it is ready to do so and after consideration of the various factors involved, including the reasons which had led Ethnarch Makarios to turn down a similar Libyan request in the past.

From all the data available so far it is understood that the Libyan delegation has not yet fixed the date of its departure from Cyprus.

TURKEY REJECTS NEW PLAN FOR GREECE'S RETURN TO NATO

AT031512 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 3 Aug 80 p 1

[By Nikos Simos]

[Text] Turkey is again hindering Greece's return to NATO. Specifically, according to reports from allied circles in Brussels Ankara has rejected the conditions of the new plan for our country's return to the alliance's military wing which General Rogers' staff officers had formulated in Athens jointly with two senior Greek military officers. (I KATHIMERINI 19 July 1980). The same reports from Brussels mentioned that, after the new conditions and plan were formulated, the two staff officers of the NATO supreme military command went to Ankara from 21 to 27 July in order to discuss it with the Turkish side. The Turkish Government, however, expressed serious objections to this new effort for Greece's return to the alliance's ranks and especially to the issue of the boundaries of operational control in the Aegean, at least as envisaged by the new plan.

The new Turkish objection is being interpreted as a strong reaction to NATO's change in tactics, especially to the fact that, in the course of Greek-NATO negotiations or exploratory talks to date, this is the first time that the Allies have jointly formulated a new plan with Greek officials without first taking Turkish viewpoints into consideration.

In addition, diplomatic sources have added that the new Turkish refusal can have a double interpretation: Either that the Turks ultimately did not receive the amount of U.S. aid they desired and are thus reacting to the NATO issue because they know how much it concerns the Americans since Greece is linking the issue with the future of U.S. bases in Greece; of that, because of domestic chaos, they have selected the tactic of intransigence on foreign policy issues for reasons of internal consumption and, in any case, in order to somewhat appease Turkish military chauvinism.

Following these Turkish positions which perpetuate Ankara's refusal regarding Greece's return to the NATO military wing, General Rogers' staff officers are already negotiating with Greek officers in order to merge Greek viewpoints and Turkish objections so that a new plan can emerge with conditions which are acceptable to both sides.

In any case, it is being noted that since such a merging of viewpoints will be based on Turkish objections and positions it presupposes concessions by the Greek side, specifically with regard to the basic point of Ankara's disagreement: The status of borders for control in the Aegean. However, this point should be precluded because, if the Greek side accepts Turkish conditions, it will mean relinguishing its basic rights in the Aegean regardless of whether these are discussed before or after Greece's return to NATO.

However, there are indications that the Greek side is again hardening its position following the flexibility which it manifested for a while during the exploratory talks.

The hardening of the Greek position arises principally from the fact that, in response to a new U.S. desire--verging on the border of pressure--for quickly eliminating the suspense regarding U.S. bases in Greece, the Greek Government has unequivocally given priority to the NATO issue.

This Greek position was made known through diplomatic channels, specifically through Washington Ambassador I. Tzounis who in recent weeks--he is now in Athens--had made certain contacts and held talks with U.S. officials within the framework of preparing for talks on the bases which will begin in September.

A government spokesman has denied a report in an evening newspaper according to which General Gratsios, chief of the National Defense General Staff, dircussed the issue of our country's return to NATO with General Rogers in London.

The government spokesman added that, while in London as the guest of his british counterpart, General Gratsios accidentally met Rogers during a social affair.

FOREIGN MINISTER COMMENTS ON LYONS ATTACK, TERRORISM

TA051456 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 5 Aug 80

[Text] Here is Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen's statement on the attack on the Turkish Consulate in Lyons, France:

[Begin recording] Our consulate in the city of Lyons was attacked by gunmen at noon today. Two persons entered the consulate and asked for the consul. They took their guns out of their bags when they heard that the consul had not yet arrived. They began to fire on the people who were sitting in the waiting room. Four citizens were wounded, including consulate guard Mehmet Bozdag. His wounds are slight. The other three citizens are Remazan Sezer, Kadir Akildan and Huseyin Tokmak. Sezer's and Akildan's wounds are slight. Tokmak's wounds are, unfortunately, serious.

No organization has yet claimed responsibility for the armed attack. However, eyewitnesses and the wounded have said that the gunmen could be Armenians and that they would recognize them.

An atrocious and inhuman act was committed a few days ago when our collegaue, Galip Ozmen, a member of our embassy staff in Athens, was murdered. His daughter succumbed to her wounds later and his widow was also wounded. An Armenian organization claimed responsibility for that incident. This bringings to mind the same possibility for the present case. Attack centers and aggressive gangs abroad seem to have taken Turkish diplomats and representatives as targets. These gangs have made their attacks more frequently. It is impossible to say that the two incidents occurred one after the other by coincidence.

It should be known very well that such murderous efforts will not make our citizens or our representatives abroad stop being loyal to their country or make them stop serving their country. The aggressors should know very well that such murderous acts will not stop Turkish representatives, Turkish diplomats, Turkish civil servants and all Turkish citizens from being loyal to the integrity of their country. On the contrary, such acts strengthen their will. We must protect the integrity of our country. We have pledged to do that as a nation. We do not allow any foreign force, center or nation, regardless of its name, membership or historical claim, to covet our lands.

In the fact of the continuing incidents, we must take certain measures. So far, we have asked all the countries where our representatives are stationed to take care in providing protection and security. We continue to ask them the same thing, naturally. However, this time, I believe that it will be useful to establish closer cooperation between the Turkish police and the police forces of the concerned countries. If we suspect that our representatives are not sufficiently protected in a foreign country we will adopt the necessary stand, and we might even think of sending special protection teams. [end recording]

Armenian Group Claims Responsibility

NC051337 Paris AFP in English 1332 GMT 5 Aug 80

[Excerpt] Paris, Aug. 5, (AFP)--An Armenian organisation today claimed responsibility for an attack on the Turkish Consulate in France's second city of Lyons which wounded three people. In a telephone call to AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE, an anonymous spokesman for the Armenian Secret Liberation Army said, "We will continue our attacks until there is justice for the genocide of 1915"--the year when Turkish authorities massacred up to a million Armenians.

REPUBLIC OF IRELAND

HAUGHEY URGES ANGLO-IRISH TALKS ON ULSTER

LD041435 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 4 Aug 80 p 2

[Paul Potts report: "Haughey Seeks Talks on Uniting Ireland"]

[Text] Mr Haughey, the Irish prime minister, is urgently looking for a diplomatic breakthrough with the British Government on the question of Irish unity to restore his flagging popularity.

His main diplomatic thrust since taking over from Mr Lynch last year has been to try to convince Mrs Thatcher that only a direct Anglo-Irish dialogue on Ulster can end the deadlock which is becoming increasingly expensive to sustain. Mr Haughey has sought support from other countries, particularly those in the EEC and the United States, to put pressure on Mrs Thatcher for such talks.

Assessment in Dublin is that the British Government will have to end the constitutional guarantee to the Protestant Unionist majority in Northern Ireland to remain part of the United Kingdom if the latest political initiative breaks down.

Officials in the Northern Ireland Office do not share the Dublin reading of the situation and regard Mr Haughey more as an opportunist waiting to make capital both political and personal out of any failure to bring devolved government to Ulster.

For his part, Mr Haughey believes that with the open support of a British Government anxious to resolve the Ulster situation, he can persuade the Unionists to talk and subsequently remove their fears about life in a united Ireland.

As a measure of his determination, Mr Haughey is said to be prepared to change his country's constitution and give written guarantees to the Unionists and if necessary give Ulster virtual independence within an all-Ireland context.

The two main areas where Mr Haughey would have to alter the Irish Constitution are on divorce and the traditional claim of the Republic to jurisdiction over Ulster. Already the special privileges afforded the Roman Catholic Church in the constitution have been removed by referendum. Mr Haughey is on record as saying that he would be prepared to sit down with the Unionists and work out a jointly acceptable constitution.

The argument put forward by Mr Haughey's aides is that Mrs Thatcher and the British people are tired of the financial and mental burden imposed by Ulster and are, in effect, offering the Unionists one last chance. If this fails, as seems likely, Mrs Thatcher will risk the wrath of Mr Paisley and his Unionist colleages and start talks with Mr Haughey on the principle of Irish unity.

A solution to the troubles in the North has great electoral appeal in the Republic, which, like Britain, is finding the cost of defeating terrorism a growing burden at a time of economic recession.

With his popularity at a record low and his party heading for defeat at the next general election, which must be held by June, 1982, Mr Haughey is prepared to risk a great deal for what would be a spectacular diplomatic coup.

LE SOIR EXAMINES BELGIAN DECISION ON EUROMISSILES

LD061415 Brussels LE SOIR in French 31 Jul 80 pp 1, 3

[Christian-Guy Smal article: "Unsuccessful Attempt To Lift NATO Missiles Out of the Rut"]

[Text] The question of the deployment of nuclear missiles in Belgium has led to a split among majority parties. The successive postponements of a decision on the subject, however, is worrying the people in charge of our diplomacy. In order to put an end to such vacillations, the foreign minister hoped to be able to make his colleagues accept a formula which would both satisfy our NATO allies and insure the assent of those who, within the majority, have been above all trying to make negotiations prevail.

An unsuccessful attempt...all that the minister has been able to obtain from his colleagues is an instruction to continue with his consultations.

You are aware of the problem: On 12 December 1979, five countries, including Belgium, agreed within a NATO framework to deploy on their soil nuclear arms capable of reaching the Soviet Union, which already possesses similar devices.

In fact, the NATO communique mentions no one in particular. It states that "the missiles will be deployed on the territory of certain countries...." This cautious formula was to enable Belgium to gain time and remain in solidarity with its allies.

Our government was faced with serious domestic difficulties and was, therefore, politically in no position to adopt any clear-cut and final decision. Opposition to Euromissiles led by the Socialists, headed by Van Miert, was too strong.

While accepting the Atlantic decision to modernize long-range theater nuclear forces (the LRTNF, according to Anglo-Saxon terminology), the Belgian Government then asked for a "moratorium" which would enable it to postpone its decision until a NATO meeting in Ankara at the end of June 1980. Meanwhile, all possibilities of negotiations with the Eastern bloc were to be explored. The subsequent events dispelled some illusions, and not only we but also some other people, particularly West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, who brought back a "concession" from Moscow on 1 July, tried to make some inquiries.

Mr Brezhnev withdrew his precondition--he no longer demanded that NATO rescind its 12 December communique prior to any negotiations.

At last, it would be possible to talk. But talk about what exactly?

On 15 July, after meeting Soviet Ambassador to Washington Dobrynin, U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Warren Christopher came to Brussels and stated that preliminary discussions about Eurostrategic arms would represent an "enormous task which will necessitate intensive consultations among all NATO allies." In any case, a "special consultative group" is to meet on 15 September 1980 in order to prepare a joint reply to the alliance to various Soviet proposals put forward since October 1979, that is, when Brezhnev decided on a unilateral withdrawal of Russian forces from East Germany.

Therefore, it seemed that it was time to make a final decision.

This was apparently the view taken by the foreign minister, whose staff has prepared a document which the ministerial committee was to study on Wednesday.

Since the Brezhnev-Schmidt mee ing and Warren Christopher's explanations in Brussels--not to mention a visit by a Belgian delegation to Moscow 15 days ago--it has no longer been possible to pretend that "some additional information was necessary" and assert that we were "anxious to sound out Soviet intentions."

The Rue des Quatre Bras [Belgian Foreign Ministry] takes the view that it is now necessary to put an end to any "indecisiveness" since henceforth any obstruction will weaken Belgium's position in relation both to NATO and to Eastern countries.

Obviously, there was no need to be hasty before acquiring information on all aspects of the problem, but the least that can be said is that we now have all such information. Belgium can no longer pretend that it "needs more information" in order to postpone the moment of decision. The NATO "special consultative group" is to decide on its attitude on 15 September, and it is obvious that if Belgium wants to exert at the meeting the "influence" recently mentioned by Nothomb, it must not arrive on the scene in its now classic role of the great undecided in the Atlantic repertory.

A prolonged wait-and-see attitude or a refusal would be interpreted in Moscow as a break in the Allies' solidarity. "We would have nothing to gain from such an attitude," Foreign Ministry officials believe; "We would be excluded from everything and we would endanger our partners, especially the FRG."

In anticipation of the meeting of the ministerial committee on Wednesday morning, Nothomb has made his staff prepare a document which is to make it possible to reconcile water with fire, that is, satisfy LRTNF supporters without provoking any fatal outcry by the opposition.

Thus Belgium would ask to "be associated with preparations for, and conduct of, negotiations." Our government would maintain its will to assess "together with its allies" the state of negotiations (on a reduction in armaments) every 6 months with a view to drawing conclusions relative to any future modernization of the Eurostrategic arsenal.

Belgium would acknowledge that missiles are to be deployed from 1983 onward, but the "scale" of deployments would depend on "the state of negotiations at that date."

In this spirit--and this is a tricky point--the Belgian Government would state that it "agrees" to assume responsibility for the share of the deployment of Eurostrategic arms allotted to it at an "appropriate moment" and that "it indicates its agreement" on the initiation of "work preparatory to such deployment."

In the end, Nothomb's colleagues did not deem it opportune to follow the path recommended by the Foreign Ministry. They merely asked the foreign minister to pursue contacts needed to establish bases for negotiations. However, the minister told us that such new moves do not imply any additional soundings in the East.

Nothomb is to submit a report on the state of East-West relations to the foreign policy ministerial council which is to meet next on 9 September 1980. In fact, following the Muskie-Dobrynin meeting, the Americans are preparing a list of all possibilities of negotiations. Their "task for the vacation period" is to prepare for a meeting of the NATO special consultative group on 15 September.

AS-SADAT SENDS 'CONFIDENTIAL' MESSAGE TO SCHMIDT ON JERUSALEM

LD061734 Hamburg DPA in German 1647 GMT 6 Aug 80

[Text] Bonn--It was learned from informed sources in Bonn today that President Anwar as-Sadat of Egypt has sent a confidential message to Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt. The Federal Press Office merely confirmed that the chancellor's office had received a "diplomatic briefing" through the Egyptian charge d'affaires, Hasan 'Abd al-Hadi. Informed sources said that As-Sadat's letter concerned Cairo's attitude toward the Israeli parliament's decision to declare Jerusalem the "indivisible capital" of Israel. Earlier this week the Egyptian Foreign Ministry informed the heads of mission of several countries, including the Federal Republic, of Cairo's decision to defer the next round of negotiations with Israel on Palestinian autonomy.

GENSCHER COMMENTS ON UPCOMING SCHMIDT-HONECKER MEETING

LD061416 Hamburg DPA in German 1314 GMT 6 Aug 80

[Excerpt] Bonn, 6 Aug (DPA)--Regarding the planned meeting between Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and SED leader Erich Honecker scheduled for the end of August, the Federal Government is giving increased prominence to the goal of further facilitating human contacts in relations with the GDR. FDP Chairman and Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher stated today before an FDP working group convened especially to prepare for this meeting that in the talks with the GDR leadership the important thing is "the further expansion of relations, advances in solving humanitarian issues, particularly in reuniting families, and further easing and extending tourist traffic."

The minister of state in the Federal Chancellor's Office, Guenter Huonker, who briefed the FDP working group on relations between the two German states, stressed in a DEUTSCHE WELLE interview that there are a whole number "of very concrete points" in the sphere of human alleviations. Huonker, however, would not draw up a public "catalogue of demands." This would not help the talks and there would be no point in acting as if prerequisites were being imposed for the talks.

DATES OF SCHMIDT-GIEREK TALKS OFFICIALLY CONFIRMED

LD061653 Hamburg DPA in German 1623 GMT 6 Aug 80

[Text] Bonn--The Federal Press Office has officially confirmed that Polish party leader Edward Gierek will meet Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Hamburg on 19 and 20 August. The press office said that further details will be announced at a later date. Topics will include the further development of European cooperation as well as questions of disarmament and the reduction of forces in Europe.

GENSCHER SUPPORTS SPAIN'S EEC MEMBERSHIP BID

LD070907 Madrid ABC in Spanish 3 Aug 80 p 7

[Text] "Spain should become an EEC member as soon as possible; on the one hand, this entry will help consolidate democracy in Spain, and at the same time it will impart new impetus and ideas to the work of European unification," FRG Foreign Minister Genscher has stated in an interview granted to the EFE news agency.

[Question] Mr Minister, some anxiety about Spain's entry into the European Community [EC] has recently arisen in my country. Does the FRG still maintain its stance in favor of Spanish membership within the envisaged timetable? What kind of Europe does the FRG want, and what could Spain's role in it be?

[Answer] Spain should become a member of the EC as soon as possible; our favorable stance on this has not changed at all. From the outset the Federal Government has devoted all its efforts to this end, as well as to the Community's general southward expansion. To this end I would like to emphasize once more what I have already had the opportunity to assure Spanish Minister of Relations with the EC Calvo Sotelo: We will continue to demand and actively support the efforts aimed at a smooth continuation of the negotiations on membership.

Our image of a future Europe transcends the conception of a mere Common Market and includes the political union of our democratic Europe.

Membership in the Community will help consolidate democracy in your country. Following its entry Spain will cooperate with the other member countries in the EC's subsequent development and will impart new impetus and ideas to the work of European unification. Something which I had the opportunity to ascertain during my recent visit to Portugal also applies to Spain. The Community's expansion will contribute positively to the growth of the member countries' economies.

Spain should use the time left before its entry, as well as the transitional stage immediately following, to implement the necessary adjustment measures, because the Common Market's expansion is a great opportunity and, at the same time, a challenge both for the future members and for the Community itself.

We are convinced that the inclusion of your country and of the other applicants into the circle of the European democracies constitutes a powerful factor for stability in southern Europe and consequently throughout the European Continent. Freedom, democracy and social justice in a united Europe are the aims of our European policy. They constitute the core of an overall foreign policy aimed at maintaining peace.
